In order that the plaintiff may recover, it must appear to you that the facts alleged in the complaint are true as alleged therein. That the plaintiff was employed by the defendant company at the time of the alleged injury. That the defendant was negligent in providing and using unsafe, defective and insecure machinery, or in causing the machinery to be repaired during working hours, and when the plaintiff was compelled, in the performance of her duty, to be so near the same as greatly to endanger her person. That the plaintiff suffered the injury complained of. That the injury was caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant.

The whole law of this case is laid down in the opinion of the Supreme Court read in your hearing, and you will take that as a part of this charge. Negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person under the existing circumstances would not have done, the *essence of the fault being either in the omission or commission of the duty.

To apply this definition to the conduct of the defendant, it was their duty to provide and use such machinery only as a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done, under the circumstances of the situation in which they were. It was their duty to keep the same in repair as a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the same circumstances. It was their duty to repair, or cause to be repaired, the machinery at such hours and in such manner as a reasonable and prudent person would have done under the same circumstances.

If the defendant company has failed in these duties, or any of them, they have been negligent in a legal sense, and if the plaintiff has been injured as the direct result of such negligence, the defendant is liable, unless it appeared that there are other circumstances in the case which will excuse the company from liability. For if the injury complained of was not entirely occasioned by the negligence or improper conduct of the defendant, but would, notwithstanding such faults of the defendant, have been avoided, but for the negligence or want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, the defendant is entitled to the verdict. So, also, if the injury was not entirely occasioned by the negligence or improper conduct of the defendant, but would have been avoided but for the negligence or want of ordinary care on the part of a co-laborer of the plaintiff, the defendant is entitled to a verdict, unless it appear that the defendant had not used ordinary care and reasonable prudence in the selection of such a co-laborer, it being a principle of law, that the employé assumes the risks incident to his employment, one of which is the negligence of a co-laborer. The company is liable for the negligence of its officers and agents to whom it delegates the control of its business and operatives, and the performance of their duties, but not for that of a co-laborer of the plaintiff.

The term co-laborer embraces all those employed in performing any portion of the work of the cotton mill, in which the plaintiff was employed, in any of its departments, but not a workman employed to keep the machinery in repair, though in some respects a fellow-servant or co-laborer. As to what constitutes a middleman, or such an officer or agent as to represent the company as to make it liable for his negligent acts or omissions, I will read a passage from the case of Buckner v. The New York Central Railroad Company, cited in 31 Am. Rep. 515, 516.

If then you find that the plaintiff has suffered the injury complained of as a direct result of the negligence of the defendant or its representatives, you will proceed to enquire whether it could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care or prudence of the plaintiff, or of any co-laborer whose want of care contributed directly to the injury, for if such want of care on the part of the plaintiff or her co-laborers in any way contributed to the cause of the injury, the defendant would not be liable, for when the injury in part was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff, and in part by negligence of the defendant, or of a co-laborer, the court will not distinguish between these contributing causes, but will refuse to interfere.

The questions are, was the injury complained of caused by the use of defective machinery as alleged? Were such defects known to the defendants, or might they have known of such defects by the use of ordinary care and prudence? Or was it caused in any part by the repairing of the machinery during the work hours? If so, was that a want of reasonable care and prudence on the part of the defendants, or was it caused by a want of reasonable care and prudence on the part of the workmen appointed to repair the machinery? If so, then the defendants would be liable, unless you find that the negligence or want of reasonable care and prudence on the part of the plaintiff, or on the part of a co-laborer, contributed to the cause of the injury, as I have before stated.

What act is there on the part of the plaintiff which she ought not to have done, as a reasonable and prudent person, which contributed as a cause to her injury? If you find any such, she cannot recover. What ought she to have done, as a reasonable and prudent person, to avoid such injury which she did not do? If you find any such neglect on her part that contributed as a cause of the injury, she cannot recover. If you find no such negligence on the part of the plaintiff, then apply the same test to the conduct of any co-laborer of the plaintiff having any connection with the accident. If you find any such contributory negligence on the part of any co-laborer of the plaintiff, she cannot recover.

But if you find that the injury was caused entirely by the negligence of the defendant company or their agents, middlemen or representatives, your verdict should be for the plaintiff. If you find for the plaintiff, you must find such a sum of money as you may think should reasonably compensate her for the injury she has sustained, the loss of time, mental and bodily suffering, loss of eyesight, and other permanent injuries and disabilities. [Here the learned judge read the fifth syllabus in Hough v. Railway Company, 10 Otto 214 (25 L. Ed. 612), as a part of his charge.]

The defendants moved for a new trial, which being refused, they appealed to this court on the exceptions suffered in the opinion.

Messrs. D. S. Henderson and Youmans, Attorney-General, for appellants.

*267

*Mr. Justice McIVER. This being the second appeal in this case, it will not be necessary to make any further statement of the case than such as may be sufficient for a proper understanding of the points raised by this appeal, inasmuch as a full statement may be found by reference to the case as reported in 15 S. C. 443. The points now raised arise upon the alleged refusal of the Circuit judge to charge certain propositions of law as requested by the defendant, and upon exceptions to the charge, and to the organization of the jury.

The first request, which appellant insists was erroneously refused, is as follows: "That manufacturing companies, as between them and their employes, are not bound to use such appliances as are of the best or most approved description. If they supply such as are reasonably safe, and have been sanctioned by use, they do all that the law requires. There is, in short, no implied warranty that the materials furnished by the master shall be sound and fit for the purpose, nor that the servant shall not be exposed to extraordinary risks." It will be observed that the Circuit judge did not refuse to charge all of the propositions requested, but, on the contrary, in his settlement of the case, he says:

"At the conclusion of the charge, the jury were told that various requests to charge had been preferred by the counsel on either side, which they had heard read; 'that most, if not all, of them were in accordance with the law as understood by me, and already laid down in my charge; that I declined the requests to charge, on both sides, so far as they contained matter inconsistent with the instructions already given them,' so that unless it appears that there was something in this request inconsistent with the instructions already given to the jury, it cannot be properly said that this request was refused.

The judge's charge was reduced to writing and is set out in the "Case," and need not be repeated here. Upon a careful examination of the charge, we are unable to discover anything in it which is inconsistent with the proposition contained in the first request. On the contrary, the jury were instructed that it was the duty of the defendant "to provide and use such machinery only as a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily *have done under the circumstances of the situation in which they were." This necessarily implied that the defendant was "not bound to use such appliances as are of the best or most approved description," but only such as a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have used under similar circumstances. There was, therefore, not only no inconsistency, but the proposition asked for was, in effect, charged.

The next request, which it is alleged was erroneously refused, was in the following language: "That the plaintiff having been injured by the flying out of a shuttle from a loom, upon which she was a weaver, if the jury find that she knew, when she undertook her employment, and during her continuance thereon, that the flying out of shuttles were matters of ordinary occurrence in the factory, and incident to the employment which she undertook, then she cannot recover, and the verdict must be for the defendants." This request also contained nothing inconsistent with the charge, but on the other hand was embraced in it. It involved the proposition that when one voluntarily engages in a service to which it is known that certain risks are incident, he assumes such risks, except where they result from the negligence of the employer or of any person who represents him. This proposition is distinctly announced in the opinion of this court at the hearing of the former appeal, which the Circuit judge had read to the jury as part of his charge, and in addition to this said, in so many words, to the jury, "that the employé assumes the risks incident to his employment." There is, therefore, no foundation for the charge of error in this respect.

The next request, which appellant claims was improperly refused, was as follows: "That if the jury find that there was once a shuttle-guard upon the loom in question, their next inquiry should be, how long that shuttle-guard had been removed before the accident, and if they find that the shuttle-guard had been absent any reasonable length of time before the accident, and without any complaints of its absence by the plaintiff, but that she worked upon the loom with it off, then the defendants are not to blame for its absence, and the verdict must be for the defendants." This request is based upon the doctrine of contributory negligence, and we think the law upon that subject *was fully and correctly expounded to the jury. There was nothing in this request inconsistent with the charge, and it was, in effect, adopted by the Circuit judge and laid before the jury.

The next request was in these words: "That if the jury find that the company exercised ordinary skill and caution in the purchasing of machinery, and the employment of competent and reliable persons to keep the same in order and superintend its working, then they have performed all their duty as employers to their employé, the plaintiff, and she cannot recover." This involves the proposition that the employer's duty is fully complied with when he has exercised ordinary care in furnishing suitable machinery, and in the employment of competent and careful persons to keep the same in repair, and that his duty does not require him to go further and see that all needful repairs are made. A similar proposition is involved in the exception to the charge, which was "that his Honor erred in instructing the jury that the term co-laborer embraces all those employed in performing any portion of the work of the cotton mill, in which the plaintiff was employed, in any of its departments, but not a workman employed to keep the machinery in repair, though, in some respects, a fellow-servant or co-laborer," because it is submitted that in order to constitute a 'workman employed to keep the machinery in repair,' a middleman or representative of the company, said workman must have the power to employ and discharge hands, and purchase and change machinery, and said charge being intended to apply to the position of the witness, Harling, without such qualification, was calculated to mislead the jury, and was erroneous." This request, and the exception to the charge will, therefore, be considered together.

Who is embraced within the terms co-laborer or fellow-servant is a question which has been the subject of no little discussion, and the authorities are somewhat conflicting.

The question has been presented to different courts in various aspects, but we propose to confine our attention to the form in which it is here presented. Is a workman, employed to keep the machinery of a cotton mill in repair and in good working order, a co-laborer or fellow-servant with an operative employed to attend one or more *looms as a weaver, in such a sense as to exempt the employer from liability for an injury caused by the negligence of the person employed to keep the looms in repair and proper working order? The rule seems to be well settled that the master is liable to his servant for any injury caused by his own negligence, or by the negligence of any person representing him. It would seem to be clear that any person employed by the master to do anything which it is the duty of the master to do, is his representative. It undoubtedly is the duty of the master to employ the laborers who are to operate the machinery, and discharge them if incompetent or careless; and, therefore, any person to whom this duty is delegated by the master is undoubtedly his representative, and the master would be responsible to his servant for any injury caused by the negligence of the person to whom this duty has been delegated.

So, too, it is conceded to be the duty of the master to provide suitable machinery for the use of his operatives; and if he delegates this duty to another, he is responsible to his servant for any injury caused by the negligence of any person to whom the performance of this duty has been entrusted. It is, likewise, the duty of the master to keep the machinery in proper repair and safe working order; and if he entrusts the performance of this duty to another, we see no reason why he should not be held liable for injury to one of his servants, caused by the negligence of the person employed to perform this duty which it is incumbent upon the master to perform.

The test as to whether an employé is the representative of the master is, not whether such employé has the power to employ or discharge hands, or to purchase or change machinery, for, while these are some of the duties of the master, they are not all of his duties, and hence, an employé who is not entrusted with either of these powers may still be the representative of the master. The true test is whether the person in question is employed to do any of the duties of the master; if so, then he cannot be regarded as a fellow-servant or co-laborer with the operatives, but is the representative of the master, and any negligence on his part in the performance of the duty of the master thus delegated to him must be regarded as the negligence of the master.

These views are fully supported by authority from other States, though, so far as we are informed, there is no case in this State directly upon the point now under consideration. Murray v. The South Carolina Railroad Company, 1 McM. 385 [36 Am. Dec. 268], was a case in which a fireman on a locomotive was injured by the negligence of the engineer, and simply decided the general proposition that a master is not liable to one of his servants for an injury caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant, and does not purport to decide who is embraced within the term, fellow-servant. The case of Conlin v. The City Council of Charleston, 15 Rich. 201, turned upon the question whether the person whose negligence caused the injury was a servant of the city council or of an independent contractor.

There are decisions, however, in our sister States, in which the question has been distinctly raised and decided in conformity with the views hereinbefore advanced, and these cases appear to be fully sustained, both by reason and authority. In Ford v. Fitchburg Railroad Company, 110 Mass. 240 (14 Am. Rep. 598), a fireman was injured by reason of a defect in the engine, which was due to the neglect of the employés of the company charged with the duty of keeping the engine in repair, although the company had no reason to suspect negligence or incompetency on the part of such employés, and it was held that the company was liable. In that case the court used the following language: "The rule of law which exempts the master from responsibility to the servant for injuries received from the ordinary risks of his employment, including the negligence of his fellow-servants, does not excuse the employer from the exercise of ordinary care in supplying and maintaining suitable instrumentalities for the performance of the work required. One who enters the employment of another has a right to count on this duty, and is not required to assume the risk of the master's negligence in this respect. The fact that it is a duty which must always be discharged, when the employer is a corporation, by officers and agents, does not relieve the corporation from the obligation. The agents who are charged with the duty of supplying safe machinery, are not, in the true sense of the rule relied on, to be regarded as fellow-servants of those who are engaged in operating it. They are charged with the master's duty to his servant."

Corcoran v. Holbrook, 59 N. Y. 517 (17 Am. Rep. 369), was a case in which an operative in a cotton mill was injured by the fall of an elevator, which was not kept in proper repair, and it was held that the master was liable. It is true that, in that case, the injury was attributable to the negligence of the general agent, to whom the defendant had entrusted the management of the mill, but the principle upon which the decision rests, shows that the liability of the master was fixed, not because the injury resulted from the negligence of a general agent, but because it was the duty of the master to supply and maintain suitable machinery, and if this duty was neglected, it did not matter to whom such duty was entrusted, the master would be liable. The court used this language: "It was the duty of the defendants towards their employés to keep the elevator in a safe condition, and to repair any injury to it which would endanger the lives or limbs of their employés, who were lawfully and properly, in the performance of their functions, in the habit of using it. That duty they delegated to their general agent. As to the acts which a master or principal is bound as such to perform towards his employés, if he delegates the performance of them to an agent, the agent occupies the place of the master, and the latter is deemed present, and held liable for the manner in which they are performed."

In Brann v. Chicago, R. I. and P. R. R. Co., 53 Iowa 595 (36 Am. Rep. 243), a brakeman on a railway train was injured by reason of the failure of an inspector to perform his duty, and the company was held liable. After laying down the proposition, that it was the duty of the corporation, not only to provide, in the first place, suitable and safe machinery and appliances, but also to see that they are kept in repair, the court said: "As the corporation must act through agents and employés, the negligence of the employés, upon whom the duty of inspection is devolved, is the negligence of the corporation," and cite a number of authorities to sustain the proposition.

*In Fuller v. Jewett, 80 N. Y. 46 (36 Am. Rep. 575), an engineer on a railway was killed by the explosion of the boiler, resulting from a failure to keep it in proper repair, and it was held that the defendant was liable, although he had employed a competent superintendent of repairs and master mechanic, and made proper regulations, and the negligence was that of the mechanics directed to make the repairs. The defense was, that the negligence of the mechanics employed to make the repairs was the negligence of a fellow-servant, and, therefore, under the admitted rule, the employé was not liable for the injury sustained by one of his other servants; but the court said, "that acts which the master, as such, is bound to perform for the safety and protection of his employés, cannot be delegated so as to exonerate the former from liability to a servant, who is injured by the omission to perform the act or duty, or by its negligent performance, whether the non-feasance or misfeasance is that of a superior officer, agent or servant [or] of a subordinate or inferior agent or servant to whom the doing of the act or the performance of the duty has been committed. In either case, in respect to such act or duty, the servant who undertakes or omits to perform it is the representative of the master, and not a mere co-servant with the one who sustains the injury. The act or omission is the act or omission of the master, irrespective of the grade of the servant, whose negligence caused the injury, or of the fact whether it was, or was not, practicable for the master to act personally, or whether he did, or did not, do all that he personally could do, by selecting competent servants, or otherwise to secure the safety of his employés." And again, the court said, "the duty of maintaining machinery in repair for the protection and safety of employés is the same in kind as that of furnishing a safe and proper machine in the first instance." See, also, Hough v. Railway Company, 100 U. S. 213 [25 L. Ed. 612].

We are aware that there are cases, some of which have been cited by appellant, that seem to be in conflict with those above cited; but an attentive examination of those cases will show that they either ignore, or do not give full weight to what we regard as the only true test as to whether the person in question occupies the position of a fellow-servant to the servant who is injured or is a representative of the master, and that is, whether the person whose status is in question is charged with the performance of a duty which properly belongs to the master. It is well settled that it is the duty of the master to provide suitable and safe machinery and appliances for the use of his operatives; and, we think, it is also settled that his duty does not stop there, but that it is likewise his duty to keep such machinery in proper repair and safe working order, and if these duties, or either of them, are negligently performed, and one of the servants thereby sustains an injury, the master is liable, even though he may have entrusted the performance of such duties to subordinates, by whatever name they may be called, and even though the master may have exercised due care in the selection of such subordinates. We think, therefore, that the request to charge, which we have been considering, was properly refused, and that the exception to the charge cannot be sustained.

Finally, the defendant requested the Circuit judge to charge, "that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, to show that those who are employed by the defendants to superintend their work are incompetent, and they are presumed to be competent until shown to be otherwise by competent testimony." We see nothing in this request inconsistent with the charge of the Circuit judge, and, therefore, it cannot be said that it was refused. Indeed, we do not perceive its applicability to the case as made, inasmuch as there does not seem to be any pretense that the injury complained of resulted from any negligence on the part of "those who were employed by the defendants to superintend their work." But even conceding its applicability, its correctness was recognized by the former decision in this case, which was read to the jury as part of the judge's charge.

The only remaining question is as to the organization of the jury. It seems that one of the jurors presented was, on the motion of the plaintiff, examined on his voir dire, and to the question indicated by the statute (Gen. Stat. of 1872, 523, § 25), he answered in the negative. He was then asked by the court whether he was in the employment of the defendant, to which *he replied that he was. In his settlement of the "Case," the Circuit judge says: "It appeared to me his relation to the defendant might (unconsciously to himself, perhaps,) prevent him from being wholly indifferent between the parties, and for that reason he was excluded." To this exception was duly taken. The statute above referred to reads as follows: "The court shall, on motion of either party in suit, examine on oath any person who is called as a juror therein, to know whether he is related to either party, or has any interest in the cause, or has expressed or formed any opinion, or is sensible of any bias or prejudice therein, and the party objecting to the juror may introduce any other competent evidence in support of the objection. If it appears to the court that the juror is not indifferent in the cause, he shall be placed aside as to the trial of that cause, and another shall be called."

The provision of the act, that "any other competent evidence in support of the objection" may be introduced, shows that negative answers to the questions indicated are not conclusive. This additional evidence may be obtained from answers of the juror to such additional questions as may be propounded to him by the court, as well as from any other competent source. The language of the act "if it appears to the court that the juror is not indifferent," shows that it is the mind of the judge before whom the case is tried, which is to be satisfied as to whether the person presented as a juror is a suitable person to serve as such, and, therefore, when, as in this case, the judge was not satisfied upon this point, we certainly cannot undertake to say that he should have been satisfied. This exception cannot be sustained.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[This case is also cited in Hooper v. Columbia & Greenville R. Co., 21 S. C. 541, 548, 53 Am. Rep. 691, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Aldrich, J., Aiken, April, 1880.

This was an action by Thomas J. Lasure against the Graniteville Manufacturing Company, commenced November 21st, 1877. The complaint demanded $10,000 damages for injuries sustained in a fall; and the proof was that plaintiff's arm was broken, wrist dislocated, hip injured and slightly dislocated, and his face cut from forehead to chin.

The charge of the judge to the jury was as follows:

You will bear in mind that this case is not to be determined by the rule which applies to common carriers. When a railroad or steamboat company, or a stage coach, or any other conveyance for public travel, undertakes to carry passengers for hire, their contract is they will carry them safely, and they are liable in damages for any injury that may be received, except the same may be from the act of God or the public enemy. Hence, if a corporation undertakes to carry you or your goods from one place to another, for hire, it is liable for any injury to the person or loss of goods, whether it be from unavoidable accident or carelessness. But such is not the rule, as applied to employes in a factory or a railroad, or in any other industrial occupation. In such case, when a man engages to work for wages, he takes a *certain amount of risks himself, and if an injury is received in the business in which he engages, the employer, be it railroad, factory or steamboat company, is not liable in damages unless it be made to appear clearly to you that the injury so received is the result of carelessness or negligence on the part of the employer.

There can be no doubt that this plaintiff has been injured, and seriously injured. His face was cut open, his arm broken, and his hip injured. He has suffered great bodily pain and anxiety; been confined to his bed for weeks, prevented from the labor by which he made a sustenance, and a burden to his family and friends. Nay, more, he is still suffering from the injuries received at the time of the accident. If all this be the consequence of negligence or wanton carelessness on the part of the defendant, the Graniteville Company, they are liable in damages, and should be made to pay the penalty for their neglect. On the other hand, however, if this be one of the risks which every operative takes when he engages in the business of a factory, however great may be his injury, however painful his suffering, however permanent his hurt, the company is not liable, because it is one of the accidents which may or may not occur, and of which he takes the risk for hire.

So that the first question presented to you is: Was the defendant guilty of carelessness or negligence which occasioned the injury, the pain, the anxiety and the loss of time of which the plaintiff complains? The law makes you the sole judges of that question. I cannot assist you. In considering it, you will ask: Was this structure safe, or was it carelessly constructed? Was it kept in good repairs by ordinary diligence? Did the defendant show that solicitude and concern for the safety of the persons in their employment which men of ordinary prudence exhibit in the conduct of their affairs? Was it one of those accidents that might have happened under the exercise of ordinary prudence, or was it the result of carelessness and neglect? If the former, the company is not liable, because that was one of the risks the plaintiff took when he contracted to receive wages for his labors. If the latter, the company is liable, because the undertaking of the plaintiff was to work for wages, proected *by the ordinary diligence which prudent men exercise in the conduct of their affairs. These are questions for you, and as you resolve them, so will be your verdict.

Another question for your serious consideration is: Did the plaintiff contribute to this accident by his own negligence, or by his violation of the rules of the company? And in this connection you will consider what was the rule of the company whose servant he was. Was it a rule when a bale fell off the truck the employe was to send for the officer who had the road in charge? Did he throw that bale of cotton with a sudden jerk, or did he lower it easily on his truck? Would the road have broken if the plaintiff had not thrown down the bale? Now, if he violated the rules of the company or recklessly threw his bale from the edge to the side on the truck or the platform, so as to occasion a sudden jar, which broke the support of the shoulder resting on the sill of the factory, did he not contribute to the accident? If so, the company is not liable, because he was deficient in that prudence which men ordinarily display in the exercise of their business.

These are questions for your solution. As you solve them, so will be your verdict. While these great enterprises are to be held to the strictest responsibility, and made to pay for any damage resulting from their carelessness or negligence, yet they are not to be bled and stripped of their earnings because they are rich. By united capital they do that which individual capital cannot accomplish. They increase the general wealth of the State, which permeates society and adds to the industrial labor of the county. They employ, at liberal wages, hundreds of our people, men, women, and children; furnish them with comfortable houses, good schools for the education of the rising generation, and help support the government by taxation. Hence you are to decide the case on the law and the evidence, not considering the poverty of the plaintiff or the wealth of the defendant. But while these corporations are dispensing these blessings, adding to the wealth of the State and increasing the comfort and happiness of the people, they must protect those whom they employ, and whenever one of their employes is *injured because of their carelessness or negligence, they are liable.

You are not to find a verdict because the plaintiff is a poor man and the defendant a rich corporation, but according to truth and justice. Remember this court is no respecter of persons—each case must be tried by the law and evidence applicable thereto. In all such cases there is a great deal of vociferation and earnest declamation about rich corporations and poor men, hard working laborers. You have nothing to do with this. Render your verdict as between man and man. A corporation is simply the aggregation of individuals. In that union you will find capitalists, men of moderate means and widows and orphans. These aggregated make the corporation, and all of these—the capitalist, the man of moderate means and the widow and orphan—are as much entitled to your consideration and sympathy as the plaintiff. So, gentlemen, you will dismiss from your minds, “bloated corporations, wealth, large dividends, poor laborers,” and decide this case as between man and man, by the law and the evidence.

Messrs. W. T. Gary, G. W. Croft, for plaintiff.

Messrs. Henderson Bros., contra.

November 27th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action was brought by the plaintiff, who was a laborer in the employment of the defendant, a company carrying on a cotton factory, to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of the alleged negligence of the company. It appears that the plaintiff was engaged in removing cotton bales from the warehouse to the mill of the company, by rolling them on a truck over an elevated tramway between the two buildings, and, while so doing, the tramway gave way by reason of the splitting or breaking of some of the timbers, which supported the track, and the plaintiff fell and sustained the injuries for which the action was brought. Both parties presented to the Circuit judge sundry requests to charge, which *were neither specifically refused or granted, and the case was submitted to the jury under a charge to which no exception was taken by either party. The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500, and judgment being entered thereon, both parties have appealed, alleging, as error, the refusal or neglect of the Circuit judge to charge the several propositions as requested by them respectively.

It will not be necessary to consider the merits of the several propositions contained in the numerous requests submitted by the plaintiff, for every one of them relate solely to the plaintiff's right to recover, and none of them relate to the question of the amount which he was entitled to recover, or could in any way affect the question of the measure of his damages. Now, as the plaintiff has recovered, his only possible ground of complaint is as to the amount of his recovery, and we cannot conceive how he could be prejudiced by the refusal or omission to charge any proposition of law, however correct it might be, affecting only his right to recover, and not affecting the question of the measure of his damages. In cases of this kind there are always two questions, first, whether the plaintiff has made a case entitling him to recover any damages, and if so, second, what is the proper measure of his damages. The two questions are entirely distinct and different, and depend upon different principles. The plaintiff having established his right to recover, as is conclusively demonstrated by the verdict in his favor, any error on the part of the Circuit judge, either of commission or omission, in submitting the first question to the jury, becomes wholly immaterial, and need not, therefore, be considered. The appeal on the part of the plaintiff cannot, therefore, be sustained.

The defendant also appeals upon five grounds. The first and fifth were very properly abandoned, as it is manifest that they could not be sustained.

The second ground of appeal alleges that the Circuit judge erred in not charging the fourth request submitted by the defendant, which is in these words: “That even if the jury find there was a defect in the tramway known to the company, yet if they find that the plaintiff also knew of said defect, or by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence could have known of it, and *still, voluntarily, continued in the employment of the company, he cannot recover, and the verdict must be for the defendant.” We think it very clear that the proposition, or rather propositions (for there are two of them), contained in this request, are not well founded. It does not follow necessarily that a servant is guilty of contributory negligence because he remains in the service of his master after he has knowledge of defect in the machinery or appliances with which he is furnished to perform his work, but it is a question of fact for the jury to determine under all the circumstances of each particular case. Wood on Master and Servant, § 357, citing Snow v. Housatonic Railroad Company, 8 Allen, 441.

It was, therefore, no error to refuse to charge, as matter of law, that if the plaintiff knew of the defect in the tramway, and still continued in the employment of the company, he could not recover. The other proposition involved in the request—that if the plaintiff could, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have known of the defect, and still, voluntarily, continued in the service of defendant, he could not recover—cannot be sustained, not only for the reason above stated, which applies with equal force to both propositions, but also because it presupposes a duty upon the part of the servant to exercise due care and diligence, to ascertain whether the machinery or appliances furnished him to work with are kept in proper repair, whereas this is the duty of the master and not of the servant.

The third and fourth grounds of appeal, involving practically the same principles of law, will be considered together. They are based upon a refusal or neglect to charge the propositions contained in the fifth and sixth requests submitted by the defendant, which are in these words: 5. "That if the jury find that the company constructed the tramway with due skill and caution, and employed competent and reliable persons to superintend their work, then they have performed all their duty as employers to their employé, the plaintiff, and he cannot recover." 6. "That even if the jury find there was a defect in the tramway, caused by the negligence of those employés who had charge of it, yet the plaintiff cannot recover, because the negligence which *caused the misfortune is not that of the company, but of fellow employés, working under the same common head."

The principles involved in these requests have been considered and passed upon in the decision just filed in the case of Gunter v. The Graniteville Manufacturing Company, ante p. 262 [44 Am. Rep. 573], and, therefore, we need not repeat here what was said in that case upon these points. It was there determined that it is not only the duty of the master to provide, in the first instance, safe and suitable machinery and other appliances necessary to enable his operatives to do the work for which they are employed, but that it is equally his duty to see that such machinery and appliances are kept in proper repair, and that for any negligence in the performance of either of these duties, from which an injury results to one of the operatives, the master is liable, even though these duties may have been entrusted by the master to a subordinate officer or agent, by whatever name he may be called, and without regard to the rank of such subordinate. Hence, if an injury is sustained by a servant by reason of the negligence of a mechanic, employed to keep the machinery or other appliances in proper repair, the master is liable, notwithstanding the fact that the master may have exercised due care in the selection of the agent to whom such duty is entrusted, because such duty is a duty of the master, and whether performed in person or by an agent, any negligence in the performance of it is the negligence of the master. It follows, therefore, that there was no error in refusing to charge the propositions contained in either of these requests.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Fraser, J., Edgefield, October, 1880.

Action by the First National Bank of Charleston, endorsee, against M. W. Gary, endorser, commenced in April, 1879. The charge of the judge to the jury is not stated in the brief—only the plaintiff's requests to charge. Of these, five in number, only the two following are material to the points considered by this court:

1. "That the instrument sued upon in this action is a negotiable instrument, and if the defendant, for value, wrote his name upon the back of said instrument, then said defendant became liable as endorser, unless said endorsement was obtained by the fraud or deceit of the plaintiff.

2. "That the instrument sued upon is a promise to pay a sum, fixed in said instrument, without regard to the sale of the securities mentioned in said instrument; that the instrument imposed no obligation upon the holder of the same to sell said securities before demanding and requiring payment of said instrument from the maker or indorser."

These requests were both refused, and after verdict for defendant and judgment thereon, plaintiff appealed to this court, alleging error, inter alia, in refusing the above-stated requests.

It is too heavily burdened for a promissory note. The rule laid down in 1 Dan. Neg. Inst., § 59, that a superadded agreement, which only facilitates the means of collection, does not destroy the negotiability of the instrument, is not sustained by the South Carolina decisions, supra.

November 27th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action brought by the plaintiff, as endorsee, against M. W. Gary, as endorser, of a paper, of which the following is a copy:

"$886. Charleston, S. C., July 31st, 1877.

"On the first of November, 1877, I promise to pay to M. W. *maturity of this note, or at any time thereafter, at public or private sale, at his discretion, without advertising the same, and to apply so much of the proceeds of said security to the payment of this note, as may be necessary to pay the same, with all interest due thereon, and also the payment of all expenses attending the sale of the said security. If the net proceeds of the said security shall not cover the amount due on this note, I hold myself bound to pay the balance forthwith, after such sale, with interest, at the rate of one per cent. per month.

(Signed) "W. J. Magrath, "Pres't Greenville and Columbia R. R. Co."

(Endorsed) "M. W. Gary."

The fundamental and controlling question made by this appeal is, whether the paper sued on is a negotiable instrument? The Circuit judge held that it was not, and the appellant alleges that there was error in so holding. The first part of the paper, down to the first period, is nothing more nor less than a note, with a recital of the fact that certain railroad coupons had been deposited with the payee as collateral security for the payment of the amount which the maker promised to pay. It is an absolute promise to pay a certain sum of money, at a certain time, to a certain person therein named, or his order. There is nothing conditional or uncertain about it, and it therefore comes up, fully, to the definition of a promissory note, (Story Prom. N., § 1, and 1 Dan. Neg. Inst., § 28, et seq.) and being payable to the payee or order, and being open—that is, unsealed, it is negotiable.

The only remaining inquiry, so far as this part of the paper is concerned, is whether the additional words, containing a mere recital of the fact that the payment of the sum promised has been secured by certain specified security, deprives it of its character as a negotiable instrument. It will be observed that these additional words constitute no additional agreement, nor do they in any way qualify, or render doubtful or uncertain, the preceding absolute promise to pay. They do not incorporate into the paper any terms which can, by any possibility, destroy or render uncertain any of the essential elements which are necessary to *make up a negotiable note. They are a mere recital of a fact which can have no influence upon the promise to pay, and we are unable to see any reason why the addition of such words should affect the negotiability of the instrument. Such, too, seems to be the result of the authorities. Wise v. Charlton, 4 Ad. & E. 786; Fancourt v. Thorn, 9 Ad. & E. (N. S.) 312; Towne v. Rice, 122 Mass. 67.

The next inquiry is whether the remainder of the paper, by which the maker gives to the payee authority to sell the collaterals in case the sum promised is not paid at maturity, and apply the proceeds of such sale to the payment of the amount due as well as to the expenses of such sale, and an obligation to pay whatever balance may be due, after the net proceeds of the sale are so applied, deprives the paper of its negotiability. Here, too, it will be observed that these additional words cannot in any way affect the terms of the original promise, so as to import into it any element of uncertainty, either as to the amount to be paid, the time of payment, the person to whom payment is to be made, or the medium of payment. In fact, these words import nothing more than an agreement which the law would imply from the fact that collaterals had been deposited with the payee to secure the amount promised, and may be regarded as surplusage, except, perhaps, the authority to sell the collaterals "without advertising," and this, so far from clogging, or in any way impeding, the payee in the enforcement of his rights, would have an exactly contrary effect, and would tend to render more certain the payment of the note at maturity, which is one of the things which impart to a negotiable paper its peculiar value. We do not perceive, therefore, how these additional words can deprive the paper in question of its negotiable character.

This view is supported by the weight of authority. In Story Prom. N., § 17 (8th Ed.), it is said: "An instrument in terms and form a negotiable promissory note does not lose that character, because it recites that the maker has deposited collateral security for its payment, which he agrees may be sold in a certain manner specified, and that he would pay the balance." In 1 Dan. Neg. Inst., § 59, that eminent author, while admitting the general rule to be that a negotiabile note must be for the payment of money only, and "if any other agreement of a different character be engrafted upon it, it becomes a special contract clogged and involved with other matters, and has been deemed to lose thereby its character as a commercial instrument," adds: "But at the present time, we think, that this general rule is subject to the qualification, that if the superadded agreement do not impair the certainty of the promise to pay the certain amount named, but only facilitates the means of its collection, it does not, in any degree, destroy the negotiability of the instrument." And in the succeeding sections he cites the cases in which such superadded agreements, as for example, authority to confess judgment, waiver of stay and exemption laws, or stipulations to pay collection fees, have been held not to impair the negotiability of the paper.

It seems to us, however, that, while agreements authorizing a confession of judgment, or a waiver of stay and exemption laws, do come strictly within the qualification stated, inasmuch as such agreements cannot in any way affect the certainty of the promise to pay, and only facilitate the collection of the amount promised, the same cannot be said of a stipulation to pay collection fees, for that does import into the contract an element of uncertainty as to the amount which the maker promises to pay, and ought, therefore, to deprive the paper of its character as a negotiable instrument. Upon the same principle a power of attorney to sell collaterals may be incorporated in a note without impairing its negotiability, even though it may contain a waiver of the necessity for advertising such sale (as in the case now before the court), because such superadded agreement does not in any way impair the certainty of the amount to be paid, and only facilitates its collection.

In Zimmerman v. Anderson, 67 Pa. St. 424, a paper containing a promise to pay a certain sum of money, at a specified time, to a person therein named or order, to which was added these words: "Waiving the right of appeal and of all valuation, appraisement, stay and exemption laws," was held to be negotiable. Read, J., in answer to the argument that these additional words rendered the paper unnegotiable, said: "They do not contain any condition or contingency, but after the note *falls due, and is unpaid, and the maker is sued, facilitate the collection by waiving certain rights which he might exercise to delay or impede it. Instead of clogging its negotiability, it adds to it, and gives additional value to the note." These remarks apply with equal force to the waiver of the necessity for advertising the sale of the collaterals, in the case now before the court.

To the same effect are the remarks of Sharswood, J., in Woods v. North, 84 Pa. St. 407 (24 Am. Rep. 201), where, while holding that the insertion of an agreement to pay collection fees, if not paid when due, rendered the note unnegotiable because it imported into the contract an element of uncertainty as to the amount to be paid, said: "Interest and costs of protest after non-payment at maturity are necessary legal incidents of the contract, and the insertion of them in the body of the note would not affect its negotiability. Neither does a clause waiving exemption, for that in no way touches the simplicity and certainty of the paper." See also Arnold v. Rock River Valley Union R. R. Co., 5 Duer 207; Osborn v. Hawley, 19 Ohio 130.

The cases of Wallace v. Dyson, 1 Speers 127, in which the paper sued on was an obligation for the hire of slaves, and contained, also, a stipulation "to furnish clothing, pay taxes, not to pay physicians' bills," &c.; Barnes v. Gorman, 9 Rich. 297, in which the paper was of like character; and Read v. McNulty, 12 Rich. 445 [78 Am. Dec. 467], in which the promise to pay so much money "with exchange on New York," are clearly distinguishable from the case now under consideration; for in each of those cases the superadded agreement imported an element of uncertainty into the contract as to the amount to be paid, while here, as we have seen, the additional words relied upon do not, in any way, affect any of the certainties required in a negotiable note. We are of opinion, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in charging the jury that the paper sued on was not a negotiable note.

Under this view of the case the other questions presented by the grounds of appeal cannot fairly arise, and need not, therefore, be considered. The question as to the legal effect of an endorsement in blank by the payee of a negotiable note, and whether it is competent by parol evidence to vary the contract which the law implies from such endorsement, though discussed *in the argument here, does not seem to be raised by any of the grounds of appeal, and, therefore, is not properly before us. The Circuit judge having held that the paper in question was not negotiable, such a question was never reached in the Circuit Court, and, consequently, there was no ruling upon it from which there could be an appeal. But even if it had been raised, we suppose the law upon that subject is too well settled to require any extended notice at our hands; that an endorsement, in blank, of a negotiable note renders the endorser liable to every subsequent holder, and, in the absence of allegation and proof of fraud or mistake, such liability cannot be discharged or limited by parol evidence.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Money, necessary for the proper and successful management of a railroad, borrowed by the officers of the road while acting as receivers under an order of court, giving them power "to continue in the possession and management of the property," should be repaid out of the fund in court, realized from the income of the road while in the receiver's hands.

[3. Receivers ⇨155; Set-Off and Counterclaim ⇨34, 41.]

Such loan having been secured by a deposit of bonds belonging to the railroad company, which bonds were afterwards sold to the credit of the loan, and the payee, under a call for creditors, having presented his petition for the payment of the balance out of the receiver's fund, other creditors could not assert, by way of counter-claim to this petition, the right to have the hypothecated bonds surrendered to the court or their value accounted for.

4. Fifty-four Bond Case, 15 S. C. 304, and Ex parte Brown and Wife, Id. 531, recognized and followed.

*The facts necessary to a proper understanding of this case will be found stated in the opinion. The orders appointing receivers need not be given, as they will be found in the Fifty-four Bond Case, 15 S. C. 304, in Ex parte Benson & Co., ante 38 [44 Am. Rep. 564], and in other cases.

The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

The first question is as to the validity of petitioner's claim. It is not necessary for me to state again my reasons for holding that there is nothing in the language of Judge Melton's order, or of any ruling of the Supreme Court, to warrant the inference which has been pressed upon me, that the president and board of directors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company had, under that order, the power to conduct and carry on the business of the company "in like manner as they have heretofore done." The words in the order are "under the order and subject to this court." These are words of large signification, but they convey the powers and prescribe the duties of a railway receiver, and no more. The business of the company was that of a common carrier of freight and passengers. It was only a privilege to make contracts for the loan of money. Whatever was necessary for the business of the company was within the range of their powers and duties. "All outlays made by the receivers in good faith in the ordinary course, with a view to advance and promote the business of the road and to render it profitable and successful, are fairly within the line of discretion, which is necessarily allowed to a receiver entrusted with the management of a railroad in his hands." Cowdrey v. The R. R. Co., 1 Woods 331 [Fed. Cas. No. 3,293].

If it were clearly shown that money was borrowed to carry on the operations of the road as a common carrier, I would not say that it ought not to be repaid out of the fund. Before this is done, however, the court ought to have proper evidence that it was necessary for this purpose, and if not, parties must look to the personal responsibility of the receiver. If money-lenders are not satisfied with this personal responsibility, it is an easy matter to wait until an order of the court can be obtained. All other trustees borrow money for the use of the trust-estate in the absence of express power, only on their own personal respon*sibility, and can be re-imbursed after it has been shown to have been properly expended. I see no reason to apply a different rule to receivers.

I cannot be controlled in this matter by the testimony of a very intelligent and experienced witness who says that all the money borrowed was "necessary." The facts do not bear him out. We find these receivers, in disregard to orders of the court, for four years paying interest on the whole bonded debt—buying and selling bonds of this company—of the Laurens Railroad Company, of the Blue Ridge Railroad Company, making an extension to connect with the Air Line railway, paying to a debt of T. Bush, for which they were in no way responsible, about $15,000, and on the debt of H. H. Kimpton, an unsecured debt contracted before the receivership, over $27,000.

The order of Judge Melton gave to the receivers no power to borrow money, so that it must be repaid as a mere matter of contract, and I do not think it was necessary or proper to do so in this case. If the petitioner dealt with the receivers with a view to their character as receivers and not as officers of the company, then petitioner must have known that he was dealing with the funds, which were under the control of this court, and which ought not to have been purchased or sold without its sanction. I doubt if petitioner ever looked to the receiver's fund for payment, much less to a claim to be superior to bondholders who held liens. I do not think, therefore, that there is any hardship to petitioner in this view, and the claim ought not to be allowed.

With regard to the counter-claim, I have nothing to add to the views expressed in a judgment to be filed at the same time with this in Ex parte George W. Williams, Treasurer [see next case, post]. If it were necessary to decide the question, I would be inclined to the opinion that such a counter-claim could not be set up in this form of proceeding. I do not see how a counter-claim, to be enforced against the person of the petitioner, can be set up against a mere application to be paid out of a fund in court. In the view of this case, which I have presented in Ex parte Williams, I do not think that there is any ground for this counter-claim in any form of action, and it ought not to be *allowed. There is no theory of which I am aware on which it could be allowed which would not re-open all the issues between the bondholders in this case, and, perhaps, lead to new and unexpected litigation.

It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged, that the petition and counter-claim be dismissed.

From this decree both parties appealed. Petitioner's exceptions were as follows:

1. Because his Honor erred in holding that the order of Judge Melton conveyed the powers and prescribed the duties of a railway receiver, and no more; whereas his Honor should have held that the powers conveyed by said order were more extended, and the duties imposed thereby more general than those usually conferred and imposed upon railway receivers.

2. Because his Honor erred in holding that the loan set forth in the said petition was unnecessary, and in this connection disregarded the uncontradicted testimony of the witness Manson, who proved that all loans made were necessary to the proper conduct and management of the business of the road.

3. Because his Honor erred in deciding that the order of Judge Melton conferred upon the president and directors, acting as receivers, no power to borrow money.

4. Because his Honor erred in not allowing the claim, and in ordering and adjudging that the petition be dismissed.

The exceptions of Clyde et al. were as follows:

1. That his Honor having decided that the receiver had no right or authority to borrow money, it followed, necessarily, that the receiver had no right or authority to pledge the assets of the road for money so borrowed, and his Honor should have held that the assets so pledged were illegally pledged.

2. That his Honor, having held that if the petitioner dealt with the receiver, "he must have known that he was dealing with the funds which were under the control of this court, and which ought not to have been purchased and sold without its sanction," should have further held that the funds or assets acquired by the petitioner, without the sanction of the court, *were illegally acquired, and that petitioner thereby became liable to restore them, or to account to the court for their value.

3. That it was proved that the president of the Carolina Bank was a director of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, and one of the receivers appointed by the order of Judge Melton, and was annually re-elected director until his death, in 1880, and that his Honor should have held that the bank had full notice that it was dealing with the receiver, and obtaining assets which were under the control of the court.

4. That his Honor erred in holding that the doctrine of lis pendens applied to this case. That the question is not whether these particular bonds pledged carried notice with them, but is whether one dealing with a trustee, a receiver, and acquiring from him trust property, which he had no right to part with, except by order of court, can hold such property as against the cestui que trust.

5. That his Honor having held that the receiver had no authority to borrow the money, and that the petitioner, dealing with the receiver, was dealing with funds which were under the control of the court, and could not be purchased or sold without its sanction, by the dismissal of the counter-claim, leaves the petitioner in possession of assets illegally acquired from a trustee; and to the extent of the amount realized by the sale of the bonds, the petitioner profits by his illegal action, and the cestui que trust loses.

6. That the first part of the decree declares the transaction illegal, while the latter part gives to petitioner good title to the property illegally acquired; whereas it is respectfully submitted that petitioner should have been decreed to account for the assets or their value.

Messrs. Melton, Clark & Muller, for petitioner.

Mr. James Conner, contra.

November 27th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. For the proper understanding of the questions involved in this case, it will only be *necessary to state the facts connected with the claim of the petitioner, the Carolina National Bank. In July, 1872, by an order of the court in the above causes, the property of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company was placed in the possession and under the management of the president and directors of said company, who were thereby directed to conduct and carry on the business of said company, subject to the orders of the court. It has since been decided by this court that this order constituted the president and directors receivers. Under this order, the road was operated from its date in July, 1872, to November, 1878. During this time the president and directors borrowed certain moneys from the petitioner which were used in the conduct and management of the business of the company.

The amount thus borrowed, after several renewals and payments, was finally reduced, on April 13th, 1877, to $20,000, evidenced by one note for that sum, which was renewed from that date to July 13th, 1878, the date of the last renewal. To secure the payment of this money, the president and directors deposited with the petitioner two hundred and sixty-eight bonds of the said Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company for $500 each. These bonds were sold by the petitioner on March 13th, 1880, for $13,400, the proceeds being applied to the note. The balance the petitioner seeks in this proceeding to establish against the fund in court, arising from the annual income of the road while in the hands of the receiver, or from the proceeds of the sale thereof.

Clyde, Logan and Bryan, who were holders of a large amount of the second mortgage bonds of the company, and upon whom the petition was served, answered, resisting the petition upon the ground that the receivers had no right to borrow money, nor the president to make the note in question. They also asserted the right by way of counter-claim, to have the bonds hypothecated to the petitioner surrendered to the court, or their value accounted for by the petitioner for the benefit of the second mortgage bondholders.

To this counter-claim the petitioner replied, and the case came to a hearing before Judge Fraser, who dismissed both the petition and the counter-claim. From this decreed, both the petitioner *and the defendants, Clyde, Logan and Bryan, have appealed. The appeal of the petitioner involves, mainly, a question of fact, to wit, whether the loan contracted by the president and directors, and which was the basis of petitioner's claim, was necessary to the proper conduct of the road under their charge as receivers.

Without attempting to define the exact powers with which the receivers in the case were invested by the order of June, 1872, it is sufficient to say, in the language of Cowdrey v. The Railroad Company, 1 Wood 336 [Fed. Cas. No. 3,293], and quoted in the decree of Judge Fraser, "that all outlays made by the receivers in good faith in the ordinary course, with a view to advance and promote the business of the road, and to render it profitable and successful, are purely within the line of discretion which is necessarily allowed a receiver entrusted with the management of a railroad in his hands." This, no doubt, is the general rule, and no one who is at all familiar with the history of the Greenville Railroad since June, 1872, when the order of Judge Melton was passed, by which the president and directors were converted into receivers, and the various decisions of this court on the transactions of these receivers and the liability of the funds in their hands to claimants, rendered since 1872, can fail to see that this general rule has not been, in the least, narrowed or contracted in its application to their management. On the contrary, if not enlarged, it has been enforced with a most liberal construction. This was, no doubt, due to the anomalous character of the order and the necessities which prompted it, and for the accomplishment of which, no doubt, it was passed. See Fifty-four Bond Case, 15 S. C. 304; Ex parte Brown and Wife, Ib. 531; also the recent case of Ex parte Benson & Co., ante 38 [44 Am. Rep. 564].

While this court clearly held in the two former cases, that this order constituted the president and directors receivers, yet a distinction was drawn, especially in the case of Ex parte Brown, p. 531, by Judge Fraser, as to their powers, and the powers of General Conner, who was subsequently distinctly and in terms appointed receiver, displacing the president and directors. This distinction grew out of the different language employed in the two appointments. In the first, the president and directors were *ordered to continue in the possession and management of the property, and to make report, that proper orders may be made. Under the latter, General Conner was appointed receiver eo nomine, "and he was required to demand and receive possession of all of the property of the company, to keep and preserve the same subject to the control, order and direction of the court, with power and authority to manage and operate the said railroad, to receive and disburse the income, the disbursements to be confined to the expense of running the road."

Whatever may be the law applicable to receivers generally, we think that the case of Ex parte Brown and Wife, and the Fifty-four Bond Case, have modified that law as to these receivers; or, in other words, the president and directors were appointed under a peculiar order, which order has been construed by this court in the two cases above referred to, and the law in reference to them is found in said cases. Under this view, and governed by these cases, we repeat that the only question before Judge Fraser was whether the borrowing of the money was necessary to the proper and successful management of the road. Judge Fraser seems so to have understood the case, where he says: "If it were clearly shown that money was borrowed, to carry on the road as a common carrier, I would not say that it ought not to be repaid out of the fund. Before this can be done, however, the court ought to have proper evidence that it was necessary for this purpose, and if not, the parties must look to the personal responsibility of the receiver."

In applying this principle, we think that Judge Fraser erred in his finding when he declined to be controlled by the testimony of Mr. Manson on the subject of the necessity of this loan. This witness had been in charge of the accounting and treasury department of the company since 1872; was treasurer from 1875 to 1878, when General Conner was appointed receiver; was entirely familiar with its financial condition; was a very intelligent and experienced witness, and was the only witness on this subject. He testified that when money was borrowed, there was necessity for borrowing, and this he states without qualification; and the explanations which he gave as to the condition of the road seem to sustain him.

*The president and directors were receivers at the instance of the bondholders. These bondholders stood by and suffered this road to be operated under the order of June, 1872, for over six years, with no intimation that the rigid doctrine, now contended for as to the duties and powers of receivers, should be applied to the case, and we think it too late, now, for such claim. The road certainly received the benefit of this money, and it would be highly inequitable to throw the lender upon the general responsibility of the receiver—inequitable both to the lender and to the receivers, and this should not be done unless imperatively demanded by the legal principles involved. The manifest preponderance of the testimony, in our judgment, is against the finding of fact by the Circuit judge, as to the necessity of the loan in question by the petitioner to the receivers, and this finding is therefore reversed.

As to the counter-claim, we concur with the Circuit judge in dismissing it. "A counter-claim must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action and arising out of one of the two following causes of action: 1. A cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action. 2. In an action arising in contract, any other cause of action arising also on contract, and existing at the commencement of the action." Code, § 173.

Tested by this provision of the code, we do not find a single element of a counter-claim in the matter attempted to be set up here by Clyde, Logan and Bryan. In the first place, no separate judgment could be rendered in their favor against the petitioner for the bonds in question, even if the petitioner could be held liable for these bonds. If these bonds were, in fact, trust property, which the petitioner improperly obtained from the trustee, he might, by a proper proceeding, be made to account to that estate for their value, subject to distribution under the order of the court among the cestuis que trust; but we do not see how, under this petition, Clyde, Logan and Bryan could obtain a judgment in their behalf for the value of these bonds. In fact, they do not ask this; they claim that the bonds in question *shall be delivered to the master, or their value paid to the master. This at once shows that the matter set up is not a counter-claim, and this is further evident from the fact that the claim does not fall under either of the two classes mentioned in the code above as constituting a counter-claim.

It is neither a claim arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim; nor does it arise on contract existing in favor of Clyde, Logan and Bryan at the commencement of the action. If it is a valid claim at all, it arises from an equity principle established and to be enforced through the equity jurisdiction of the court. Its foundation, if any, is that wholesome equity doctrine which holds a party responsible for trust property purchased with a knowledge of the trust and in violation of the rights of the cestuis que trust. Here a petition was filed, under a call for creditors, to establish a note against an insolvent company, so as to receive payment out of the funds in court; another creditor resists this debt and sets up, by way of counter-claim, the fact that the petitioner has diverted a portion of the trust fund from its proper destination, and demands that he shall return this property to the trust-estate. If this demand is a just one, and well founded, there is a remedy; but it would be stretching the doctrine of counter-claim beyond all precedent to permit this question to be adjudged and determined under such a proceeding.

We think that the claim of the petitioner should be established against the income fund in the hands of the court, and that the counter-claim should be dismissed. It is the judgment of this court that the decree below be affirmed as to the counter-claim, and reversed as to the claim of the petitioner, and that the case be remanded to be enforced according to the principles herein announced.

18 S. C. *299

*Ex parte WILLIAMS. GIBBES v. GREENVILLE AND COLUMBIA R. R. COMPANY. STATE, ex relatione ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. SAME.

[Sales  $\S$  234.]

A purchaser, on new and ample consideration, of bonds constituting a part of the assets of a railroad company in the hands of a receiver, without knowledge or notice of the trust, is not liable to the creditors of the corporation for the value of the bonds.

Before Fraser, J., Richland, December, 1881.

George W. Williams, as treasurer of a syndicate formed to assist the South Carolina Railroad Company, received from that company as collateral security for advances made and to be made, certain securities, including two notes given by the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company to the South Carolina Railroad Company, secured by a deposit of mortgage bonds of the former company, which bonds passed to Williams, treasurer, with the notes they were intended to secure. One of these notes was for $51,432, secured by 103 Greenville and Columbia Railroad second mortgage bonds, of $500 each, dated December 30th, 1876; and the other of the same date, was for $135,818.74, secured by 543 like bonds.

All of these bonds were, after the maturity of the notes, sold by the syndicate, and G. W. Williams, as their treasurer, presented two petitions in this cause, asking in each for the payment of the balance due on the notes, respectively, out of the receiver's fund, inasmuch as the notes were given for the necessary expenses of the road while in the hands of the receivers appointed by Judge Melton's order of June 18th, 1872. The petition as to the note for $51,432, was disposed of by the opinion of this court refusing it, to be found reported as Ex parte Williams, 17 S. C. 396.

This case is the petition as to the note for

$135,818.74, which *was also refused by the Circuit decree in this cause, and from such refusal no appeal was taken. But in answer to this petition, Clyde et al., holders of second mortgage bonds (and who as such would receive all the funds in the cause not absorbed by claims of higher rank) interposed as a counter-claim that the pledge of the bonds to the two notes above described was illegal, and that G. W. Williams, treasurer, should be decreed to account for the said collaterals or their value.

Judge Fraser also dismissed the counter-claim. So much of his decree as relates to this counter-claim was as follows:

The only question then left for my consideration is that of the counter-claim set up by W. P. Clyde and others, that the petitioner, George W. Williams, treasurer, should be held to account for the 543 and 103 second mortgage bonds above referred to, on the ground, as I understand it, that they were assets in the hands of the receivers, who sold them without authority, and that of this the petitioner was bound to take notice, so that in his hands the bonds were effected with the trusts under which the receivers held them. The counter-claim is filed by William P. Clyde, Thomas M. Logan and Joseph Bryan, on behalf of themselves and other holders of second mortgage bonds, who claim to be entitled to the net proceeds of the sale and income in the hands of the master. These are the same parties who bought these bonds from the petitioner.

The first provision of Judge Melton's order was one which enjoined all creditors from commencing or prosecuting any suits against the corporation, or enforcing judgments already obtained by execution against the property. The second provision was one which put the property in the hands of the president and directors, and substituted the "order" and direction "of the court" for the will of the stockholders.

The corporation, whose will is expressed only by the stockholders, were displaced by the order, and President Magrath, in his annual report for the fiscal year ending December 31st, 1872, says: "Under the operation of the orders growing out of these proceedings no suits could be instituted, and no payments made, except for the absolutely necessary wants of the road." If this clear and correct view of their powers and duties had not been lost sight of by the *president and directors, many of the embarrassing questions which have arisen in this administration would have been avoided.

If any other orders of the court were necessary before they assumed any conduct of the business, then not one train could have moved from the depot, as no order was made except the one referred to, "to continue to conduct and carry on the business of the said company." The true conception of the scope of this order, in my view, is that every act of the president and directors was subject to the supervision and control of the court, and that to them, as to all receivers, necessary expenditures for labor and material would, as a matter of course, be allowed; but when they went beyond this to make permanent improvements and changes, speculative contracts for rebates, and the purchase and sale of bonds, they, and all who dealt with them, should have understood that their contracts might not meet the approval of the court. I find neither in the order itself or in any decision or dictum of the court any warrant for that unlimited power claimed in some quarters, and expressed by the words "in like manner as they have heretofore done."

We must, therefore, look to other considerations to determine whether this is a valid counter-claim. The objection to the mode in which this counter-claim is presented has been waived at the hearing, and we must look to its merits. The peculiar order of Judge Melton was perhaps the best which could have been made for the interest of all parties in the abnormal condition of the country at the time it was made. Perhaps it was never intended to interfere with the corporate existence of the railroad company, and there is nothing in the order which does (see High on Receivers, § 397, note 2); and it does not follow that third parties who dealt with the president and directors in a manner lawful with them as officers, and unlawful as receivers, necessarily knew that they dealt in the latter capacity.

To make the petitioner liable to this counter-claim, there must have been something in this transaction which affected him with notice that he was dealing with trust funds. If any third person, entirely unconnected with the company or its business, had been appointed receiver, the mere fact of dealing in this way *might have been sufficient, at least, to put a prudent man on his guard. It does not strike me that the same conclusion would follow here. There is nothing on these bonds which show that they were a part of the assets in the hands of the receivers, either as a part of the corpus or as being an investment temporarily made of the income, and there is no evidence to show that they were not purchased with money, which the evidence shows was from time to time borrowed by the president and directors.

If the old doctrine of lis pendens is any longer applicable, except as to the specific cases prescribed in the code, it will be found that it was only applicable to specific property, which "must be so pointed out by the proceeding as to warn the whole world that they meddle at their peril." See Lewis v. Mew, 1 Strobb. Eq. 183; Edmonds v. Crenshaw, 1 McC. Eq. 261. Cash and negotiable paper not due are not affected in the absence of actual notice. Wade Law of Notice, §§ 371, 372. I do not see why corporation bonds can be subject to a different rule. "There must be something in the pleadings or in the published notice at the time of the purchase to direct the purchaser's attention to the identical thing, which is the subject of the litigation, the notice being purely constructive of the facts contained in the bill and nothing more." Wade on Notice, § 351.

The purchase of these bonds by the South Carolina Railroad Company to secure an antecedent debt may not have had a sufficient consideration to support it, but the purchase by George W. Williams, as treasurer of the syndicate, from the South Carolina Railroad Company, was upon a new and ample consideration, the loan of money or credit, which was sufficient even if the original purchase from the receivers had been tainted with a want of proper consideration.

There is, however, another feature of this case which makes it a very peculiar one. In order to entitle litigants to the protection afforded by the constructive notice of the lis pendens, there must be diligence in the prosecution of the suit. I have found no case where the parties lost that protection unless there was laches in reviving a suit which had abated. 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 125, 126, 127; but I see no good reason why it should not be lost by other conduct of the parties. In this case the order *of Judge Melton was made in 1872, on June 17th, and for over six years, until 1878, November 23d, not one single report was made or called for from the custodians of the property appointed by the court. In the meantime, while enjoying the protection of the court from suits and executions, the lien creditors, including the holders of these second mortgage bonds, received their interest from the surplus income and from borrowed money from July, 1873, to July, 1877. Thus every holder of these bonds was a party to this infringement of the order of the court, and all who purchased these bonds, or any of them, are subject to such equities as existed against these bonds in consequence of these transactions.

I think those who then held these bonds would be estopped from claiming, in the face of these proceedings (for they were all called in as parties to the suit), the protection of the lis pendens as amongst themselves, or in transactions with others who dealt in these bonds, on the faith that they were on the market, free from all entanglements, which might impose on them the character of trust funds, because they may have been at one time in the hands of those who, though officers of the company, were also receivers appointed by the court. I do not see how these receivers had any right to make a payment of interest on second mortgage bonds, to which the blue bonds and the guaranteed bonds were prior, or even the interest on these latter bonds themselves, under the order of Judge Melton.

As to all creditors there was an exhaustive order to prove their claims before the referee, and President Magrath was right when he said to the stockholders that there could be "no payments made" under this order; and when subsequently these lien creditors did accept for four years successively payment of their interest coupons, they opened the way to unsecured creditors to accept, I think with safety, any money or security they could obtain. Clyde and others, who now hold these bonds, I think ought to be bound as privies. 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. p. 653. I find no evidence to contradict the sworn statement of George W. Williams that he never qualified or acted as a director of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, and if he was ever an acting director, I do not see how he can be made to answer to parties or their privies for acting without the authority of the court, who, to say the least, were equally at fault. The rights of parties who were not admitted to this premature division of assets, stand on a different footing, and some of them have been recognized by the court. The counter-claim cannot therefore be allowed.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the petition be dismissed, each party paying his own costs.

Clyde et al. appealed from so much of this decree as dismissed their counter-claim.

Mr. James Conner for appellants.

November 27th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In this case the only question involved is the question of the counter-claim set up in the answer of the defendants. This claim was dismissed by the Circuit judge.

The question involved in the appeal is the same as that raised and decided in the recent case of Ex parte The Carolina National Bank, In re The Attorney-General et al. v. The Greenville and Columbia Railroad Co., ante 289. It is true that, in this case, the objection to the mode in which the counter-claim was presented was waived at the hearing, and the case was heard upon its merits.

The decree of the Circuit judge is based upon the fact that there was not sufficient evidence before him that the petitioner had notice that he was dealing with trust funds when he became possessed of the funds in question. We think this was the turning-point in the case, and we find nothing in the testimony which would authorize this court to overrule the Circuit judge in his conclusions upon this subject. The petitioner never qualified or acted as a director of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad. He purchased these bonds as treasurer of the syndicate from the South Carolina Railroad Company upon a new and ample consideration. There was nothing in the bonds themselves which advertised parties that they constituted part of the assets in the hands of the receiver. And finally, there was no sufficient testimony to bring the case under the operation of the equity doctrine which holds parties responsible for trust funds or property obtained from a trustee with a knowledge of the trust. The counter-claim can have no standing even as a cause of action except upon this doctrine, and the important fact of knowledge by the petitioner of the trust character of the bonds being absent, there is nothing through which this doctrine can be applied and enforced.

TRUMBO v. FINLEY.

[1. Gaming ⚡57.]

A complaint by a common informer, alleging the winning of money by defendants from one A. at a game of faro, on or about a certain day named, states no cause of action and was, therefore, properly dismissed on demurrer, as the only right of action to an informer in such case exists under a statute which authorizes a recovery where the money was won at any time or sitting; that is, at any one time or sitting. To constitute a cause of action under this statute, the money must have been won at one time or at one sitting.

As the complaint stated no cause of action, a demurrer was proper; it was not necessary for defendants to move that plaintiff be required to make his averments more definite and certain.

In the matter of permitting a plaintiff to amend his complaint after demurrer, much must be left to the discretion of the Circuit judge, and the exercise of such discretion, as a rule, will not be disturbed, unless it deprives a party of a substantial legal right.

Upon oral demurrer interposed at the trial in this case, the complaint was properly held not to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the presiding judge refused to permit plaintiff to amend by stating a wholly different and new cause of action. Held, that this order of refusal should not be disturbed.

I think the complaint is defective. The authority of Sir William Blackstone, construing the statute from which this is taken almost verbatim, indicates what a "time" or "sitting" is. He defines both of those terms as not referring to a day or a period of time, in the ordinary use of that term, but to a certain specific point of time—to an occurrence more than to a time. I think that is a reasonable and proper construction of this act. I don't think it has reference to the day, because there might be many of those transactions occurring in a day. The rule is, that wherever an action is brought for a penalty under the statute, that the statute must be strictly construed, and that the strict rules of pleading adopted on the criminal side of the court should be applied wherever it is sought to enforce penal statutes on the civil side of the court.

I confess to some embarrassment growing out of the circumstance that we are now proceeding under a code which allows an almost unlimited right of amendment, and in all other actions I should suppose the court could be extremely liberal in trying to lick into shape the proceedings before the court in the interest of justice. But however offensive to our ideas of morals gambling may be (although good people are divided on that point), and however censurable it may be that men should carry on a business to tempt young men in fiduciary positions to violate their trusts, and in many cases perhaps with the full knowledge all the time that their victims are plundering their employers, yet the plaintiff here has no right to recover one cent from these defendants, except under strict compliance with the terms of the law which makes them liable.

While I would most willingly give the plaintiff a status in this court, especially as a great deal of expense has been incurred, and these circumstances make me very reluctant to dismiss this complaint without ordering an amendment, yet it seems to me that the answer to that has been properly made by the defendants. This is a technical action, and if a party come into court to enforce a penalty by a technical action, not one founded on contract, but upon the strict letter of the law, and misconceive *the mode of presenting his case, I think the court should not hesitate upon general principles. If an exception could be made, I would most willingly make an exception in this case. I would be glad to see the case taken up to the Supreme Court.

It is ordered that the complaint herein be dismissed, because it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Motion of plaintiff to amend refused.

Messrs. T. M. Mordecai, B. H. Rutledge, for appellants.

Messrs. A. D. Cohen, Simonton & Barker, contra.

November 29th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was a quit tam action, brought by Augustus S. Trumbo, the plaintiff, against Thomas Finley and William K. Brown, the defendants, to recover $75,000, being treble damages for $25,000, alleged to have been won by them at a game of faro, from one Bentham R. Caldwell "on or about" certain days named in the different counts. The complaint contained one hundred and ten causes of action, of which the first was as follows:

"For a first cause of action: That on or about the 24th day of July, 1879, in the city of Charleston, within the limits of the county and State aforesaid, one Bentham R. Caldwell did, by playing at faro, lose to Thomas

Finley and William K. Brown, the defendants herein, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, or thereabouts, and did then and there pay over and deliver said sum of money to them the said Thomas Finley and William K. Brown. That the said Bentham R. Caldwell, who, on or about the date aforesaid, at the place aforesaid, and at the game aforesaid, did lose said money, and pay over and deliver said sum of money or thereabouts, to them the said Thomas Finley and William K. Brown, has not within three months then next ensuing from said date, really and bona fide and without covin or collusion, sued for and with effect prosecuted for the said sum of money or thereabouts by him so lost as aforesaid, and the plaintiff herein, Augustus

S. Trumbo, doth sue the said defend*ants, Thomas Finley and William K. Brown, for treble the value thereof, to wit, the sum of forty-five hundred dollars, or thereabouts, and the costs herein, the one moiety thereof to the use of him the said Augustus S. Trumbo, and the other moiety to the use of the poor of Charleston county, in the said State; and for said sum of forty-five hundred dollars he doth pray judgment against the said defendants, in accordance with the provisions of the 79th chapter of the Revised Statutes of the State of South Carolina."

The other causes of action were similar to the above, except that the dates and amounts were different, specific amounts being charged as having been lost "on or about" a certain specified day, each amount exceeding $100. With the exception of the days and amounts, the words were identical. The dates, respectively, are from the said July 24th, 1878, to January 1st, 1879. The answer of the defendants was a general denial of each and every cause of action.

The case came on for trial before Judge Kershaw. After the case was opened and before the testimony was offered, a motion was made to dismiss the complaint on verbal demurrer, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The defendants argued that the complaint should have alleged each loss to have been "at one time or sitting," and that it did not otherwise sufficiently allege the offense in accordance with the statute. The plaintiff replied that the allegations of the complaint were sufficient and a compliance with the statute, and that the insertion of the words "at one time or sitting," was not only unnecessary, but would have been improper, and asked the court, if it should hold otherwise, for leave to amend, by inserting in each cause of action such words as the court should deem necessary and proper. Judge Kershaw granted the motion and dismissed the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also refused the motion of the plaintiff to amend. From this order the plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his Honor erred in deciding that the complaint *was insufficient in this, that it failed to contain the allegation that each loss was sustained "at one time or sitting."

2. Because under the statute in question as now of force in South Carolina, the allegations of the complaint are an adequate statement of the cause of action under said statute, whether tested by the principles of the pleadings and practice which formerly prevailed in this State, or by those which obtain under the present system of the code, and that under either system the insertion of the words "at one time or sitting" would be objectionable, and that the allegations of the complaint are in accordance with the statute.

3. Because even if it should be held that to constitute the cause of action contemplated by the statute, the money must be lost "at one time or sitting," this is a matter of proof on the trial, and not of essential allegation in the complaint. The practice, even in case of an indictment (where the charge is in the language of the act creating the penalty declared for, or in words of equivalent import), being for the defendant to move to that effect, where circumstances render it necessary for his defense, that the offense be more specifically stated; and especially is that the case in practice under the code, where the court, on motion of the adverse party, may require the pleadings to be made more definite and certain.

4. Because his Honor erred in deciding that civil actions under a penal statute are to be governed by the technical rules of criminal pleading, even under the old or former system of pleading and practice; and under the code such rule has no application whatever, and that this action is a civil action under the code, and subject to all the rules of practice and pleading existing thereunder.

5. Because if the words "at any one time or sitting," or any other words, be held a necessary allegation of the complaint, the plaintiff ought to have been directed and allowed to amend, as the law requires, and that his Honor erred in refusing the motion, especially as this is a civil action under the code.

This is a novel case. We are not aware that one like it has ever arisen in the State before. Certainly none such was brought

*to our attention by the exhaustive argument made here. The statute under which the action is brought is as follows:

"Sec. 6. Any person or persons whatsoever, who shall at any time or sitting, by playing at cards, dice-table, or other game or games whatsoever, or by betting on the sides or hands of such as do play at any of the games aforesaid, lose to any one or more person or persons so playing or betting, in the whole, the sum or value of fifty dollars, and shall pay or deliver the same, or any part thereof, the person or persons so losing and paying or delivering the same shall be at liberty, within three months then next ensuing, to sue for and recover the money or goods so lost and paid or delivered, or any part thereof, from the respective winner or winners thereof, with costs of suit, by action to be prosecuted in any court of competent jurisdiction.

"Sec. 7. In case the person or persons who shall lose such money or other thing as aforesaid, shall not, within the time aforesaid, really and bona fide, and without covin or collusion, sue and with effect prosecute for the money or other thing so by him or them lost, and paid and delivered as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful to and for any person or persons, by any such action or suits as aforesaid, to sue for and recover the same, and treble the value thereof, with costs of suit, against such winner or winners as aforesaid; the one moiety thereof to the use of the person or persons that will sue for the same, and the other moiety to the use of the poor of the county where the offense shall have been committed." Gen. Stat. of 1872, 407.

The object of the statute was manifestly to punish excessive gaming. We regard the important words "at any time or sitting" as only another way of saying "at any one time or sitting." It is true the word "any" is indefinite as to the particular thing referred to, but it is singular, and in connection with a name singular means one of the particular things indicated. In the statute it qualifies both "time" and "sitting," and is equivalent to the expression "at any one time or sitting."

It seems to us that the statute 9 Anne, ch. XIV., from which our act was taken (although it was not all re-enacted), received the proper construction in the case of Bones v. Booth, 2 W. Bl. 1227. That was not, as this, an action qui tam by a stranger *to recover the penalty, but an action by the loser himself to recover back fourteen guineas lost at gaming. The play was at the West India Coffee House in Bristol. They played at "All Fours" for two guineas a game from Monday evening to Tuesday evening, without interruption, except for an hour or two at dinner; but the plaintiff and defendant never parted company. Booth then owned on Tuesday evening that he had won seventeen guineas. It was insisted at the trial that this was not won at any one sitting so as to fall within the statute, because the dinner had intervened, but the judge thought otherwise. However, the jury found for the defendant, and the court ordered a new trial. Justice Blackstone said: "The statute makes the winning of £10, at one time or sitting, a nullity; and, therefore, gives the loser an action to recover back what still properly continues to be his own money. To lose £10 at one time is to lose it by a single stake or bet. To lose at one sitting is to lose it in a course of play where the company never parts, though the person may not be actually gaming the whole time." Nares, Justice, concurred and said: "The statute is remedial where the action is brought by the party injured, but penal where brought by a common informer."

It will be observed that, in this case, the decision was made to turn upon the fact that the guineas were lost "at one sitting," and that, too, in a remedial action by the loser himself. Taking this to be the proper construction of the statute, the question is, whether the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action under it. The seventh section, under which this action was brought, is certainly penal in its character. The action being by a stranger, who had no privity with the defendants, for a penalty on account of an alleged legal wrong which did not exist at common law, but only in the statute, we think it was necessary that the precise facts constituting that wrong should be alleged, and if there was a failure to do so, that failure could not be cured by the common law, which, as to actions of a different kind, has sometimes been called a nursing mother. An act lacking any of the elements of the thing made penal by the statute, was not that for which this peculiar action was allowed. It has been held in New York, in reference to a *similar statute, that "the statute gives no form of declaring where a common informer is plaintiff. And in an action founded on a statute, the plaintiff must state specifically the cause of action coming under the statute." Cole qui tam v. Smith, 4 John. 193.

We do not see that our Code of Procedure (which, it seems, in regard to the form of action, makes no exception as to actions for penalties,) alters the case. The leading principle upon which the code proceeds, is that the pleadings shall contain the fundamental facts and no more. Technicalities are disregarded, and it may be that the statutory offense could be stated sufficiently without using the very words of the statute, but that could only be done by the use of such other words as expressed the exact wrong made penal. The general rule in an indictment for a statutory offense, and we suppose the same would apply to an action upon a penal statute, is that it is sufficient if the offense be stated in the words of the act, which is possibly the safest course, but is not indispensably necessary. Penal acts are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. They are to be construed strictly in that sense, that the case in hand must be brought within the definition of the law, but not so strictly as to exclude a case which is within its words taken in their ordinary acceptance. That is to say, there is no peculiar or technical meaning given to language in penal more than in remedial laws.

Apply this principle to the complaint here. It did, with many reiterations, allege that the defendants won so many dollars at play from the person named, on particular days named, but it did not state the exact facts denounced by the statute as objectionable, to the extent of allowing a stranger to recover from the winner treble the amount so won. It did not attempt to state the offense in the words of the statute, nor indeed in equivalent words. The word "sitting" does not occur in the complaint, nor "any time," unless it may be considered that the words "on or about" a particular day named, meant "some time," and that, as argued, was equivalent to "any time." We do not regard time as important in reference to any particular day within three months, but necessary as to the manner in which the money was won, viz., "at one time or sitting," which, as we think, was an important element of the offense under the statute.

It is insisted, however, that if the averments of the complaint were imperfect and incomplete, it was, under the code, incumbent upon the defendants to correct them by a motion to render them more definite and certain by amendment. Sometimes this is the proper remedy, but that must depend upon the inquiry whether the defects amounted to an entire failure to state any cause of action, or only a statement of it in an insufficient or informal manner. In the latter case, the remedy is by motion to make the faulty pleading more definite and certain, as in the case of Childers v. Verner & Stribling, 12 S. C. 4.

This proceeding by motion takes the place of a demurrer for want of form, or, as it was called under the old system of pleading, "a special demurrer." But if the averments are so defective, if the omission of material facts is so great, that even under the rule of a liberal construction, no cause of action is stated, it is not a mere case of insufficiency, but one of complete failure, and, in such case as we understand it, the proper remedy is by demurrer, and, subject to the right of amendment in particular cases, the complaint should be dismissed as in the case of a general demurrer sustained under the old system. Mr. Pomeroy says: "The true doctrine to be gathered from all the cases is, that if the substantive facts which constitute a cause of action are stated in a complaint, or can be inferred by reasonable intendment from the matters which are set forth, although the allegation of these is imperfect, incomplete and defective, such insufficiency pertaining, however, to the form rather than the substance, the proper mode of construction is not by demurrer, nor by excluding evidence at the trial, but by a motion before the trial to make the averments more definite and certain by amendment." Pom. Rem., § 549.

According to these well-established principles, was the defect in this complaint one of substance or of form merely? Were the facts necessary to support the action stated in the complaint? It is conceded in all the books on code pleading, that it is very difficult in many cases to discriminate between the two conditions of partial and of total failure, and that it is utterly impossible to frame any accurate general formula which shall define the insufficiency of the averments and embrace all the possible instances within its terms. This difficulty touches the precise point of this case. Whilst it is admitted that the authorities on the subject are not all in accord, considering the nature of the action and the fact that the matter omitted constituted the essential element of the statutory offense, we are constrained to hold that really no cause of action was stated in the complaint, and that the defendants could not be required to help the plaintiff to make a case, where none was charged, against themselves. If a good cause of action under the statute had been alleged, no matter how imperfectly, the result would have been different. But taking all the facts as alleged to be true, they do not furnish a cause of action under the statute, and we think the Circuit judge committed no error in sustaining the demurrer.

The cause came on for trial, and, while being heard before a jury, the defendants put in a verbal demurrer under subdivision 6 of section 167 of the code, "that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The plaintiff joined issue, insisting that the complaint was sufficient, but asked the court, if it should hold otherwise, "for leave to amend by inserting in each cause of action such words as the court should deem necessary and proper." The judge sustained the demurrer and refused the motion to amend, and the question now is whether the refusal of the motion to amend was error of law reviewable by this court. The order proposed was in very general terms, asking leave to insert "such words as the court might deem necessary and proper;" but, seeking only the substantial rights of the parties, we lay no great stress upon that.

The code of procedure, from its dread lest the proper requirements as to form should degenerate into mere technicalities, has made most ample and liberal provisions for amendments at the trial itself, or at any other time in the progress of the cause. We are thoroughly in accord with the spirit of the code in its liberality in allowing amendments and in its opposition to the decision of controversies not involving the merits; but some rules are absolutely necessary, and all the writers on the codes agree *that there is some limit to the right of amendment. If the right were universal, and extended to all parties and under all circumstances, there would be no difficulty, but as it does not, there must be some judgment as to the proper cases for its application.

When the application is made at the trial, it is addressed to the discretion of the Circuit judge, and the exercise of that discretion is a most delicate and responsible duty, enhanced possibly in this case by the fact that if the amendment is not allowed, the action given by the statute will probably be barred. We agree entirely with what Judge Withers said in the case of Mobley v. Mobley, 7 Rich. 432: "Than judgments founded on the exercise of legal discretion, there is no description of official duty more perplexing to the judge who renders and the tribunal which reviews such judgments. The efforts of jurisprudence have always been earnest and diligent to render its maxims, its standards, precise, fixed, intelligible, and to substitute exact prescriptions for the necessary uncertainties of discretion." But after all there must, to a certain extent, be the exercise of discretion, sound discretion guided by law, "regulated by rule, not by humor."

Some of our cases would seem to indicate that, when the discretion of a judge has been exercised upon a motion to amend, his decision ordinarily is not appealable. Cureton v. Hutchinson, 3 S. C. 606; Chichester v. Hastie, 9 S. C. 334; Mason v. Johnson, 13 S. C. 20. An order involving merely the exercise of discretion cannot be appealable, as error of law cannot be averred against such an order. No general rule can be laid down upon the subject. There may be cases in which the exercise of that discretion will be reviewed, especially where the motion to amend is refused and the case is thereby ended, such order being somewhat in the nature of a final judgment. But as to amendments, much must be left to the discretion of the Circuit judge, and the exercise of it, as a rule, will not be disturbed, unless it deprives a party of a substantial right, which he can show he is entitled to under the law.

Did the plaintiff, whose complaint had been declared insufficient at the trial, have the right to an order to amend his complaint and go on with his case? The Circuit judge thought not, and *refused it. A demurrer under the code for want of sufficient facts is said to be something like a "general demurrer" under the old system of pleading (Bliss, § 413); and there is no doubt an order allowing a general demurrer under that system ended the case, and was a final judgment between the parties. Bagley v. Johnston, 4 Rich. 22; Gaillard v. Trenholm, 5 Rich. 356, and notes.

But the code is more liberal in allowing amendments after demurrer allowed. There is, however, difference of opinion as to the extent to which it should go. There is, undoubtedly, much conflict in the cases upon the subject, particularly in the States of New York and Wisconsin. In one class of cases, even after demurrer sustained to the complaint, the plaintiff will be allowed, upon terms, to amend by inserting in his complaint a new cause of action, whenever such new cause does not make it necessary to change the summons. Brown v. Leigh, 49 N. Y. 79. But our code, in reference to amendments at the trial, seems to limit the right "to inserting allegations material to the case where the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense." Code, § 196.

And, as far as we are able to ascertain, the most approved rule, and that certainly most in accord with all the analogies of pleading, is that an exception is made in those cases where the plaintiff proposes to set up a wholly different cause of action in place of the one which he attempted to set up in his original pleading, and, in such case, the motion comes too late. The leading case in this line of decision is that of Supervisors v. Decker, 34 Wis., citing Brayton v. Jones, 5 Wis. 117, and appendix. See Bliss Code Pl., § 429; Pom. Rem., § 566; Wait An. Code 328, note. Mr. Pomeroy expresses it thus: "In giving a practical interpretation to the clauses of the code, a conflict of decision has arisen among the tribunals of the different States, which it is utterly impossible to reconcile. The rule is established by one class of cases, that in all the voluntary amendments before trial, for which the party applies to the court by motion, including those rendered necessary by the sustaining of a demurrer to his pleadings, he cannot, under the form of an amendment, change the nature and scope of his *actions; he cannot substitute a wholly different cause of action in place of the one which he attempted to set up in the original pleading," &c.

Taking this as the rule, we have certainly held that the complaint did not state facts necessary to constitute the peculiar action given by the statute to a stranger. The motion to amend it in the manner stated involved the right to insert "a wholly different cause of action;" indeed, a new cause of action, as none under the statute had been sufficiently stated. We think, therefore, that the judge, in refusing the order to amend, committed no abuse of his discretion which this court should correct. In view of the salutary principle of amendment we were inclined to a different result; but we are less reluctant to affirm the judgment when we consider the nature of the action, which, though civil in form, certainly partakes somewhat of the nature of a criminal proceeding. As stated by the judge, "this is a technical action, not founded on contract or consideration, but upon the strict letter of the law, and must be judged accordingly."

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

STATE v. PADGETT.

Before Hudson, J., Orangeburg, October, 1881.

These were two prosecutions against the same defendant, Joel Padgett, for selling seed cotton on November 2d, 1880. In one case, the alleged sale was of three hundred pounds at nine o'clock at night, and in the other, of two hundred pounds at ten o'clock at night. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. I. Browning, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

December 11th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. These were indictments under the act of 1877, "To prohibit the sale of seed cotton between the time of the setting and rising of the sun, and to regulate the sale of seed cotton." 16 Stat. 266. The only difference between the two cases was as to the amount of cotton alleged to have been purchased and the hour of the night at which it was done, and therefore they were heard together.

The cases were commenced as usual by warrants for arrest of the defendant, issued by a trial justice, who, after examination, bound over the defendant and sent the cases up to the Court of General Sessions for trial. The indictments charged "That Joel Padgett, late of the county and State aforesaid, on the second day of November, 1880, with force and arms, at Willow township, in the county and State aforesaid, at nine o'clock in the night of the same day, did unlawfully buy," &c.

The cases were tried by Judge Hudson. The defendant denied the jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions, claiming that the trial justice, having issued the warrants of arrest, had exclusive jurisdiction to try the cases. The judge refused to sustain the objection and sent the cases to the jury. The verdict was "guilty" in both cases, and the judge in each case sentenced the prisoner "to pay a fine of twenty-five dollars and costs, or be imprisoned in the county jail for a period of thirty days."

The defendant moved in arrest of judgment, which was refused, and he now appeals to this court and renews the motion upon the following grounds: First. Because his Honor erred in overruling the pleas to the jurisdiction made in said actions, the defendant contending that this court and the court of trial justice having concurrent jurisdiction of the offenses charged, and the proceedings having originated in the latter court, that the actions should have proceeded to judgment therein. Second. Because the allegations in the indictment, that the said offenses were committed "in the night time," does not state the offense created by the statute which forbids the "buying," &c., "between the hours of sun-down and sunrise of any day."

First. The offense created by the statute, which is charged in this case, did not exist at the time the constitution was adopted, but that instrument contains a provision which covers it. By section 18 of article IV. of the constitution it is provided, "That the Court of General Sessions shall have exclusive jujurisdiction over all criminal cases which shall not be otherwise provided for by law." If the jurisdiction is otherwise provided for, the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions is taken away, but not its jurisdiction. That remains and is concurrent with that of the other tribunal, unless to the inferior jurisdiction exclusive jurisdiction is given, or unless to the superior tribunal all jurisdiction should be in totidem verbis denied. "A statute which simply confers jurisdiction of a crime on an inferior court generally, and not exclusively, cannot be considered to deprive the Court of General Sessions of its jurisdiction, but the jurisdiction remains concurrent with that of the Superior Court." State v. Williams, 13 S. C. 548.

This case does not fall under section 19, article I. of the constitution, which provides "That all offenses less than felony, and in which the punishment does not exceed a fine of $100, or imprisonment for thirty days, shall be tried summarily before a justice of the peace, or other officer authorized by law."

It *does not do so for the reason that the punishment of the offense, imposed by the act, may be both fine and imprisonment, so that exclusive jurisdiction is not given to the trial justice from the nature of the punishment imposed. State v. McKettrick, 14 S. C. 350. And besides the act itself, which creates the offense, provides "That any person, &c., upon conviction in the Court of General Sessions or of a trial justice, shall be fined in the sum of fifty dollars, or imprisoned in the county jail for a period of thirty days, or both, in the discretion of the court." 16 Stat., supra.

It is said, however, that whilst jurisdiction is expressly given by the act to the Court of General Sessions, it is also given to the court of trial justice, and the jurisdiction being concurrent, and the court of trial justice having first assumed jurisdiction, that of the Court of General Sessions is ousted. There is no conflict of jurisdiction here. The trial justice court is not claiming jurisdiction. It is the duty of the trial justice to issue his warrant of arrest in all proper cases when applied for. We do not think this initiation of the proceedings is assuming jurisdiction to try the case, but merely a preliminary step to arrest the party, which is necessary to his being tried in any court. The trial justice did not claim jurisdiction to try the case, but upon examination sent it to the Court of General Sessions to be tried there. We see no error in that court taking jurisdiction and trying the case.

Second. The other objection is that the offense being one created by statute, was not sufficiently set forth in the indictment. The words of the act are: "That it shall not be lawful for any person to buy or sell, or receive by way of barter, exchange or traffic of any sort, any seed cotton between the hours of sundown and sunrise of any day." The indictment charges that "Joel Padgett, on the second day of November, 1880, at nine o'clock in the night of the same day, did unlawfully buy," &c., and the question is whether the indictment sufficiently charges the offense created by the act. This is more a question of construction of the act than of pleading. It is certainly true that the act of the legislature is not very clearly expressed, and on that account, perhaps, the legislature, in December, 1880, *amended its phraseology. But that was after the offense charged here had been committed, and can have no effect upon this case, which must stand or fall according to the terms of the law as originally expressed. Nor, on the other hand, do we think that, because the legislature chose to amend the law which was not clearly expressed, we would be justified in assuming from that fact, that, in the opinion of the legislature, the law as it originally stood was incapable of being enforced, and the original act was repealed and not merely amended by the last acts. The question simply is, whether under the original act, unaffected by the subsequent amendment, this indictment sufficiently sets forth the statutory offense charged therein.

The rule in regard to indictments framed to cover offenses created by statute is, "that the offense should be set forth with clearness and certainty, and must be so described, if not in the very words of the statute, so as to bring it substantially within the provisions of the statute." 1 Arch. 286; State v. Vill, 2 Brev. 262; State v. Cunningham, 2 Speers, 246; State v. Cullum, Ib. 582. In the case from Brevard the court say: "The offense is charged in the indictment substantially and sufficiently pursuant to the statute, and although there is not a perfect similarity in the words, there is no variance in the sense, nor can the variance create any doubt in the operation or construction of the law."

In the case before us the words of the act are, "between the hours of sundown and sunrise of any day," and the words of the indictment are, "in the night-time." Does the indictment charge that the offense was committed substantially at the time forbidden by the act? We can have no doubt of what was the intention of the legislature in the use of the words "between the hours of sundown and sunrise of any day." The object of the legislature manifestly was to make criminal the sale of such cotton in the night-time. In construing an act we have a right to refer to the title, and the title of this act uses the words "between the time of the setting and rising of the sun," without reference to any day, which shows what was the intention. From these words can there be a reasonable doubt that the *intention was to express the period of time lying between sundown of one day and sunrise of the next?

The law-makers, taking as a starting-point sundown, evidently intended to count forward and not backward, to include the period of time succeeding and not preceding the setting of the sun, the period of darkness until the next and not the period of light back to the last "rising of the sun."

But it is urged that the superadded words in the act, "of any day," negatives this construction; that the use of these words, which have lately been repealed, makes it necessary to inquire whether the night can be said to be "of" the day—that is to say, belonging to or proceeding from the day. The division of time which most strikes us, is that into day and night. One rotation of the earth in twenty-four hours produces a period of light and a period of darkness of about equal length, and it is entirely conventional at what point of the circle we begin to make the count; but of the two periods, that of light, the artificial day, is the most important to us, and from this or some other cause we habitually, in common parlance, speak of the night which succeeds a day as the night "of" that day—that is to say, the night that follows, that belongs to that day. "A day is usually intended of a natural day, as in an indictment of burglary we say in the night of the same day." Co. Litt. 135.

The framers of this act doubtless used the words "of any day" in this sense, and meant the whole period of darkness between sundown of one day and sunrise of the next. According to this construction, the period of time within which the statute inhibited the purchase of seed cotton was the whole of the night succeeding, following, the day indicated, and the charge that the offense was committed in the night succeeding the day of November 2d, 1880, is substantially in accordance with the sense of the act, although not with its exact words. It is insisted that we cannot thus reach the intention of the act, but must construe its words according to their technical meaning, and that thus construed, it cannot be said that the night is "of" the day—that being a penal statute it must be construed strictly. That certainly is the rule, but proper construction in order to ascertain the intention, surely is admissible.

*In the case of State v. Brown, 2 Speers, 136, Judge O'Neill says: "It is said penal statutes are to be construed strictly and nothing is to be included in them by intendment. There is no doubt this is the general rule, but it is also a rule that the courts are not to narrow the construction so that offenders may escape. 'We are to look to the words in the first instance,' said Buller, J. (1 T. R. 96), 'and when they are plain we are to decide on them; if they are doubtful, then we are to have recourse to the subject-matter,' and in a late work (Dwarries on Statutes 79) it is said, 'Statutes, though penal, have been taken by intendment to the end that they should not be illusory, but should take effect according to the express intendment of the makers of the act.' " And in the case of State v. Cunningham, supra, it was held that "when the intent of an act is plain, to effect it, words and even parts of sentences may be transposed." It is true that the word "night" does not appear in this act, but who can doubt that it was intended by the words "between the hours of sundown and sunrise of any day."

If, notwithstanding the manifest intent, we must be limited to the scientific meaning of the words, then we agree that the division of time adopted by Pope Gregory XIII., is a part of our law. According to that calendar the civil, as distinguished from the artificial "day," is defined to be "the whole time or period of one revolution of the earth on its axis, or twenty-four hours," called the "natural day." "And the evening and the morning were the first day." Genesis, ch. 1. In this sense the day may commence at any period of the revolution. The Babylonians began the day at sunrise, the Jews at sunset, the Egyptians at midnight, as do several nations in modern times, the British, Spanish, American, &c. This day, in reference to civil transactions, is called the civil day. Thus, with us, the day on which a legal instrument is dated, begins and ends at midnight. Webster's Dictionary, Unabridged.

Even according to this scientific definition of the word "day," the act in question prohibited the purchase of seed cotton between the hour of sunset and the middle of the night succeeding, that being the end of the previous day. The indictment charged that the offense was committed "at nine o'clock in the night of *the same day," viz., November 2d, 1880. That was within the time covered by the act, according to the strictest construction, and we cannot say that this manner of stating the offense as to time, was insufficient under the statutes.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court in each of the cases stated be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

[3. Execution ⚡7.]

A sale of land under a judgment more than twenty years old, held null and void.

[This case is also cited in McNair v. Ingraham, 21 S. C. 71, 74, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Hudson, J., Barnwell, March, 1882.

Action by J. Allen Tobin and August Zissett. The case is fully stated in the order of the Circuit judge, as follows:

On May 14th, A. D. 1860, Duncan, Moloney & Co. recovered judgment, by confession, against Gideon S. Brown, of Barnwell, had the same duly entered up, and execution issued and lodged on the same day, for $290.75 and costs.

This judgment and execution lay dormant from that day until May 11th, 1880—no payments having been made thereon, no levy made, and no renewal of the execution until the last named day, when, without notice, and without leave of the court, either asked or obtained, the execution was renewed by the clerk, and a levy on the said May 11th, A. D. 1880, was endorsed thereon by the sheriff, of a certain lot in the town of Barnwell, the property of said Gideon S. Brown, then in the possession of H. M. Myers, Jr., the executor of the last will and testament of the said testator, Gideon S. Brown, who had died in 1878, leaving *of force his said last will, in which the said Myers was nominated as executor, and had duly qualified. It seems that the other defendant, Marion S. Myers, and perhaps others of the family of the said testator, were likewise in possession; but this we are not sure that the testimony clearly shows. Certainly, the two defendants are in possession.

Under the levy made May 11th, 1880, the lot was sold and bid in by Laura C. Tobin, whose bid was duly transferred to the present plaintiffs, to whom the sheriff conveyed the said lot of land on January 14th, A. D. 1882, the sale having been made September 5th, 1881. On January 17th, A. D. 1882, the plaintiffs began this action to recover the possession of the lot of land of the defendants, who, by their answer, put the title in issue.

To establish title, the plaintiffs put in evidence the deed of the sheriff, based upon the judgment and execution, levy and sale aforesaid, all of which were in due form proved. This muniment of title and proof of the long possession of the lot of land, and its use and occupation by Gideon S. Brown, made the plaintiffs' case, and they rested.

The defendants' counsel moved for a nonsuit, upon the ground that the levy, sale and conveyance of the sheriff aforesaid, were null and void; that the renewal execution was without authority, and conferred no power whatever upon the sheriff to make the levy and sale.

I concur in the view urged by the defendants' learned counsel, which was earnestly and ably combated by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs. At the date of the renewal of the execution, the judgment wanted but three days of being twenty years old. Even an authorized renewal of the execution would not have infused new life into the judgment, nor have checked the currency of the period of presumption of payment, much less did an illegal renewal have this virtue. Hence the period of presumption of payment ran on and became complete long before the sale on September 5th, 1881. Nor would the levy on May 11th, 1880, on an illegal renewal of execution, have the effect to cut short the currency of the twenty years—the period of presumption—so that when the sale was made, it was under a *judgment that had been dormant for more than twenty-one years; no effort having been made within that time to revive it. The mere renewal of a fi. fa., even when regular, does not arrest the currency of the twenty years which raises the presumption of payment of a judgment. See Dillard v. Brian, 5 Rich. 502.

But should we regard the judgment as not affected with this presumption of payment, still there was no execution which authorized a levy and sale; and perhaps this is the turning point in the argument at last.

Twenty years, wanting three days, had elapsed since the lodgment of the first fi. fa., before a renewal is sued out; and this is done without any notice to the executor of the judgment debtor, who had been two years dead. No notice, no summons, no sci. fa. is issued, and no order or leave of the court is had. Under the law, prior to the adoption of the code, the original fi. fa. was defunct, and could only have been renewed on sci. fa. to Gideon S. Brown.

Did the last clause of section 307 of the code revive and restore to the plaintiffs' execution a right which had been forfeited three years before the adoption of the code? Because, after May 14th, 1867, they had lost the right to renew without leave of court upon sci. fa. issued. Section 317 of the code saves to executions all their incidents not supplied by or in conflict with the provisions of title IX., chapter I.; and we think the incidents to the renewal of this execution are not supplied by the last clause of section 307, but rather by the previous clauses of the section, if at all.

Did that law of 1870 confer upon the plaintiffs the right to renew without notice to the executor of the deceased debtor, and without leave of the court, as late as May 11th, 1880, simply because an execution had been issued, but lay dormant, since May 14th, 1860?

We think not. And our conclusion is that the execution issued May 11th, 1880, and lodged as a renewal of that lodged May 14th, 1860, was null and void, and that all proceedings thereunder, including the sale of the lot and conveyance to the plaintiffs, are null, and conveyed no title. The motion for *non-suit is, therefore, granted; and it is adjudged that the complaint stand dismissed with costs.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed on the following exceptions:

1. For that his Honor erred (as it is respectfully submitted) in holding that the renewal of the execution herein by the clerk, without notice to the executor of the defendants and leave of the court, was null and void. But that his Honor should have held that leave of the court, in a case where the judgment was less than twenty years old, and where the first execution was issued within five years from the entry of the judgment, was not necessary, and that the renewal by the clerk was valid.

2. That his Honor erred in holding that all proceedings under said execution, as renewed by the clerk, including the sale of the lot and conveyance to the plaintiffs, are null, and conveyed no title. But that his Honor should have held that if notice to the legal representative of the deceased defendant, and leave of the court to renew the execution, had been necessary, the failure to give such notice, and to procure such leave, were mere irregularities which do not affect the title of the purchasers.

Mr. Robert Aldrich, for appellant.

Mr. J. C. Davant, contra.

December 11th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. [Omitting the statement.] A judgment is registration of what the court decides. A writ of execution is judicial process to enforce that judgment. One is passive and the other active. Both the judgment and execution are links in the title to property purchased at sheriff's sale; both are necessary, and if either is void, the title of the purchaser fails. For reasons of policy to sustain sheriffs' sales, purchasers at such sales are favored to the extent that mere irregularities in the process will not avoid the sale. If purchasers at their peril were held responsible for the perfect regularity of process *under which property is sold, the result would be that property would be sold at a sacrifice, and the usefulness of such sales be greatly impaired, if not destroyed; but this rule, as to mere irregularities, does not apply where either the judgment or execution is absolutely void.

The first objection to the title in this case is that the judgment under which the sale was made, was, at the time of the sale, paid and satisfied by operation of law, and was, therefore, functus officio; that twenty years presumes payment, and that more than that time had elapsed. To this it is answered that three days before the twenty years had expired, the plaintiffs procured the clerk of the court, without notice to the defendant in execution, or, he being dead, to his executor, to issue a new execution, which was levied on the lot in controversy, and that this ex parte action of the plaintiffs shows that they did not sleep over their rights during the whole period of twenty years, and stopped the completion of the time necessary to raise the presumption of payment. As the execution is the only means which the plaintiff has to enforce payment of his judgment, and it is in one sense connected with the judgment, there has been some difference of opinion as to the effect of a renewal of the execution in regard to the running of the time necessary to presume payment of the judgment. But, after very full consideration, it was held by the old Court of Appeals in the case of Dillard v. Brian, 5 Rich. 501, that "the period of time (twenty years) which raises the presumption that a judgment is satisfied, begins when the judgment is entered up, and not when the last renewal fi. fa. is tested or loses its active energy." This is in point, and unless overruled, must control this case. We will not re-open the argument. Counting from the rendition of the judgment on May 14th, 1860, (disregarding the effort to renew by mere copy on May 11th, 1880,) to September 5th, 1881, when the lot was offered for sale, nearly twenty-one years had elapsed, and the artificial force of the presumption had attached. Willingham v. Chick, 14 S. C. 102; Boyce v. Lake, 17 S. C. 481 [43 Am. Rep. 618].

This view is conclusive of the case, and it is unnecessary to consider the other questions raised, whether the execution, under which the levy was made, was renewed according to law, and if *not, whether said execution was absolutely void or only voidable. There can be no valid execution or sale under it, when the judgment on which it was issued is satisfied either in law or in fact. When the land in this case was sold, more than twenty years from the rendition of the judgment had expired and raised the presumption of payment, which was not rebutted by the ex parte effort of the plaintiffs to renew the execution. "To explain the indulgence there must be some act or admission on the part of the defendant, showing the continuance of the debt. In the issuing, returning and renewing of executions, the defendant has no action. It may be done and redone for forty years, and unless he is astute enough to examine the clerk's and sheriff's offices, he will be ignorant of the facts." Dillard v. Brian, supra.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Kershaw, J., Anderson, March, 1881.

The opinion fully states the case. It may be added, however, that the case was heard on testimony taken by the master and reported to the court.

Mr. Jos. N. Brown, for appellants.

Mr. B. F. Whitner, contra.

*December 11th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. Francis E. Harrison, late of Anderson county, died intestate in November, 1878, seized and possessed of a considerable estate, and leaving a widow, Elizabeth P. Harrison, and a number of children. Administration upon his estate was granted to E. P. Earle, the plaintiff, who, as early as February 5th, 1879, instituted this proceeding, which was in the nature of a creditor's bill to sell lands in aid of personal assets to pay debts, injunction, &c., although it was not distinctly charged that the estate was insolvent.

The widow and children, the heirs-at-law, were made parties, as well as some of those claiming to be creditors, viz., Mrs. Elizabeth

H. Whitner, J. W. Norris and the State Savings Bank at Anderson. As it appeared from the answer of Mrs. Elizabeth H. Whitner, a sister of the intestate, that she had claims against the estate, growing out of the estate of their father, James Harrison, deceased, the executors of his will, James W. Harrison and James H. Whitner, were also made parties. The creditors of the estate must have been few in number, as there was no order calling in creditors, but Mrs. Whitner, in her answer, presented two claims against the estate, which were resisted by the administrator and heirs, and are the only matters in controversy which have been brought to the attention of the court. They were as follows:

First, James Harrison, late of Anderson county, the father of Mrs. Whitner (wife of Judge J. N. Whitner), Francis E. Harrison, the intestate, and James W. Harrison, executed his will, in 1858, by which he disposed of a large estate to his then aforesaid children. A copy of the whole will is not in the brief, but it is not denied that the extracts given are correct. After disposing of the family homestead on the Savannah river, "Andersonville," to Francis E. Harrison, and making certain other specific devises, the eighth clause provided as follows: "I give and bequeath the rest and residue of my estate, real and personal, in equal shares to my daughter Elizabeth H. Whitner, and my sons James W. Harrison and Francis E. Harrison, desiring and expecting that the same may be divided by and amongst themselves in such way as will be convenient and just, with a becoming spirit of confidence and liberality," &c.

It does not appear what property fell under the residuary clause, but it is admitted that the Mason tract of land, in the county of Anderson, constituted part of the residuum under the will, but in reference thereto the testator, on February 18th, 1862, executed a codicil to his will, in these words: "It will be seen by reference to my said will that no specific mention is made of the tract of land in Anderson district, known as the Mason tract, though I have often declared verbally that it was my wish that the same should be held and enjoyed by the proprietor of the Andersonville lands, being in my judgment a necessary appurtenant, the more especially as a provision farm, and now, therefore, I specifically declare and hereby give and devise the said tract of land to my son Francis E. Harrison, the same to be accounted for by him at its fair value, as so much of his share of the residue of my estate, as directed to be divided between and among my children, legatees under my will, as therein set forth," &c.

In June, 1865, the testator, James Harrison, died, leaving in full force the said will and codicil, naming his sons, James W. Harrison and the said Francis E. Harrison, and his grandson, James H. Whitner, as executors, but, there being no debts and the beneficiaries all being sui juris, and named as executors, the will was never admitted to probate until lately. The parties seemed to suppose that they could settle among themselves, but, as it often happens in such cases, it has turned out that they were mistaken, and we cannot refrain from saying that it would have been better if the will had been admitted to probate immediately after the death of the testator and the estate settled while all the parties were living.

There are some glimpses in the evidence that the parties had some settlement among themselves, but Mrs. Whitner claimed that under the provisions of the will and codicil above stated, she was entitled to one-third of "the fair value" of the Mason tract of land devised to the intestate, Francis E. Harrison, which was a charge upon the same; that during his life he always admitted his liability to pay the same, but had never done so at the time of his death.

Second. The other claim of Mrs. Whitner is thus stated by herself in her amended answer: "The claim against her late father and chargeable against his estate in the hands of the said F. E. Harrison, is his obligation for the payment of $1,020.80, given to equalize the defendant and her late husband in advancements of real estate, bearing interest from 1st of January, 1848, which remains unpaid; that the said James Harrison continued to acknowledge this as a subsisting obligation, and the said F. E. Harrison repeatedly in his life-time recognized it as a claim to be paid out of his father's estate, and agreed with this defendant that the sum should be paid, with interest, from the —day of—; and this defendant alleges that the said Mason tract of land, being the residuum of her father's estate, and held by the said F. E. Harrison at the time of his death, as such is chargeable with the payment of the said sum and interest thereon.

Letters of the intestate, F. E. Harrison, down to a short time before his death, particularly as to the claim for one-third of the value of the Mason tract of land, were given in evidence, and James W. Harrison and James H. Whitner, lately qualified as executors of the will of James Harrison, and made defendants in the case, were, subject to objection, examined as witnesses for the claimant, particularly as to declarations and admissions of the intestate, Francis E., in his life-time, in regard to the second claim on the obligation of her father, James Harrison.

The case was heard by Judge Kershaw, who sustained both claims, and decreed "that Mrs. Elizabeth H. Whitner is entitled as residuary legatee under the will of her father, James Harrison, to one-third of the value of the Mason tract of land, devised to the said

Francis E. Harrison, which was due and payable to the said Elizabeth H. Whitner twelve months after the death of the said James Harrison. That the value of said land at the time the said Francis E. Harrison came into the possession of it under his father's will, and at the time the said legacy was payable, was six dollars per acre, and that this claim of the said Elizabeth H. Whitner was a charge upon the said land.
* * * It is further ordered that the said

F. E. Harrison having recognized the obligation of his father, James Harrison, for the payment of one thousand and twenty eighty one-hundredths dollars as a subsisting obligation against his estate, to the extent of its face value, as of the date it was given, to wit, on the 10th day of October, 1851, and having as a compromise of the matters between the estate of James Harrison and the estate of Joseph N. Whitner, deceased, agreed on the — day of January, 1874, that such obligation should be paid to the said Elizabeth H. Whitner, sole executrix and legatee of the said Joseph N. Whitner, the said Elizabeth H. Whitner is also entitled to be paid from the proceeds of the said Mason place, as that portion of his father's estate liable for the payment of debts, the further sum of $1,289.76, with interest from January, 1874."

From this decree, the administrator and heirs of Francis E. Harrison appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "Because the claim of the defendant, Mrs. E. H. Whitner, founded on the note of James Harrison to the Hon. J. N. Whitner, dated October 10th, 1851, for $1,020.80, was without consideration, barred by lapse of time and the statute of limitations, and should have been rejected.

2. "Because the supposed obligation to pay $1,020.80 was met by the acknowledgment of indebtedness of J. N. Whitner to said James Harrison for $1,400, bearing date the 21st day of September, 1853.

3. "Because the said James Harrison, by his will, dated June 30th, 1858, gave to J. N. Whitner and his two sons, James W. and F. E. Harrison, all his lands in Florida, two-fifths to said J. N. Whitner, and the other three-fifths equally to his two sons, which, of itself, equalized the supposed inequality referred to in said memorandum or note, and should be construed as a substitution thereof.

4. "Because a parol promise, alleged to have been made in January, 1874, by intestate, to pay said sum of $1,200 on a claim bearing date October 10th, 1851, is not sufficient in law to charge the estate of said F. E. Harrison with its payment.

5. "Because the promise proved by the witnesses was to pay only $1,200, and the judgment at most should have been for only $1,200, with interest from January, 1874.

*6. "Because the said James H. Whitner and J. W. Harrison were not competent witnesses to establish said supposed claim.

7. "Because the estate of said F. E. Harrison should have been required to pay only $5 per acre for the Mason lands, being the sum paid by him to James W. Harrison, his co-tenant."

First. Very little need be said as to the first claim. None of the exceptions object to the Circuit decree, giving Mrs. Whitner a charge upon the Mason tract of land, for one-third of its value in 1866, due to her by the intestate, F. E. Harrison. The evidence was full and uncontradicted, including letters from the intestate himself shortly before his death, that this claim, under his father's will, had never been paid. The only objection made to the decree, in this regard, is by the seventh exception, which insists that the Circuit judge erred in fixing the value of the land at $6 per acre, claiming, as James W. Harrison sold his third interest in the land to his brother, estimating the value of the land at $5 per acre, it should have been fixed at that price in reference to the third interest therein of Mrs. Elizabeth H. Whitner.

That was a question of fact decided by the Circuit judge upon the evidence, and in looking through it we see no sufficient reason to disturb that finding. James W. Harrison may have agreed to take from his brother less than the real value of the lands, and that should not control in estimating its value in reference to the interest of Mrs. Whitner. The only three witnesses examined as to the value of the land, Joseph A. McClusky, G. W. Maret and O. H. P. Fant, all concur in saying that in 1866 the Mason land was worth $6 per acre. So far as this claim is concerned, it is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

Second. There is much more difficulty about the other claim. It is certainly very old, not arising under the will of James Harrison, but long anterior to the execution of the will, and entirely independent of it. James Harrison owned property in the State of Florida, as well as in Anderson. He had three children, Mrs. Whitner, James W. Harrison and Francis E. Harrison. It seems that about the year 1848 he made a partial division of his property among his children, and to equalize *them, he gave to Judge Whitner an obligation, of which the following is a copy:

"Inasmuch as certain advances have been made to James W. Harrison beyond those made to J. N. Whitner, to wit, on account of lands adjoining the village of Anderson, being one-half of said lot of land (one-half having been promised him by his brother), which I estimate at five hundred dollars, and from concern of John C. Griffin & Co., the sum of five hundred and twenty and eighty one-hundredths dollars, do execute this my obligation, to secure as near equality as may be, should I not pay in my own life-time, and hereby promise to pay to J. N. Whitner the sum of one thousand and twenty dollars and eighty cents, with interest from the first day of January, 1848, being about the time of said advances to J. W. H.

(Signed.)

James Harrison.

"Oct. 10, 1851."

After this obligation was given there were money transactions between James Harrison and Judge Whitner, certainly one on September 21st, 1853, in which Judge Whitner acknowledged his liability to account to James Harrison for $1,400, the price of stock in the Farmers' and Exchange Bank of Charleston.

On June 30th, 1858, James Harrison executed his will, by which he disposed of a large estate to his three children. As before stated, a full copy of the will is not before us, but it is stated that the will gave Mrs. Whitner more than an equal share of the Florida lands. Judge Whitner died in 1864, leaving Mrs. Whitner his sole devisee and executrix, and James Harrison died in 1865, leaving in full force the will with codicils above described, which named as executors F. E. Harrison, James H. Harrison and James H. Whitner, but it was not admitted to probate until after the death of F. E. Harrison, the intestate.

It did not certainly appear whether the parties interested under the will ever had a final settlement of the Florida property, but it was suggested that there had been such settlement, and that Mrs. Whitner had some claim growing out of it against the intestate, Francis E. Harrison. The executors of James Harrison, viz., James W. Harrison and

James H. Whitner, *testified, subject to exception, that the intestate, Francis E. Harrison, in his life-time admitted his liability not only on the obligation of James Harrison to Judge Whitner, above described, but also on some claim not explained, growing out of the division of the Florida lands, and as late as January, 1874, agreed, by way of compromise, to pay the sum of $1,289.76, with interest from January, 1874, which the Circuit judge decreed in favor of Mrs. Whitner, "to be paid from the proceeds of the said Mason place, as that portion of his father's estate liable for the payment of debts."

The administrator and heirs of F. E. Harrison object to this, alleging that the original obligation of James Harrison was without consideration and void; that James W. Harrison and James H. Whitner were not competent witnesses, under the code, to prove admissions of F. E. Harrison, he being dead; that if competent, parol proof of an agreement of F. E. Harrison to pay the debt of his father was inadmissible under the statute of frauds; that if the original obligation was binding as a debt upon James Harrison, it was, in fact, paid in his life-time, or if not paid was barred; and if the original obligation was not an ordinary debt, but to be accounted for at his death as evidence of advancements to the others, it was necessarily canceled and substituted by the large provision for Mrs. Whitner in the will. From the view this court takes, it will be necessary for this claim to go back to the Circuit for further evidence, and, therefore, it would not be proper to consider now the points made, except that, in relation to the competency of James W. Harrison and James H. Whitner, as witnesses in behalf of Mrs. Whitner, to prove the admission of F. E. Harrison, he being dead. Their testimony was taken subject to objection, but the Circuit judge seems to have made no ruling upon the subject, except by considering the testimony as if no objection had been made.

The general law was that no person offered as witness should be excluded by reason of an interest in the event of the suit. But by section 400 of the code (according to the late revision) it is enacted that a party may be examined as a witness, "provided, however, that no party to the action shall be examined in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased, * * * as a witness against a party then prosecuting or defending the action as executor, administrator, &c., of such deceased person when such examination, or any judgment or determination in such action, can in any manner affect the interest of such witness, or the interest previously owned or represented by him," &c. James W. Harrison, a party, was offered as a witness against the administrator of F. E. Harrison, in regard to communications between him and F. E. Harrison, in his life-time, and the question is whether the judgment in the action can "in any manner affect the interest of such witness, or the interest previously owned by him."

It seems to us that the judgment will affect the interest of James W. Harrison. In order to simplify the matter, let us consider this as an action brought under the statute of 3 and 4 W. & M., Gen. Stat., § 1949, by Mrs. Whitner, as alleged creditor of James Harrison, against the administrator of his devisee, F. E. Harrison, and impleading also the executors of James Harrison, deceased, to make liable for the debt of the ancestor a certain tract of land (Mason) in possession of said F. E. Harrison, as residuary devisee at the time of his death. See Smith v. Grant, 15 S. C. 146. If in this action there should be a recovery, upon whom would devolve the liability to pay that recovery? By the will, as it stood originally, that tract of land was given to be equally divided between F. E. Harrison, James W. Harrison and Mrs. Whitner, and if the codicil had not been executed, it is perfectly clear that the loss of payment would have fallen on the three owners equally.

Does the codicil, which simply made partition of the Mason land, by giving specifically the land to one charged with the shares of the others, make any change as to the liability of the respective parties? Two of the tenants in common cannot get their full shares in money, and leave the land in possession of the third to pay the whole debt of the ancestor; each must pay his share of any debt of the ancestor, which falls upon the Mason land. F. E. Harrison has purchased for value two-thirds of that land, according to the terms of the codicil, and *he only holds one-third of it as a gift from his testator. A residuary devisee cannot be considered as having any interest from his testator until the testator's debts are paid. A man must be just before he is generous.

If James Harrison had left unpaid debts enough to absorb the whole of the Mason land, F. E. Harrison would really have received nothing from him in respect to that land, and if a debt of James Harrison takes a part of it, the same principle pro tanto must apply. The debt must be paid first, and then the thirds of James W. Harrison and Mrs. Whitner would be limited to what remained after the debt of the ancestor was paid out of it, or, having already received their shares of the whole, they must each pay one-third of the debt. It cannot alter the case that one of the residuary devisees is also the creditor of the ancestor seeking payment.

If, on the other hand, the execution of the codicil, by specifically giving the Mason land to F. E. Harrison, charged as aforesaid, took it out of the residuum, then it would follow that said land would not be any more liable for this debt of the ancestor than any other lands which passed under the will of James Harrison which are still in possession of the devisee. So that, in any view of the case, we think that the judgment would affect the interest of James W. Harrison, and that it was error to admit him as a witness against the administrator of F. E. Harrison as to communications had with him in his life-time. That he had sold his interest in the Mason tract of land to his brother, makes no difference; the words are "or the interest previously owned or represented by him."

James H. Whitner, the other executor of James Harrison, does not seem to have any interest in the event of the suit which would be affected by the judgment. He is the son of Mrs. Whitner, but relationship does not disqualify. We do not see that he was an incompetent witness.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, so far as relates to the claim of a charge upon the Mason tract of land to the extent of one-third of its value, and that in all other respects the decree be set aside without prejudice, and the case remanded for further evidence and *consideration. If the claim of Mrs. Whitner against the estate of her father, James Harrison, should be established in whole or in part, the said recovery to be paid in equal parts by the three devisees, viz.: one-third by James W. Harrison, one-third by Mrs. Whitner herself, and only the remaining third by the estate of Francis E. Harrison, deceased.

Before Hudson, J., Union, March, 1881.

The facts of this case appear in the opinion. The Circuit decree, after a statement of these same facts, was as follows:

It seems to the court that the purchasers of these lands would have been proper parties to this cause, but as no objection has been taken by the pleadings to their non-joinder, I will consider the case as between the parties to the cause. The case discloses

*an equity in the plaintiff, which entitles her, as against her co-distributees, to a part of the relief which she demands.

The Court of Probate established by the constitution of 1868 was designed to take the place of the Court of Ordinary, but with enlarged powers. From the fact that the Court of Ordinary exercised jurisdiction in cases of partition within certain limits, no question was made of the right and power of the legislature to confer jurisdiction upon Courts of Probate, in cases of partition. The legislature of the summer of 1868, in their act organizing the Courts of Probate, conferred upon such courts jurisdiction in all cases of partition. No question was made of the constitutionality of this act. Lawyers in all parts of the State acted under it, Courts of Probate exercised this jurisdiction unchallenged, and the Circuit Courts recognized it and adjudged questions arising from such proceedings. Lands sold under orders of the Courts of Probate, realized the same prices as when sold under judgments of the Circuit Courts. The Supreme Court of this State recognized this jurisdiction in the Courts of Probate, and adjudged without question rights which arose out of such sales.

In McNamee v. Waterbury, 4 S. C. 156, a case of November Term, 1872, the Supreme Court was called upon to determine whether the Courts of Probate of this State could order the sale of the lands of a decedent in aid of assets, upon proper application by the administrator of an insolvent estate. The court held that the Courts of Probate did possess such power; and the titles of the purchasers at such sale were held to be valid. There was in this case a dissent by Chief Justice Moses; but in neither the opinion of the court nor in the dissenting opinion is there any suggestion of doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Probate in matters of partition; and Chief Justice Moses used expressions which show that he considered the Court of Probate possessed of the jurisdiction theretofore exercised by Courts of Ordinary. It is manifest that if Courts of Probate could exercise jurisdiction to sell land in aid of assets, they could in all cases, when the lands sold for more than sufficient to pay the debts, indirectly accomplish partition among the heirs.

Caskey, 8 S. C. 282, the *question was as to the ownership of the growing crop upon lands sold by the Probate Court for partition. The right thus springing wholly out of one of these sales is not questioned, but, on the contrary, the court, in their opinion, speak of the sale as a valid sale, of the parties as bound by the proceedings, and that a party to the cause was estopped from asserting in his own right, or as guardian for his children, any title to the growing crops.

It thus appears that not only the profession at large, and the Probate Courts, but the Circuit Courts and the Supreme Court have all recognized and acted upon a conceded jurisdiction to Courts of Probate in matters of partition. Communis error facit jus. Under this conceded and recognized jurisdiction, from 1868 to 1878, thousands of acres of land have been sold in all parts of the State, a vast amount of money invested, conveyances and reconveyances made, titles and rights vested; and innocent purchasers, acting under this common error, shared by legislatures, lawyers and courts, have become involved. I cannot think that the decision in Davenport v. Caldwell, 10 S. C. 317, can affect rights thus vested; that it can have any retroactive effect. The question of jurisdiction raised at a late stage of that case in the Supreme Court, as I have been informed, required from that court an examination of the question and a decision; but I am satisfied that the decision there made cannot have any retroactive effect—cannot undo what had been done without question in a vast number of cases in the Probate Courts generally throughout the State, with the sanction of the Circuit Courts and under the recognition of the Supreme Court.

Rights vesting under such circumstances cannot be disturbed by subsequent decisions of a contrary effect. In Gelpeke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175 [17 L. Ed. 520], the Supreme Court of the United States held that holders of municipal bonds issued under an act of the legislature of Iowa, sustained by the courts of that State, were valid obligations notwithstanding a later decision by the Supreme Court of Iowa, that such act of the legislature was invalid. In delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Swayne quotes with approval the doctrine in the words of The Ohio Life and Trust Co. v. De- bolt, 16 How. 432 [14 L. Ed. 997] as follows: "The sound and true rule is, that if the contract when made was *valid by the laws of the State, as then expounded by all departments of the government, and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent action of legislation or decisions of its courts altering the construction of the law." This rule is cited at length and approved in the Bond Debt Cases, 12 S. C. 282: "To hold otherwise would be as unjust as to hold that rights acquired under a statute may be lost by its repeal."

In The State, ex relatione Brown, v. The Chester and Lenoir Railroad Company, 13 S. C. 290, it was held that the county commissioners of York had no power to issue certain railroad aid bonds, but having been issued and their issue approved by the Circuit Court, and the appeal from that decision dismissed by the Supreme Court, that the bonds could not now be affected by the want of authority to issue.

The same rule governs when rights of property and titles to land have become fixed by common acceptance and consent of courts and people. And settled rules cannot be reversed and vested rights disturbed, by a decision of the courts against the correctness of such construction. Such a decision only affects the case under consideration, and establishes a new rule for the future, but does not act retrospectively. I, therefore, think that this sale, having been made prior to the decision in Davenport v. Caldwell, should not be affected by that judgment.

The complaint prays that the sales be validated and confirmed, but, as the sales were void, this prayer cannot be granted. Nevertheless, rights may be vested under void sales, and rights have vested under these sales, which should be protected; and every party to the proceedings under which the sales were made is estopped from asserting the invalidity of the sale, or questioning the titles of the purchasers, unless prepared to restore things to the exact status of the day of sale. But this is just what the infant defendants allege cannot be done, because of the inability of their guardians to have the money forthcoming. In no case whatever would equity allow either minors or adults to retain the money and regain the land also. They would alike be estopped in this attempt. The parties to this cause should, therefore, be restrained from hereafter asserting any claim, title *or interest in or to these lands by reason of any invalidity in the sales made by the Court of Probate.

It is therefore adjudged, that the plaintiff and all the defendants to this cause, the widow and children of the late Dr. John N. Herndon, late of Union county, deceased, be and they are hereby perpetually enjoined and restrained from ever bringing any action or suit to recover the possession of the lands of the said Dr. Herndon, or any tract or tracts or portions thereof, or any interest therein derived by inheritance from the said Dr. John N. Herndon, and from ever asserting any interest therein, or to any share or portion thereof, as distributees of the said Dr. Herndon, so far as the said lands were sold or pretended to be sold under proceedings instituted in the Court of Probate for Union county, in September, 1872, and in a cause entitled Caroline E. Herndon v. M. L. Moore and others.

Mr. David Johnson, Jr., for appellants.

On the point upon which the judgment of the court is rested, counsel's argument was as follows: The sales are admitted to be void. It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that this is giving to proceedings confessedly void, ending in a sale confessedly void, the essentials of a judgment, and at the same time admitting that the court of probate could render no judgment in actions for partition. In Davenport v. Caldwell, we have the first authoritative construction of the section of the constitution conferring jurisdiction upon courts of probate. This construction established no new rule, but declared what had been the law since 1868. Then, the court was without jurisdiction when this sale was made; yet the questions involved have become res adjudicata; minors are enjoined from asserting rights divested by a void proceeding. Further, minors represented by a guardian ad litem, appointed without authority, whose property has been sold and the proceeds paid over to guardians without warrant of law, are held to be estopped "unless prepared to restore things to the exact status of the day of sale."

With the most profound deference to his Honor, the Circuit judge, it must be said that these conclusions are inconsistent with the principles declared in the authorities cited for their support, and are irreconcilable with the plainest principles of law and equity. [After commenting upon the cases cited in the Circuit decree, the argument proceeded.] With regard to the jurisdiction of the Probate Court, there had been no adjudication up to 1878. This statement of fact destroys every semblance of analogy to the cases cited in the decree. The reason of the rule not existing, the rule has no application.

But, it is said, the jurisdiction was the result of an act of the legislature, was recognized by the courts of the State, and acquiesced in by the people. Can unconstitutional acts of the legislature, and the non-action of courts sua sponte, have such an effect upon legal questions that they will become res adjudicata to all the State? The acquiescence of the people can have no more effect upon the questions here involved than the acts of the lynchers of Judy Metts upon the criminal law of the country. The rule in Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, rests upon solemn decisions of a court of last resort in relation to contracts. The decree here rests upon the non-action of courts and the consent of the people. In the one case, the court of last resort declared in favor of the power to contract, and the bonds were negotiated with reference to that decision. In the other case, the court of last resort declared against the power the first time its power was invoked.

If this case is to be determined by the principles of the law of contract, then the rule is as laid down in the Bond Debt Cases, 12 S. C. 277, that bonds issued by the legislature without authority are void. It does not conflict with the rule declared in Gelpcke v. Dubuque, and rests upon the same broad principle that declares the act of a court without jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action absolutely and incurably void. The rule contended for should apply with peculiar force in cases involving the rights of minors. The magnitude of the interests that may be affected, the hardships that may result indirectly from the decision, cannot affect the conclusion. It is a question of legal science which must be determined by the application of the universal principles of that science. Mr. Justice Story (2 Sumner 354) says: "It is not for courts of justice to provide for all the defects or mischiefs of imperfect legislation." And in his Cond. L. 17, he says: "Arguments drawn from impolicy or inconvenience ought to have but little weight. The only sound principle is to declare ita lex scripta est—to follow and obey."

Mr. R. R. Rawls, same side.

January 9th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Dr. John N. Herndon, of Union, died intestate in March, 1872, possessed of considerable real and personal property, leaving surviving him, as distributees, his widow, Caroline E. Herndon, the plaintiff, and six children, viz., the defendants, Mrs. Mary L. Moore, Blanche Herndon, Addie Herndon, Eliza Herndon, John Herndon and Cornelia Herndon. Soon after his death (1872) the plaintiff, his widow, instituted proceedings in the Court of Probate for Union county, against the other distributees, to partition the lands of the estate, considerable in extent and value, and lying in the counties of Union, Newberry and Laurens. Blanche, Addie, Eliza, John and Cornelia, were minors, represented by guardians ad litem, and the proceedings in all other respects were regular and formal. The Probate judge, to effect partition, granted order of sale, and the lands were sold, those in Union for $12,866, those in Newberry for $32,859, and those in Laurens for $1,475; aggregating the sum of $47,200. The purchasers complied with the terms of sale and received titles. The purchase-money of the lands was also paid and distributed among the parties, and the business nearly ended. The lands brought full value.

Matters stood in this condition for six years, until 1878, when this court filed its judgment in the case of Davenport v. Caldwell, 10 S. C. 317, which declared that the act of the legislature, giving to the Probate Court jurisdiction to partition lands, was unconstitutional and void. In November, 1879, the plaintiff, Caroline E. Herndon (who had also been plaintiff in the proceedings before the Probate Court), fearing that some of the parties, in consequence of that decision, might make an effort to *disturb the proceedings had, as stated, in the Probate Court, instituted this action in the Court of Common Pleas, against the other distributees, to validate that proceeding in the Probate Court, and quiet the titles thereunder, and to restrain and perpetually enjoin each and all of the distributees from prosecuting any action for the recovery of the lands, or any part of them, or any interest therein under a claim by inheritance from Dr. John N. Herndon, deceased.

The adult defendants interposed no objections. The defendant Addie, a minor at the time the action was brought, has since attained her majority, and, by her answer, joins in the prayer of the complaint. The infants Eliza and Cornelia, answer by their guardian ad litem, David Johnson, Esq., and the infant John answers by his guardian ad litem, R. R. Rawls, Esq., and object to the confirmation prayed for. The clerk of the court as referee took the testimony, and reported the record of the proceedings in the Probate Court, that nearly all the purchase-money had been paid into the office of the judge of Probate according to the terms of sale, and by him paid out to the distributees respectively; that the shares of the infant distributees were paid to their guardians, duly appointed; that all the guardianship bonds were good at the time they were taken; that the bonds of the guardians of Blanche and Addie are still good; that the bond of the guardian of Eliza is not good for the amount of the penalty, and that the bonds of the guardians of John and Cornelia are worthless and not good for any amount.

The case came on to be heard before Judge Hudson, who held that the sales under the proceedings in the Probate Court, having been made prior to the decision in Davenport v. Caldwell, should not be affected by that judgment, and that all the parties "to the proceedings under which the sales were made are estopped from asserting the invalidity of the sale or questioning the titles of the purchasers, unless prepared to restore things to the exact status of the day of sale, * * * in no case whatever would equity allow either minors or adults to retain the money and regain the land also. They would alike be estopped in this attempt. The parties to the cause should therefore be restrained from hereafter asserting any claim, title or interest in *or to these lands by reason of any invalidity in the sales by the Court of Probate," &c.

From this decree the minors Eliza, Cornelia and John appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because his Honor decides 'That the case discloses an equity in the plaintiff which entitles her, as against her co-distributees, to a part of the relief which she demands.'

2. "Because his Honor decides 'That it would be giving retroactive effect to the decision in the cause of Davenport v. Caldwell, 10 S. C. 317, to refuse the perpetual injunction prayed for.'

3. "Because his Honor decides 'That every party to the proceedings under which the sales were made is estopped from asserting the invalidity of the sale or questioning the titles of the purchasers, unless prepared to restore things to the exact status of the day of sale.'

4. "Because his Honor should have decided that the plaintiff had no cause of action against the defendants.

5. "Because his Honor should have decided that inasmuch as the Court of Probate was without jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action for the partition or sale of the real estate of Dr. John N. Herndon, that said sale was a nullity so far as rights of the infants in said real estate were concerned, and that the receipt by the Court of Probate of the infants' distributive share of the proceeds of said sale, and payment thereof to the general guardian of said infants, was without authority of law, could not operate as an estoppel, and divested no rights of said infants in the real estate sold.

6. "Because his Honor decides 'That because of the common error as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Probate in actions for partition of real estate, participated in by the lawyers, legislature and the courts of the State, the rights of purchasers at said sales anterior to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Davenport v. Caldwell are as full, and the titles to property purchased at said sales are as perfect, as they would be if there had been no lack of jurisdiction in the court making the sale.'

This action having been brought in the Court of Common Pleas to validate certain proceedings previously had in a court *of limited jurisdiction alleged to be void, and to enjoin all the parties, plaintiffs and defendants from claiming title or interest in certain lands sold or conveyed, under the orders of that court, in a proceeding in which the identical parties were before it, we agree with the Circuit judge that it would have been more regular if the purchasers under the order of said court, whose titles are substantially in issue, had been made parties, but as the appellants declare "a desire to have an authentic decision of the court of last resort as to the effect of a Probate Court sale in partition proceedings upon the rights of minors," we do not feel called upon to order the case back to the Circuit in order that additional parties may be made. We assume that the purchasers are desirous of retaining the lands purchased by them and proceed to consider the case.

Besides the case itself, the question involved is one not only of novel impression but of great importance, effecting as it does titles to thousands of acres of land purchased bona fide by innocent parties without notice, on the faith of the orders of the Probate Court, made in conformity with the express terms of an act of the legislature, the opinion of the courts and a practice well nigh universal. Under these circumstances the court ordered a re-argument of the case, and in doing so gave permission of the counsel to examine the grounds upon which the case of Davenport v. Caldwell was rested, and the extent to which the judgment as an authority must necessarily go. Exhaustive arguments have been made here upon the subject, and, in order that the law may be regarded as no longer in doubt, we will preface the judgment we are about to render by a few observations upon that case and the circumstances under which it was decided.

Under our old law the ordinary had jurisdiction to partition real estate not exceeding in value $1,000. The constitution of 1868 abolished the old Court of Equity, and made a new division of judicial powers. It created the Probate Court, giving it generally the jurisdiction of the old Court of Ordinary and also additional powers, but without expressly naming the power to partition lands even to the extent of $1,000. Upon the subject of partition, as a distinct matter of jurisdiction, it is entirely silent. The provision is in these words (Art. IV., § 20):

"A *Court of Probate shall be established in each county, with jurisdiction in all matters testamentary and of administration, in business appertaining to minors and lunacy, and persons non compotes mentis," &c.

Soon after the adoption of the constitution, and to a large extent by the persons who framed it, the legislature, in 1868, passed an act "To define the jurisdiction and regulate the practice of Probate Courts," which, among other things, provided that "every judge of Probate, in his county, shall have jurisdiction in all matters testamentary and of administration, in business appertaining to minors and lunacy and persons non compotes mentis. * * * He may exercise jurisdiction of all petitions for partition of real estate when no dispute exists in relation to the title thereof; and when the title to such real estate is disputed, he shall refer the same to the Circuit Court for adjudication, unless the parties shall consent to his determination of the same." &c. 14 Stat. 77.

This express grant of jurisdiction contained in the act was exercised by the different Probate Courts, and lands in all parts of the State were without question partitioned under it until 1878, when, as stated, the judgment of this court was filed in the case of Davenport v. Caldwell, supra. That was a petition in the Probate Court of Abbeville county to partition lands of an intestate between two adults as heirs-at-law of one Caldwell. The precise question was whether the petitioner, Katie Davenport, a person of color, born of slave parents before emancipation, and who were dead before that event, was legally the sister and heir of the intestate, and as such entitled to a share of his lands, and, if so, she prayed partition of a tract of land of the intestate. The judge of Probate decided that the petitioner was an heir-at-law under the statute of distributions, and, as a consequence, issued orders to partition the land between the widow and sister. The Circuit Court affirmed this judgment, and upon appeal this court also affirmed the judgment upon the point of heirship, but denied petitioner's right to partition upon the ground that the Probate Court had no jurisdiction to partition lands. The court say "the Court of Probate is unquestionably a court of inferior and limited jurisdiction, and, looking to the constitution for the *limits of the jurisdiction of the court, we find the limit is defined in section 20, article IV., and, as there defined, cases for the partition of real estate are not embraced," and ordered that "the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded with instructions that the proceedings in the Court of Probate be dismissed, so far as they relate to partition of real estate."

It appears that there were no minors interested in the case, and the question in that aspect could not have been considered. Indeed, there seems to have been very little argument at the bar on the subject of the constitutionality of the act conferring the jurisdiction, but the question was made in the brief, and the judgment furnishes evidence that the case, at least upon some of the points involved, was fully considered by the court. The constitutional point being in the record, the court held the general proposition without qualifications that the act of the legislature, purporting to give the Probate Court jurisdiction in the partition of lands, was unauthorized by the constitution and void. There were other questions in the case which were, as stated, elaborately considered, but this one also was distinctly decided. The judgment proceeded on the ground that the section of the constitution conferring jurisdiction upon the Probate Court was exhaustive in its character, and inhibited the legislature from adding thereto.

If the question were still open, we are not prepared to say that the judgment was erroneous. There are several obvious points of difference in the circumstances of that case, and those in Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. v. Campbell & Co., 15 S. C. 581 [40 Am. Rep. 705], cited at the bar, which gives a different construction to what is called the "married woman's clause" of the constitution. Influenced by these considerations, and a strong sense of the importance of preserving uniformity and consistency in the interpretation of the laws, we will not re-open the argument involved in the case, but stand upon the principle of stare decisis.

It is true there were no minors interested in the case, but we see nothing in our law to sustain the view that the legislature, without regard to the limited jurisdiction given to the Probate Court, has the right as parens patriæ, without a case made, to authorize the judge of Probate to sell or partition the property *of one not sui juris. The constitution divided the functions of government into the legislative, executive and judicial, and it is the fundamental theory of our system that the departments shall be kept separate, and each in its own sphere, independent of the others. The power claimed to exist, especially when the property of the person to be sold is owned in common with others, is clearly judicial in its character, and all judicial power has been taken away from the legislature and deposited in the courts of the State, created or to be created. Besides, if such power did exist in the legislature, it is plain that the act in question was not intended to be the exercise of such power, but a general law manifestly intended to confer jurisdiction in a particular matter upon a court already in existence. Cooley Const. Lim. 97, 98.

It seems to us also that we cannot derive the jurisdiction from the words of the constitution in "all matters testamentary and of administration." By these words nothing more was meant, as we suppose, than matters appertaining to proceedings in an Orphans' Court, in supervising and directing executors and administrators in the discharge of their duties. This would seem to be the ordinary meaning of the words, not as conferring jurisdiction in any particular matter, but rather indicating the character of matters properly belonging to that court. Where there are no debts of an intestate, parties interested in his lands may take by partition their shares of the land itself in severalty, without sale, and we can hardly suppose that the most liberal construction of the words "matters of administration" would include such a proceeding. What are matters of administration must be determined by the laws of the State, existing at the time the language in question was introduced into the constitution. The object of administration is to pay the debts of the deceased, and distribute his personal estate among those entitled to it, and any act that may properly be performed by an administrator looking to this end, is a matter of administration. McNamee v. Waterbury, 4 S. C. 156.

Nor can we say that the words in the constitution granting jurisdiction to the Probate Court "in business appertaining to minors" gives to that court the right to partition land quoad the interest of minors. "Jurisdiction of the subject matter is a *condition precedent to the acquisition of authority over the parties, and is conferred by the authority which organizes the court and is sought for in the general nature of its powers, or in authority specially conferred." Freem. Judg., § 119. It seems to us that jurisdiction of a subject matter given to a court must be an entirety, and cannot be given in part only, to be determined by the ages of the respective parties who may be interested. It is true that the words "in business appertaining to minors" seem very general and comprehensive, but taken altogether they can hardly mean more than "business peculiar to minors." Otherwise any case upon any subject in which minors happened to be interested, would be, to that extent, carried into the Probate Court, which division of cases would necessarily lead to inextricable confusion.

Assuming, then, that the decision in Davenport v. Caldwell must stand without limitation or qualification as to infants, as well as to adults, what then must be the effect of it upon the proceedings in the case of Herndon v. Moore, which had been instituted in the Probate Court and nearly ended long before that judgment was filed? Does it follow that the innocent purchasers at the sale ordered by the Probate Court in the Herndon case, who purchased in good faith and paid for lands sold under proceedings expressly authorized by a law standing upon the statute book, must be required to yield up their lands to be again partitioned? We cannot accept a conclusion which would open up such a prolific source of litigation and result in such flagrant injustice.

In the first place there can be no doubt that all persons of full age, who were parties to the proceedings of Herndon v. Moore in the Probate Court, are estopped from denying the validity of those proceedings. When land descends to heirs upon the death of an intestate, they become the legal owners as coparceners and may enjoy it in common, or divide it among themselves, or they may go into the courts provided by law for that purpose. When they choose to do the latter, they select the court and its officers as the instrumentality through which to effect partition, and they are bound by the acts of that court, as in one sense their agent. Commissioner v. Thompson, 4 McC. 434. Whether that court had constitutional jurisdiction or not, they consented to its proceedings. They held it out as authorized to act in the matter for them, they did not appeal from its order of sale, and they are estopped from claiming against their own sales made in this way for the purpose of partition. "If lands be sold at a partition or other Chancery sale, no co-tenant who has claimed and received his share of the proceeds, can deny the validity of the partition." Freeman Vold J. S. § 48; Story Eq. Jur. 387; McNish v. Guerard, 4 Strob. Eq. 76.

So far as the adult parties are concerned there can be no doubt that the purchasers are entitled to hold the land. It may be true that in this view they do not get title. It is not the office of an estoppel to pass the title, which remains unaffected, but it cannot be asserted against the party who acted upon the faith of the representations which created the estoppel. Big. Estop. 450.

It is, however, strongly urged upon us that the result must be different as to the minors, Eliza, Cornelia and John, who, being under the disability of infancy, could do no act, either in going into the Probate Court or in confirming the sales afterwards.

Estoppel in pais ordinarily is based upon the conduct of parties, and as minors are incapable of responsible action, it would seem to follow that as a general rule the doctrine of technical estoppel has no application to them. This rule, however, is not without exceptions. Minors, of age of discretion, are certainly liable ex delicto for fraudulent misrepresentations as to title, and in such case, to prevent circuitry of action, the court will in the first instance charge the land in favor of the purchaser with the amount of the purchase-money. Big. Estop. 448. It is, however, unnecessary to pursue this view, as it is not claimed that any such representations were made by the minors in this case.

But a higher right is invoked in behalf of the purchasers, which, under the circumstances of the case, we think they are entitled to. This does not rest upon any theory of confirmation by the parties, but upon the fact that the purchasers bought bona fide at a sale judicial in form, at the time believed to be valid, and paid the purchase-money for the land thus purchased. It is urged that the sale for partition by the Probate Court in the case of Herndon, having been made prior to the decision in **Davenport v. Caldwell*, and while the jurisdiction of the Probate Court was generally recognized, should not be affected by that judgment. Certainly the judgment in that case only bound the parties before the court, but a decision of the Supreme Court upon a constitutional question, not only affects the case before the court, but stands as an authoritative construction of the clause interpreted, and, as a general rule, is conclusive upon other cases involving the same question.

This is certainly true of all cases arising after the decision. And although in its effect upon cases decided before, there may be something of the element which makes ex post facto laws so objectionable, yet there is undoubtedly a difference in effect between repealing a valid law, and declaring that one in form never was law. In the former case all acts done and rights vested under the law before its repeal, will be maintained, while in the latter the declaration of its unconstitutionality ordinarily reaches back to the date of the act itself. But there is an exception as to a class of cases in which, for sufficient reasons, the declaration of the unconstitutionality of a law is not allowed to have greater effect than a simple repeal sustaining all acts done and all judicial proceedings had under it before such declaration, in analogy to the principle of res adjudicata.

In such case, rights acquired under an act having the form of law, are sustained, although the act be afterwards declared unconstitutional upon the principle involved in the maxim communis error facit jus. This proceeds upon the view that to annul everything done under an act solemnly passed by the lawmaking power of the State, generally received as valid and so expounded and administered by courts of justice, would operate as a fraud upon the parties thus misled. This doctrine, although exceptional in character, is well sustained by authority. Mr. Wharton, in his law of evidence, section 1242, says: "It should also be kept in mind that there are cases in which communis error facit jus, and in which therefore the courts will sanction a prevalent construction which is erroneous, rather than disturb titles which have been settled under such construction."

Perhaps the leading case upon the subject in this country is that of Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175 [17 L. Ed. 520]. It appears in *that case that the legislature of Iowa passed a law authorizing the city of Dubuque to aid in the construction of a certain railroad by issuing bonds in pursuance of a vote of the citizens of the city. The Supreme Court of the State decided that the legislature had the right to authorize municipal corporations to subscribe to railroads extending beyond the limits of the city or county, and to issue bonds accordingly. During the time the law was thus expounded, bonds were issued upon the faith of it. Afterwards, the Supreme Court of the State decided that the legislature had no such power. It was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the latest decision, declaring the act unconstitutional, did not affect rights which had been acquired before its rendition, thus giving the judgment the effect only of the repeal of a valid law. In delivering the judgment of the court, Mr. Justice Swayne said: "However we may regard the late case in Iowa as affecting the future, it can have no effect upon the past. The sound and true rule is that if the contract, when made, was valid by the law of the State, as then expounded by all departments of the government, and administered in the courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent act of the legislature of the State, or decisions of its courts altering the construction of the law. Ohio Life and Trust Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 432 [14 L. Ed. 997]."

The same principle applies where there is a change of judicial decisions as to the constitutional power of the legislature to enact the law. It rests upon the plainest principles of justice. "To hold otherwise would be as unjust as to hold that rights acquired under a statute may be lost by its repeal." This principle has been incidentally recognized in our State in the Bond Debt Cases, 12 S. C. 282, and also in the case, State, ex rel. Brown, v. C. and L. R. R. Co., 13 S. C. 291. In the Bond Debt Cases, Mr. Justice McIver, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "This rule was again affirmed in the case of Lee Co. v. Rodgers, 7 Wall. 181 [19 L. Ed. 160], and the question was there said not to be open for re-examination in the Supreme Court of the United States. It is perfectly manifest, therefore, that even were we to overrule the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. The Comptroller-General [4 S. C. 430], it would not help the case of the State, in view of the rule thus *firmly established (whether correctly or not we are not called upon to say) in the tribunal of last resort."

In England they have no written instrument which embodies in form the fundamental law, but the doctrine has always been recognized there, especially in reference to conveyances of real estate. In Broom Max. 141, under the head of communis error facit jus, it is said: "The law so favors the public good that it will in some cases permit a common error to pass for right, as an instance of which may be mentioned the case of common recoveries, which were fictitious proceedings introduced by a kind of pia fraud to elude the statute de donis, and which were yet allowed by the courts to be a bar to an estate tail, so that these recoveries, however clandestinely introduced, became by long usage and acquiescence a most common assurance of lands, and were looked upon as the legal mode of conveyance whereby tenant in tail might dispose of lands and tenements."

In Jones v. Tapling, 12 Com. B. (N. S.) 846, Mr. Justice Blackburn said: "There are cases in which a decision originally erroneously has been so long acquiesced in and acted on, that a return to the proper principle would greatly affect existing interests. This is peculiarly the case in questions of conveyancing lands. There the maxim applies, communis error facit jus."

In Regina v. Sussex, 2 Best & S. 680, the same judge said: "I think there are cases in which a mistaken notion of the law has, no matter why, become so generally accepted by and acted upon as to render it probable that business has been regulated, and the position of the parties altered in consequence; and in such cases we may hold that the general acceptance of the mistake has made that law which was originally error."

In the case of Isherwood v. Olknow, 3 M. & S. 396, (54 Geo. III.,) Lord Ellenborough said: "It has sometimes been said communis error facit jus, but I say communis opinio is evidence of what the law is, not where it is an opinion merely speculative and theoretical floating in the minds of persons, but where it has been the groundwork and substratum of practice."

In the great case in the House of Lords of Phipps v. Ackers, 9 Cl. & F. 598, Lord Brougham said: "The courts and even the house have frequently proceeded upon this principle, and *have sanctioned what even plainly appeared to be erroneous principles introduced and long assumed as law, rather than occasion the great inconvenience that must arise from correcting the common error and recurring to more accurate views."

All the cases which admit the principle at the same time declare that it is exceptional and should be applied with the greatest care. Do the facts of this case fairly bring it within the rule as announced by Lord Ellenborough, that it is not enough that the erroneous opinion be merely speculative and floating in the mind, but must furnish "the groundwork and substratum of practice." We cannot resist the conclusion that the facts here make such a case. The partition sale ordered was in no sense tortious, and it would operate as a fraud upon innocent parties to vacate the titles acquired under proceedings in the Probate Court, established by authority of the State, and the parties thereby invited to use it for the purpose of partition. The legislature at its first session after the adoption of the constitution, on September 21st, 1868, passed "An act to define the jurisdiction and regulate the practice of the Probate Court," by which jurisdiction was expressly given to that court to partition lands. This might well be considered as a contemporaneous construction of the constitution. This act was re-affirmed in the code of 1870, and re-enacted again in the general statutes in 1872.

For more than ten years, until November, 1878, when Davenport v. Caldwell was decided, it was generally accepted as the undoubted law of the State. The jurisdiction was exercised without challenge, and a great number of cases were instituted in that court and thousands of acres of land sold in all parts of the State. As Judge Hudson says: "Lawyers in all parts of the State acted under it, Courts of Probate exercised this jurisdiction unchallenged, and the Circuit Courts recognized it and adjudged questions arising from such proceedings." The truth is that all parties acted in good faith and were misled. According to our view, the proceedings for partition of Herndon's estate, regularly had in the Probate Court, prior to the decision of Davenport v. Caldwell, should be held binding upon all the parties concerned.

*The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 160; Dec. Dig.  $\hookrightarrow$  40.]

This case was heard in connection with the case of Herndon v. Moore, ante p. 339, and involved the same questions. The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Moorman & Simkins, J. Y. Culbreath, for appellants.

Messrs. Jones & Jones, contra.

January 9th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This case was heard in connection with that of Herndon v. Moore, just decided, ante p. 339. That was an action to validate proceedings in partition before a Probate Court, and this is the counterpart of it—to ignore entirely such proceedings as void and partition the lands anew—but the principles announced in that case must be conclusive of this, except in so far as the facts may differ.

The facts of this case are as follows: Elisha K. Schumpert, of Newberry, died intestate, leaving distributees—a widow, Mattie, now the wife of Smith, and children, William F. Schumpert, Harriet M. Moseley, Beauregard S. Schumpert, John E. Schumpert, Franklin E. Schumpert, Frederick L. Schumpert and James C. Schumpert. Some of these are minors, but which does not appear. The intestate died seized and possessed of lands, and it seems that it is probable the personal assets will not be sufficient to pay the debts of his estate.

*However that may be, the appellant, William F. Schumpert, filed a petition in the Probate Court of Newberry county, to partition the lands among the distributees, of whom he was one. In order to effect partition, the judge of Probate ordered the lands sold, and accordingly they were sold on sales day in November, 1878, in three separate tracts, upon the terms one-third cash and the remainder in two equal annual installments, secured by bond and mortgage of the premises sold. The plaintiff bid off tract No. 1, Benjamin F. Nickols took No. 2, and Brown & Moseley No. 3. Brown & Moseley and Nichols, respectively, complied with the terms of sale, paid the cash installment into the Probate Court, and were let into the possession of the lands purchased by them. William F. Schumpert did not comply with the terms of sale as to the tract of land purchased by him.

The matter stood in this condition when this court decided the case of Davenport v. Caldwell, 10 S. C. 317, holding that the act of the legislature passed in September, 1868, purporting to give to the Probate Court jurisdiction to partition lands, was unconstitutional and void. Whereupon, in September, 1879, William F. Schumpert, the plaintiff, who had been the actor also in the Probate proceedings, instituted this action in the Court of Common Pleas, to partition the lands anew, simply reciting the former proceedings before the Probate Court, and proposing to ignore and disregard them as absolutely void. The heirs, as well as the administrator of the intestate, were made parties, as also the purchasers at the Probate sales. The widow, Mattie (now Smith), answered, concurring in the prayer of the complaint for a new partition. The guardian ad litem of the infant defendants submitted their rights, and the purchaser, Nickols, resisted the new partition and insisted that he should not be disturbed in the possession of lands which he had purchased bona fide at a judicial sale for full value, and had paid the purchase-money and made improvements thereon.

The case was heard by Judge Wallace, who ordered the complaint to be dismissed. From this order William F. Schumpert and Mrs. Smith, and the infant defendants, by their guardian, James Y. Culbreath, Esq., appeal to this court upon the following ground: "Because the presiding judge erred in dismissing the complaint for the reason, as he stated, that the sale of the land made by the Probate judge was a good and valid sale, as shown by the facts set forth in the pleadings."

This court has just held, in the case of Herndon v. Moore, ante p. 339, "that proceedings for partition regularly had in the Probate Court prior to November 27th, 1878, when the judgment in the case of Davenport v. Caldwell was filed, should be held binding upon all the parties concerned." That judgment is conclusive of this case, and reference is made to it, without repeating here the grounds upon which it was placed.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

O'NEILL v. O'NEILL.

[Executors and Administrators ⚡221.]

An unpaid due bill signed by a decedent in favor of another and found among his papers after his death, is not of itself sufficient to establish an existing legal obligation. But where coupled with confidential communications by decedent to his brother and executor, made orally just before his death and contained in a letter found in his private box after death, stating that it represented an amount of money belonging to the payees of the due bill "misaid or mismanaged" by decedent while their confidential agent, and which he thereby instructed his brother and executor to pay in some private manner, the due bill will be sustained as evidence of a debt due by the decedent to the payees.

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, June, 1881.

The facts of this case are all stated in the opinion. Upon these facts W. D. Clancy, Esq., master, to whom the case had been referred for inquiry and report, reported as follows:

The character of the paper found in the tin box of Edward O'Neill, addressed to his brother (Dennis O'Neill), and containing a due bill in favor of Douglass, Jackson & Pickett for fifteen hundred dollars, not delivered to them in the life-time of the testator, is not such an obligation to pay money as will warrant the executor in paying this sum as a legally established claim against the estate of the testator. The will of Edward O'Neill must be regarded as the voice of the dead man speaking as to all dispositions to be made of his estate, and any other paper lacking the formality required by law, however solemn its moral import, is, as a legal paper, null and void. The executor in this case gave public notice, calling upon persons having claims against the estate of Edward O'Neill to come in and establish the same. It does not appear that Douglass, Jackson & Pickett made any claim as creditors, nor is it surprising that they did not from the nature of O'Neill's letter.

Jackson and Pickett, survivors of Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, excepted to this report. Upon this exception the circuit decree was as follows:

There can be no doubt that in some manner, known only to the deceased, he was indebted to Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, in this amount; that the obligation to pay it pressed on his conscience, and that discharging himself of the obligation by payment of the money, he wished to conceal from the parties all knowledge of his connection with the money so paid. It is not possible to discover that secret, which he carried with him to the grave. It is not necessary that it should be known. His confession of his indebtedness is the highest evidence that can be given of the fact that he owed this money to these parties, and that he died in the expectation that they would receive it. If it has so happened that the secrecy he so much desired has not been secured, that does not affect the question of fact of his indebtedness. Of that, there cannot be a doubt; the evidence establishes the fact of the indebtedness of the testator to Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, and the exception of the parties to the report of the master on this point is sustained, and the report as to this overruled. * * * It is therefore ordered and decreed, that Douglass, Jackson & Pickett be entitled to receive from the assets of Edward O'Neill in the hands of the plaintiff, as his executor, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, with interest from May 26th, *1879, the date of the written admission of indebtedness; and to have execution therefor, if not paid by the plaintiff; and that the costs of the case be paid from the assets of the testator in the hands of the executor, &c.

From this decree, Mrs. Catherine O'Neill appealed upon five exceptions. The first is immaterial; the others were as follows:

2. Because the Circuit Judge erred in holding that the "letter and due bill" signed by the testator, and found in his private box after his decease, but which had never been delivered to any one in his life-time, were evidence of the fact that the said Edward O'Neill was indebted to Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, at the time of his decease, in the sum of fifteen hundred dollars.

3. Because the Circuit Judge erred in not holding as matter of law that the onus was on Douglass, Jackson & Pickett to show affirmatively that the testator was indebted to them, at the time of his decease, in the sum of fifteen hundred dollars; and further, in not finding that the evidence established simply, that prior to his death the testator imagined that he was indebted to them by reason of some supposed mismanagement or want of care in respect to the moneys which had come into his hands as their agent.

4. Because the Circuit Judge erred in decreeing that Douglass, Jackson & Pickett were "entitled to receive from the assets of Edward O'Neill, in the hands of the plaintiff, as his executor, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, with interest from May 26th, 1879."

5. Because the Circuit Judge erred in admitting as evidence the statements made by the testator to the plaintiff, Dennis O'Neill.

Messrs. Hayne & Ficken, for appellant.

Mr. A. G. Magrath, contra.

January 9th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. The sole question raised by this appeal is whether the estate of the testator, Edward O'Neill, is *liable to pay the survivors of Douglass, Jackson & Pickett a certain alleged debt, for at the argument here the last ground of appeal was abandoned.

The circumstances which gave rise to this claim are peculiar, and may be stated as follows: Edward O'Neill had been for many years in the employment of Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, proprietors of extensive livery stables in the city of Charleston, and had eventually become their confidential clerk and general manager. In 1879 his health began to fail, and, being about to remove to Summerville, he made a confidential communication to his brother Dennis, the plaintiff in this case, which was testified to by Dennis at the hearing before the master, in the following words: "My brother told me, when his health was failing, and when he was about to go to Summerville, that I would find instructions in a letter, in his tin box, what to do in reference to a certain sum of money mismanaged or mislaid during the time when he was in the employment of Douglass, Jackson & Pickett."

The testator died June 27th, 1879, leaving a will dated May 20th, 1879, whereby he appointed his brother Dennis executor, and guardian of his child or children, and, after providing for the payment of all his just debts and funeral expenses, devised and bequeathed his whole estate to his wife, for life, or during widowhood, with remainder to his child or children. The will was duly admitted to probate, the executor qualified and published the usual notice to creditors to present their demands, but no claim was presented by Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, for the reason, as they allege, that they did not then know of any indebtedness on the part of the testator to them. The executor having procured the key of the tin box above referred to, from the testator's house, repaired to the office of the judge of probate in company with the counsel of the widow, where the tin box, which had been obtained from the safe of Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, where the testator was in the habit of keeping it, was opened and found to contain, amongst other things, the will of the testator, and a sealed envelope, addressed "Dennis O'Neill, private," upon which was the following endorsement:

ment: "Don't *open this as long E. O.N. is living." The envelope, when opened, was found to contain the following letter:

"Dear Brother—Pay the amount over to Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, when Wm. Jackson pays you over five thousand dollars. Send it to them by express, so they will not be able to find out who sent it. It will be all right as long as they get the money. This is as near as I can come to the amount. Ask them to forgive me if it is any more. Your B., E. O'Neill. May 26th, 1879."

On the opposite page of the same sheet of paper upon which this letter was written, is the following:

"Charleston, S. C., May, 1879.

"Due Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, fifteen hundred dollars for value received.

"1,500.

E. O'Neill."

The executor having instituted proceedings for the settlement of the estate of his testator, brought to the attention of the court this claim in favor of Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, to the payment of which the widow objected upon the ground that the claim was not a legal one, whereupon the survivors of Douglass, Jackson & Pickett intervened by petition and asked to have the claim paid.

There is no other evidence in support of the claim, except that above stated, and the question for us to determine is whether this evidence is sufficient to establish the claim. The mere fact that the testator signed a paper in the form of a due bill, acknowledging himself indebted to Douglass, Jackson & Pickett in the sum of $1,500, is certainly not of itself sufficient, for the so-called due bill was never delivered. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst., § 63. But the question is whether this, taken in connection with the other evidence, may not be sufficient to establish the legality of the claim. The reason why a paper in the form of a note constitutes no evidence of indebtedness until it is delivered, is because the transaction is inchoate as long as the paper remains *in the possession of the maker, and, at most, only furnishes evidence of an intention to give the note, which may or may not ripen into an act. Until it is delivered, it is entirely under the control of the maker and may be destroyed or canceled by him. It cannot by itself even be regarded as an admission of liability, for, until it is delivered, or until the maker does some irrevocable act showing an intention to deliver, it is simply an admission to himself and amounts to no admission at all. But where a person, after signing such a paper, retains it in his possession, and does other acts or makes other declarations, showing that the retention of possession was not for the purpose of enabling him to destroy or cancel it, in case he should change his mind, but for another and different purpose, entirely consistent with the idea that the paper was regarded by him as the evidence of an absolute, binding contract, constituting a valid obligation, then it seems to us that such a paper may be regarded as furnishing evidence of a legal liability.

There cannot be a doubt, from the evidence in this case, that the testator thought that he was indebted to Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, and that such liability grew out of the fact that while he was in the employment of that firm, he had so improperly "mismanaged or mislaid" some of their money as to make him liable for the same, and that he displayed extreme anxiety to keep this a secret, especially from his employers. This conclusively shows that his sole purpose in retaining possession of the paper in the form of a due bill was to conceal the facts which gave rise to the indebtedness, and not for the purpose of enabling him to cancel the evidence of such indebtedness, or to recall the admission contained in the paper. His declaration to his brother before his death, was an implied admission that he was liable to make good the loss resulting from his mismanagement, the particulars of which were known only to himself; and this, coupled with his written instructions to his brother as to how he wished the loss repaired, cannot be construed in any other light than as an admission of liability and a promise to pay the same, and then the written memorandum in the form of a due bill indicated the amount for which he admitted his liability.

*366

*The whole evidence, taken together, amounts to the same thing as if he had said to his brother, "While I was in the employment of Douglass, Jackson & Pickett, I so mismanaged their funds as to make me liable to them in a sum which you will find stated in a paper in the form of a due bill in my tin box; and this amount I wish you to pay them in such a way that they may not know from whom it comes." If he had said this, could any one doubt that the evidence would be sufficient to establish the legality of the claim?

Suppose he had said to his brother: "I owe the estate of a neighbor, who has recently died, a sum of money, which I borrowed from him shortly before his death, under circumstances that I do not wish disclosed, but gave him no note or other evidence of such indebtedness, and I wish you to pay the debt in such a way as that it may not be known from whom it comes, and you will find the amount stated in a memorandum amongst my private papers." Such a declaration, whether made orally or in writing, would not be testamentary in its character, but would be simply furnishing the evidence of an indebtedness incurred during his life-time. So, here, the indebtedness of the testator to Douglass, Jackson & Pickett arose during his life-time, but he did not choose to let any one have access to the evidence of such indebtedness until after his death, and, therefore, took care to let his brother, whom he had selected as his executor, know where such evidence could be obtained after his death.

We agree, therefore, with the Circuit judge, that the evidence adduced was sufficient to establish the claim set up by the survivors of Douglass, Jackson & Pickett.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA v. MOSES.

[1. Clerks of Courts ¶75.]

It would seem that an action on the official bond of a clerk of court, may be brought in the name of the State alone, but an objection on this ground can be raised by demurrer only.

[3. Clerks of Courts ¶74.]

A clerk of court neglecting to deposit his official moneys in bank as required by law, or to pay out in proper cases under orders of the court, is guilty of a continuing default, for which (without demand by the parties in interest) he and the sureties on his second and additional official bond are liable, although the moneys were received before the execution of such bond.

January 9th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action on the official bond of H. C. Moses, as clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Newberry county. It seems that Moses was appointed clerk by the judge of the Seventh Circuit, within which the county of Newberry is embraced, on February 16th, 1875, and that he then entered into bond for the faithful performance of the duties of the office. He was subsequently required to give a new bond, and accordingly, on April 4th, 1877, he entered into another bond, with all the other defendants, except Montgomery Moses, as his sureties, and the action is brought on the last-mentioned bond.

The breaches assigned are: 1. That he received large sums of money in certain cases stated in the complaint, "which he has neither deposited to the credit of the court in the National Bank of Newberry, nor in any other bank in the Seventh Judicial Circuit, as required by law to do, nor has he turned the same over to Ebenezer P. Chalmers, who was duly elected clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Newberry county, on July 26th, 1877, and commissioned on August 14th, 1877, nor has he paid the same over to the parties entitled thereto, although often requested so to do." 2. That the said H. C. Moses "has neglected and refused, and still doth neglect and refuse, to turn over to the said Ebenezer P. Chalmers, clerk as aforesaid, as required by law, certain of the furniture and papers of the said office, to wit: the iron strong box, or safe, and the money bonds given in cases in said court." 3. That the said H. C. Moses "did not at each stated session of the Court of Common Pleas for Newberry, present, as required by law, an account to said court of all moneys remaining therein, or subject to the order thereof, stating particularly on account of what cause or causes said moneys are deposited, nor did he file the vouchers thereof in court." Judgment was demanded for the penalty of the bond, ten thousand dollars, and for costs and disbursements.

that the action was *improperly brought in the name of the State alone, but that it should have been brought upon the relation of some party in interest, who might be held liable for costs, and upon the written authority of the attorney-general. 2. They admit the execution of the bond sued upon. 3. The defendant, Catherine Moses, denies her liability, because she was and is a married woman, the wife of Montgomery Moses, who should have been joined with her as a defendant in the action, and also because there is no allegation in the complaint that Mrs. Moses had any separate estate, or any apt words to fix liability thereon in this action. 4. They deny that said H. C. Moses committed any default in the discharge of the duties of his office as clerk, from the execution of the bond sued until August 18th, 1877, "when he was ejected by an overpowering force, and in violation of law, from his said office, whereby all liability under said bond ceased."

When the pleadings were read, the written authority for the institution of this suit in the name of the State, signed by the attorney-general, was exhibited to the court, whereupon an order was passed by which it was adjudged: "That this suit is properly brought in the name of the State, and that Montgomery Moses should be made a party defendant with his wife, Catherine Moses," and leave was granted to amend the complaint accordingly. This being done, Montgomery Moses filed his answer, admitting that he was the husband of the defendant, Catherine, denying all liability on the bond, and adopting the answer filed by the other defendants.

The cause being thus at issue came on to be heard before his Honor, Judge Kershaw, and a jury, when testimony on the part of the plaintiff, to the following effect, was adduced: 1. That it appeared from the account book kept by H. C. Moses, as clerk, that the several sums of money mentioned in the complaint had been received by him in the cases there mentioned. 2. That E. P. Chalmers was elected clerk on July 26th, 1877, and commissioned as such on August 14th, 1877; that he had qualified, and, on August 18th, 1877, took possession of the office of clerk, and had since that time been acting as such; that on August 18th, 1877, he demanded the office from H. C. Moses, *who refused to comply with said demand, and that the said several sums of money above referred to had not been turned over to Chalmers. 3. That demand was made upon H. C. Moses for the money collected in the case of Harrington and others v. O'Neill and others, by the attorney of persons interested in said money; that such demand was not complied with, and another suit was then pending for said money. 4. That H. C. Moses had no money on deposit in the National Bank of Newberry, to his credit as clerk, except the sum of $26.11, and that he had no other account, as clerk, with any other bank in the Seventh Circuit. 5. That the money bonds in the clerk's office remained in the iron safe therein, the key of which was kept by H. C. Moses, who permitted said Chalmers to have the use of it whenever he desired it, and that eventually it was delivered to Chalmers some time before the trial.

The testimony adduced upon the part of the defendant was to the effect: 1. That suit had been brought on the first bond of Moses as clerk. 2. That the several sums of money mentioned in the complaint were all received by H. C. Moses prior to the execution of the bond sued on in this case. 3. That E. P. Chalmers, on August 18th, 1877, forcibly ejected H. C. Moses from the office of clerk, and that an action brought by Moses against Chalmers, to regain possession of the office, was then pending. 4. That no order of court, to deposit money in any of said cases, was ever served upon said H. C. Moses, though notices of application for such orders, in several of the cases mentioned in the complaint, had been served, which were resisted by H. C. Moses, and were not considered by the Circuit judge to whom such applications were addressed.

In the progress of the testimony the Circuit judge announced that there could be no recovery on the bond, "except for the first breach assigned, to wit, the failure of H. C. Moses to account for money received by him as clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Newberry county," though he permitted testimony to be offered as to the other alleged breaches, and as there was no exception to this ruling by either party, the case must be considered as resting alone upon that breach. At the close of the testimony, a motion for a non-suit was made because *the money, alleged to have been received by H. C. Moses, as clerk, and not accounted for, was all received before the execution of the bond sued upon in this action, and there was nothing to submit to the jury. The motion was refused, and the jury rendered a verdict in the following form: "We find for plaintiffs forfeiture or penalty of bond, amount $10,000. Jacob Sligh, Foreman. Bradley v. Rodelsperger, $304.15; A. B. Boozer, Ex'r, v. Mary J. Boozer, $188.48; Sally Ann Thompson v. Thomas A. Thompson, $756.30; W. H. Harrington et al. v. H. O'Neill, $1,280.22; Sarah F. Richardson v. Thomas H. Chappel, $41.93; Catherine Boazman v. W. W. Boazman, $118.34; Harriet Epting v. Thomas L. Epting, $14.15; James A. Crowell v. Jane Boozer, $14.80; Isabella Birge, Adm'x, v. W. S. Birge, $217.45; F. W. A. Summers v. W. W. McMorris, $135.89. We find for above plaintiffs amounts as specified, with interest from September 17th, 1877. Jacob Sligh, Foreman."

The grounds of appeal raise the following questions: 1. Was the action properly brought in the name of the State alone? 2. Could the action be maintained against Mrs. Moses, a married woman, without any allegation that she had a separate estate, and without apt and proper words to charge such estate? 3. Does the fact that the money, which it is alleged H. C. Moses has failed to account for, was received by him prior to the execution of the second bond, relieve the sureties on that bond from liability and throw it entirely upon the sureties on the first bond? 4. Was a demand necessary to the maintenance of this action? 5. Is the verdict so uncertain or so inconsistent with the complaint as not to warrant the entry of any judgment?

In reference to the first question it is only necessary to say that it could only be raised by a demurrer, and there was no demurrer in this case. Pom. Rem., § 207, p. 247. But even had it been properly raised, it would seem from the authorities that the action was properly brought in the name of the State. Ibid., § 176, p. 214.

The second question is fully disposed of by the recent decisions of this court, in the cases of Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. v. Campbell & Co., 15 S. C. 581 [40 Am. Rep. 705], and Clinkscales v. Hall, 15 S. C., 602.

We come now to the consideration of the third question raised *by the grounds of appeal. In Gen. Stat. (1872) 166, §§ 46, 47, the following provisions are found: "Sec. 46.

All moneys which shall hereafter be paid into the Circuit or Probate Courts of the State, or received by the officers thereof in causes pending therein, shall be immediately deposited in some incorporated State bank or National bank, within the Circuit, of good credit and standing, or if there be no such bank within the Circuit, then in such bank nearest to the place of holding the court, in the name and to the credit of the court. Sec. 47. No money deposited as aforesaid shall be drawn from said bank, except by order of the judge of said courts respectively, in term-time or in vacation, to be signed by such judge, and to be entered and certified of record by the clerk; and every such order shall state the cause in, or on account of, which it is drawn; provided, that money paid into court to be immediately paid out, need not be so deposited, but shall be paid upon order of the court."

When, therefore, money is received by the clerk of the Circuit Court, in causes pending therein, it is his official duty to deposit the same in some bank of good standing, to the credit of the court, of which he is the clerk, unless the money is to be immediately paid out, when it need not be deposited, but may be paid out upon the order of the court. If a clerk neglects or refuses to perform this duty, he commits a breach of his official bond, and becomes liable to an action for the penalty. The default consists, not in receiving the money, but in neglecting or refusing to deposit it in bank; or where it is to be immediately paid out, in not paying out according to the order of the court. This is a continuing duty, and the default continues as long as the performance of such duty is neglected.

The fact, therefore, that the money in this case was all received by Moses, as clerk, before the execution of the second bond, cannot relieve the sureties on the second bond from liability, if the default continued after the execution of that bond. It seems that Moses did continue to make default in this respect after the execution of the bond sued on in this case, and, therefore, the sureties on this bond, as well as those on the first bond, would be liable for any damages resulting from such default. Treasurers v. Taylor, 2 Bail. 524.

*Under this view of the case, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question whether there was any necessity for a demand, and if so, whether there was any evidence, in this case, of a demand before this action was commenced. It was abundantly proved, and in fact does not seem to have been denied, that the defendant Moses had failed to deposit in bank the money received by him as clerk, with the exception of a very inconsiderable sum, and this was such a breach of the condition of his bond as would warrant judgment for the penalty. If the money had been deposited in bank to the credit of the court, as required by law, then it only could have been drawn out by order of the judge of the Circuit Court, and all that would have been necessary to enable the parties entitled to get their money would have been to obtain such an order, and there would have been no occasion for any demand upon the clerk.

Our next inquiry is as to the form of the verdict, whether it was so uncertain as not to warrant the entry of any judgment. The verdict for the penalty of the bond was, as we have seen, fully warranted by the testimony, and there would be no difficulty in entering judgment on such a verdict. All the rest of the verdict, or rather what is written below the regular and formal verdict for the penalty, may and should be rejected as surplusage, it being a futile attempt on the part of the jury to find damages in favor of persons not parties to the record, which of course must be regarded as a mere nullity. The proper practice in cases of this kind is to enter judgment for the penalty in favor of the obligee, which will stand as a security for those who may have sustained damages by reason of the breach of the condition of the bond, leaving it for those parties claiming to have sustained such damages to come in by proper proceedings and establish their claims; and with a view to avoid multiplicity of suits and secure equality amongst the several claimants, an order should be published requiring all such claimants to come in within a prescribed time, and establish such damages as they may have sustained by reason of the breach of the condition of the bond, and obtain execution on the judgment for the damages so established.

to the Circuit *judge in charging the jury to allow interest, but as we are unable to discover any evidence in the record that the Circuit judge gave any such instruction to the jury, the question is not now properly before us. When the parties come in to establish their damages, the question as to interest may then be considered.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified in accordance with the views herein expressed, with leave to the parties interested to come in and establish their claims, according to the practice herein indicated.

1. The judgment of this court in Koon v. Munro, 11 S. C. 140, stated.

[2. Appeal and Error ⇨ 1195.]

The rule there prescribed for ascertaining the amount of confederate money rightfully in the hands of the administrator held him responsible for the collection of ante bellum credits from himself and other solvent debtors, not available for the purposes of the administration, and it was error in the Circuit judge to apply to the case any other principle.

[As it is the duty of an administrator to collect the choses of his intestate, and as during the war there was no other circulating medium than Confederate money, an administrator is justified in receiving Confederate money in payment of debts due the estate, unless there was reason to believe that such currency could not be used for the purposes of administration or the payment of distributees.]

Before Thomson, J., Union, December, 1879.

The opinion states the case.

[For subsequent opinion, see Johnson v. Dawkins, 20 S. C. 528.]

Messrs. Rion & McKissick, for distributees.

Messrs. J. B. Steedman, R. W. Shand, contra.

January 27th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Clinton Wilson died in 1860, and W. J. Keenan administered upon his estate. Keenan died in November, 1867, and William Munro administered upon his estate. In 1869 Henry Koon took out letters of administration de bonis non upon the estate of Clinton Wilson, and brought this action against the administrator of W. J. Keenan, for an account of his administration of the estate of C. Wilson. Most of the assets of the estate of Wilson consisted of ante bellum debts due the estate, and among them a large debt of the first administrator, Keenan himself, and the questions in the case arise out of the manner in which he dealt with these assets during confederate times. He collected most of the debts due the estate in confederate money during the war, and among them his own, and on December 31st, 1864, invested $5,800 in confederate bonds, for which, though now worthless, credit is claimed for him.

The case was referred to John L. Young, Esq., as referee, who reported that there was due by the estate of Keenan $8,745.55 in confederate money, and that there was due by the estate $304.61 in United States currency. Both parties excepted, and Judge Northrop held that the investment in confederate bonds was not allowable, and that the balance found by the referee was due in legal currency. The defendant appealed, and this court determined the principle which should govern the accounting, and remanded the case. See 11 S. C. 140.

This court held as follows: "It would follow, if the foregoing deductions are sound, that the test of the right of the administrator to receive in satisfaction of the debts of the estate, a currency in common use, but not having the quality of a legal tender, is the necessity of the administration; one element of this necessity being the existence of debts capable of affecting prejudicially the assets of the estate unless satisfied, and the other would be just ground to apprehend loss of assets by allowing unsecured debts to remain outstanding. * * * It is clear that in either of these cases, as well as when money is needed to defray current or extraordinary expenses of the administration, the administrator would be authorized to receive such currency at the rate at which it passed from hand to hand in the community as money, unless there should be reason to conclude that it could not be advantageously employed at such valuation for the purposes of the administration. * * * It is proper to add that in applying these principles the administrator ought not to be held to strict accountability as an insurer of such reasonably anticipated results, but so long as he brings a fair and honest judgment, resting on reasonable grounds, to guide his conduct in this respect, he should receive protection. This depends on the principle that one clothed with the exercise of discretion is only responsible for its abuse. * * * As the statement of the accounts was not conformed to the principles that should have been applied to them, the intention of the parties, as may be assumed, not having been directed to such considerations, there should be a new inquiry directed, and confined, as regards the present question, to ascertaining how much, if any, of the account funded in bonds, consisted of confederate currency rightfully in the hands of the administrator as assets of the estate, not available for outlay to meet any other proper exigency of the estate, to the end that the administrator should receive credit for such amount upon the principle above stated," &c.

Accordingly, the case went back to the Circuit Court, and was referred to D. A. Townsend, Esq., as special referee to restate the account of W. J. Keenan, as administrator, in conformity with the principle announced in the judgment of this court, as above stated. He took the testimony and reported that on December 31st, 1864, the administrator, Keenan, had rightfully in his hands, as assets of his intestate's estate, $1,143.80 in confederate money, not needed for the exigencies of the estate, for which the estate of Keenan should have credit on the investment in confederate bonds, or, so to speak, that the investment to that extent should stand as allowed, and that all the remainder of the bonds should be stricken from the account as not allowed. And upon a re-adjustment of the accounts upon this basis he reported due by Keenan, the administrator, on September 27th, 1879, the sum of $9,946.05.

To this report the defendant excepted, and the case came on again for trial before Judge Thomson, who recommitted the report with instructions "to take an account of the sums of money which were due the intestate in his life-time by Keenan individually, or by Keenan with others, and credited by Keenan, as received from himself in his returns; and also to take an account of the moneys received by Keenan, as administrator, from all other sources, from debtors according to his returns. And from these two sums, and from their amounts, ascertain the *proportions of the money charged by Keenan, as received from himself, on one part, and received by Keenan from all other debtors, on the other part, which entered into the confederate bonds, and are credited by Keenan as of date December 31st, 1864."

From this decree both parties appealed to this court. The defendant upon the following grounds: "Because his Honor, for the purpose of ascertaining what proportion of the currency that went into the confederate bonds, purchased for the estate of Clinton Wilson, 'was derived from assets of the estate other than that paid by the administrator himself in discharge of his individual and joint debts,' should have ordered that an account be taken of the amount credited by Keenan in his returns, as received from himself on debts due the intestate by him at the date of his last payment of them, viz., on February 22d, 1863; and that from said amount should be deducted the sum then due to the administrator by the estate, as shown by his returns. And also an account of the moneys received by Keenan, as administrator, from all other sources after the date of his said last payment, according to his returns. And that from these two sums and from their amount, it be ascertained what proportion of the sum that went into said bonds was received from himself, and what proportion was received from other sources."

The plaintiff appealed upon these grounds:

1. "For that his Honor has laid down a different rule for ascertaining the liability of W. J. Keenan, as administrator, from that prescribed by the Supreme Court.

2. "For that his Honor did not confirm the finding of the referee upon the matter of fact submitted to him by the decree of the Supreme Court, to wit: 'That on December 31st, 1864. Keenan, as administrator of C. Wilson's estate, had rightfully in his hands, as assets of said estate, $1,143.80 in confederate currency, not available for the exigencies of said estate, and only this amount.'

3. "For that his Honor did not confirm the finding of the referee, 'that upon a re-adjustment of the administrator's accounts, after applying said credit, he is indebted to the estate of C. Wilson in the sum of $9,946.05, September 27th, 1879.'"

*The former judgment of this court declared the principles which should govern the accounting. Until reversed, it is the law of the case. The principle upon which the account should be stated having been determined, the case was remanded simply to apply the principle to the facts which might be made to appear. The only questions which the Circuit Court could consider were, first, what was decided by the Supreme Court; and, second, after applying the facts, how did the account stand.

As to the first question, there does not seem to be any obscurity. The doctrine announced by the former judgment was, that as it is the duty of an administrator to collect the choses of his intestate, and considering the peculiar circumstances of the country at the time—that during the war there was no other circulating medium but confederate money—an administrator would be justified in receiving confederate money in payment of debts due the estate, unless there was reason to believe that such currency could not be used for the purposes of administration or the payment of distributees. As we understand the judgment, the administrator was not to be held liable for taking confederate money for debts contracted before the war, except under the circumstances set forth in the extract of the opinion given above.

It happened that in this case, among the debts received in confederate money, was a large one due the intestate by the administrator himself, and in discussing the principle announced some observations were thrown out, in the opinion of the court, as to the impropriety of the administrator discharging his own debt with confederate money, beyond the probable necessities of the administration, as in that case he would not be acting in the interest of the estate, but in his own. But the judgment does not proceed upon the view that the amount received by the administrator from himself should be the measure of the money wrongfully in his hands. The test was, not what he received from himself, but what he received from solvent debtors, including himself, over and above what might be reasonably considered as available for the exigencies of the estate. If the administrator had reasonable ground to suppose that the whole amount of the debt due by him could have been made available, *then he might rightly receive from himself confederate money, and discharge his own debt.

According to this interpretation of the former judgment, it is manifest that the Circuit judge did not follow the principle laid down, but propounded a new rule of accountability, making the amount received by the administrator on his own debt, and not that received in excess of the amount available for the purposes of the estate, the measure of the amount which was wrongfully in his hands. As we understand the Circuit decree, it raised what was merely a subordinate point into the main question in the case, and as to the means of carrying out this view prescribed an arithmetical rule of proportion. We think this was error, and this disposes of the defendant's exception, which is based upon the new principle propounded by the Circuit judge.

The only other question is whether the account stated by the referee was in accordance with the principle announced in the former judgment. It seems that he gave the administrator credit for all payments, and as to the confederate bonds allowed $1,143.80, upon the ground that to this extent the money which purchased them was rightfully in his possession, and struck the remainder of the bonds from the account. The report is not very full as to the precise manner in which he reached that conclusion, but he seems to have proceeded in accordance with the former judgment.

We have seen that the administrator was allowed to receive confederate money in the collection of bad debts, and from solvent ante bellum debtors, including himself, to the extent that he might honestly suppose could be made available for the purposes of administration. Now the investment itself in confederate bonds, without explanation, was substantially an admission that at least that much confederate money had been collected in excess of what was needed, for we are authorized to assume that if it had been needed for the purposes indicated, the administrator would not have invested it in confederate bonds. Did he have reasonable grounds to suppose that such a large sum would be needed for the purposes indicated? The distributees lived out of the State and we hear of no instructions upon their part to collect the money or that they would receive the confederate money. The administrator must have known the debts of the estate, indeed he seems to have controlled one of the largest, and it does not appear that the necessities of the administration thus known to him, made it probable that the whole of his large debt would be needed.

When he made his second return, March 11th, 1863, covering the transactions of 1862, and up to that date of 1863, it appears that he was in advance for the estate only the sum of $906.97, and does not state that at that time he had received any part of his own large debt. The next return was not made until January 10th, 1866, after the war was over, and confederate money had become worthless. In the latter return (1866) he went back into the time prior to his second return (March, 1863,) and charged himself with having received on February 22d, 1863, his own individual debt and that as partner, amounting to $9,335.69, and this, with other debts received, aggregated a sum so large that after deducting all debts and expenses paid, he still had a large balance on hand, of which, by the same return, he claimed to discharge himself of $5,800.00, as invested in confederate bonds on December 31st, 1864, when they were very nearly worthless.

If the alleged receipt of his own large debt had not been fixed at a date prior to the time when he expended the money in hand from other sources, the matter would have been perfectly plain. There was probably no actual payment to himself of his own debt, which would have been the merest form, but he simply charged himself as having received it on a particular day. When he made his return (1866) nearly three years after, he fixed that date back in February, 1863, which was manifestly theoretical merely. To say nothing as to the seeming conflict in the returns—that of 1866 claiming that the administrator had received the whole of his large debt on February 22d, 1863, while his second return, made after that time (March, 1863,) made no reference to such transaction, it is enough to state that the reasonable probability of his needing such a large sum for the purposes indicated does not appear. If it were necessary to use a part of his debt to re-imburse himself for money paid out for the estate, that necessity ceased as soon as the amount required *was received. By the former judgment it was determined that he could not go beyond that, or, at most, beyond what he might reasonably suppose would meet the exigencies of the estate, but he did go beyond to the extent of the money invested in the confederate bonds.

It seems to be conceded that the administrator collected doubtful debts (which are exceptional) to the amount of $1,328.61, and paid out to Macbeth and Otts $184.00, leaving a balance rightfully in his hands at the close of the year 1863, of $1,143.80, for which the report gives him credit.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the report of D. A. Townsend, referee, be made the judgment of the court.

EASON v. MILLER &amp; KELLY.

[1. New Trial ⇨117; Replevin ⇨94.]

In action for recovery of blank patterns at a foundry, a verdict for plaintiff "for patterns the value of one hundred dollars" (which could not have included all the patterns at the foundry), does not identify the property, and is therefore void, and may be vacated on motion noticed at the third term, more than a year, after the trial. Robbins v. Slattery [30 S. C. 328, note, 9 S. E. 510], MS., Dec. No. 712, approved.

The motion, not being upon exceptions involving errors of law occurring at the trial, or for insufficient evidence, or for excessive damages, was not governed by sections 288 and 289 of the code of procedure.

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, June, 1881.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree, after a statement of facts and the former opinion of this court, continued as follows:

This decision limiting the recovery of the plaintiff to a portion only of the patterns claimed, makes it clear that the verdict is incapable of enforcement, because it is not possible for the sheriff to ascertain from any judgment and execution which could be entered upon it, the particular patterns which it was *the purpose of the execution to require him to restore to the plaintiff's possession. The finding in this action must be specific as to the articles to be recovered, and as to their value. Code, § 285.

The plaintiff in this case demands the return of all the patterns on the premises on the day in question. The verdict as interpreted by the Supreme Court, finds for plaintiff only a portion, without indicating what portion. The judgment must conform to the verdict, and the execution to the judgment. It would not be possible under such an execution for the sheriff to distinguish what patterns he is required to return. This verdict construed as applicable only to a portion of the articles claimed, is a nullity, incapable of being the subject of a judgment. In that case it is the duty of the court to award a venire facias de novo. 5 Com. Dig. 521, 523; Heyward v. Bennett, 1 Treadw. 329; 3 Brev. 113; Mooney v. Welsh, 1 Mill. Con. R. 133.

It is ordered that the verdict in this case be set aside and vacated, and that a new trial be had herein.

Messrs. Bryan & Bryan, for appellants.
Messrs. Lord & Inglesby, contra.

January 27th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff brought this action for the recovery of personal property, and claimed that he was the owner of ——— patterns of the value of $5,000, which goods were stored on May 11th, 1879, on the premises known as Eason's foundry, Columbus street, Charleston, S. C. The defendants had purchased the property known as Eason's foundry, on April 24th, 1879, at a foreclosure sale, and entered into possession of the same on May 11th thereafter, and claimed that the patterns on the premises were embraced in the mortgage under which they had purchased.

It appeared from the testimony that patterns of the value of $5,000 were on the premises when the defendants purchased the foundry; that a portion had been placed there at the time of the execution of the mortgage, and the remainder afterwards, but

*the evidence was conflicting as to what proportion was put there before the mortgage and what afterwards. One of the witnesses thought the greater proportion, both in number and value, was there at the time of the execution of the mortgage, and another thought the reverse. Under this testimony the judge, construing the mortgage, charged that it covered such patterns as were on the place at its execution, and that as to these the defendants had a good title. He further charged, that the plaintiff was the owner of such as had been put upon the premises after the execution of the mortgage, and as to these he was entitled to recover. And he left it to the jury, as a question of fact, to determine what proportion had been put upon the premises after the mortgage, with instructions to find their verdict accordingly.

The jury found the following verdict: "We find for plaintiff, patterns the value of $100." Upon this verdict the clerk, having received no instructions from the court as to the form of the judgment, entered judgment for the recovery "of the personal property described in the complaint, to wit, the patterns which were on the premises on the north side of Columbus street, in the city of Charleston, and known as Eason's foundry, on May 11th, 1879, or $100 in case a delivery of the said property cannot be had, and also that he recover $40.45 for his costs."

This judgment was afterwards vacated because it was not in conformity with the verdict, this court holding upon appeal that the verdict could not be legally construed to mean that the plaintiff was entitled to recover all of the patterns on the place on May 11th, 1879, valued by the witnesses at

The judgment having thus been vacated, the plaintiff, at the June term, 1881, of the court for Charleston county, which was the third term after the trial, moved to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was void for uncertainty. Upon the hearing of this motion, Judge Kershaw passed the following order: "It is ordered that the verdict in this case be set aside and vacated, and that a new trial be had herein."

From this order the defendants have appealed, founding their appeal upon several grounds, all of which, however, are embraced

*in the following: 1. "That no exception having been taken by the plaintiff to the charge of Judge Pressley, presiding at the trial, or to the form of the verdict at the term of the trial and within the time prescribed by law, his Honor Judge Kershaw, was without authority of law to set aside the verdict and order a new trial upon a motion made after the lapse of three terms, and especially this could not be done for uncertainty in the verdict, to which uncertainty the plaintiff had contributed and had not objected. 2. Because the verdict is not void or insufficient, either under the general law, or under the law laid down by Judge Pressley at the trial, under which a valid judgment can and should be entered for plaintiff for one hundred dollars and costs."

It is true, the code provides that in certain cases motions for new trials must be entered on the minutes by the judge who heard the case, which motion, if heard on the minutes, can only be heard at the same term at which the trial is had. Code, § 288. Or if the motion is made on exceptions, the judge trying the cause may at the trial direct them to be heard in the first instance at the next or special term, and the judgment in the meantime suspended, and in that case they must be there heard in the first instance and judgment there given. Code, § 289.

These sections of the code are applicable when the motion is to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial on exceptions, or for insufficient evidence or for excessive damages. Code, § 288. The term "exceptions" as here used has a technical meaning, and it implies that some error of law has been committed by the judge in the progress of the trial, either in some ruling during the trial, or in the charge to the jury. The other two grounds involve errors of fact, to wit, as matter of fact that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, or that the damages are excessive and beyond the testimony. And under these provisions of the code, it is true that when a party desires to move for a new trial upon the ground of an error of law in the judge, or upon either of the above grounds involving the facts, he must make the motion upon the minutes at the term of the trial, or if upon exceptions as to the law, at least at the next term by permission of the judge who heard the case.

*Now the question here is, has this motion been made either upon exceptions involving errors of law occurring at the trial, or for insufficient evidence, or for excessive damages? If so, the argument of the appellants is conclusive, as it is apparent that the motion has not been made either upon the minutes at the term of the trial, or upon exceptions at the next succeeding term under an order of the trial judge made for that purpose. It is admitted that the motion below was made at the third term after the trial term and without any previous notice of such motion given at the trial term, either upon the minutes or otherwise.

We do not look upon the motion below as being made upon either of the grounds mentioned in section 288 of the code. The plaintiff did not complain of the charge of the judge, or of any ruling made by him during the progress of the trial. Nor does he complain that the verdict involves an error of fact. He complains that it is not such a verdict as can be enforced, that it is a void verdict as without meaning, that it is a nullity, in substance that there has been a mistrial; and his motion was not that a verdict which, if left standing, would be valid and could be enforced, shall be set aside and a new trial had, but that that which appears to be a verdict shall be declared no verdict, because without meaning, and be wiped out, expunged from the record, so that the case can be replaced upon the calendar for trial, there having been in fact no trial which has resulted in a real verdict. If this be the conclusion to be placed upon the verdict, then the sections of the code above referred to, could not apply, and they would interpose no obstacle in the way of the plaintiffs' motion.

The next question is: Is the verdict one of the character above described? Is it so vague and uncertain as on that account to be void? This court, on the previous appeal in this case, when the question was whether the judgment which had been entered, was in conformity with the verdict, did not undertake to interpret the exact meaning of the verdict. It only determined that the jury could not have intended to give to the plaintiff all of the patterns on the premises at Eason's Foundry on May 11th, 1879, and the judgment having been entered for *all, the court held it did not conform to the verdict and was therefore erroneous. But the difficulty in the case is as to the identity of the patterns found for the plaintiffs, and whether, in the absence of identification by the verdict, any judgment can be entered.

In the case of Robbins v. Slatterly, MS.

Dec., No. 712, filed April 15th, 1879, which was an action of this kind, this court held that in such actions the verdict and judgment must be in the alternative: that is to say, for the possession of the property, or for its value in case such possession can not be had, and that if the property can not be had for want of identity, a verdict for the alternative in value cannot be sustained. Now in the case before the court the verdict has found no designated property in the plaintiff. There is a total want of identification as to the particular patterns found. There is nothing in the verdict by which it could be ascertained what patterns belonged to the plaintiffs, and consequently nothing by which the judgment for the recovery of possession could be entered. Such being the case, the verdict is in fact nothing more than a verdict for the value, which is in conflict with Robbins v. Slatterly, supra, and therefore a void verdict.

It is the judgment of this court, that the order below be affirmed.

GRAVES v. SPOON.

1. A decree different in its result from what the Circuit judge intended it to be, reversed. Cothran, A. A. J., dissenting.

[2. Executors and Administrators ⇨ 308.]

The claims of creditors of an estate are superior to the claims of distributees, and payments to the latter to the prejudice of the former are justifiable only where the administrator, after a close observance of his prescribed duty, makes such payments in ignorance of outstanding demands, and with assets then of sufficient value to pay all debts. Rules for proper administration stated.

Before Aldrich, J., Laurens, September, 1881.

who had been of counsel in the court *below, were occupied by two of the Circuit judges, Hons. J. H. Hudson and J. S. Cothran.

This action was commenced in 1866 or 1867, in the Court of Equity for Laurens, for an account by the principal defendants of their administration of the estate of their intestate, Joseph F. Graves, who died intestate in 1859. The original pleadings having been lost and no copies preserved, substituted pleadings were served and filed in October, 1880.

The appeal was from the following decree:

This is an old case, commenced in the Court of Equity. The papers were lost, and the action was renewed by complaint and answer. The case was referred to the master, Mr. Barksdale, who made an elaborate report, which was heard on exceptions by his Honor Judge Hudson. The report was very carefully reviewed by the presiding judge, who laid down explicit rules by which the master was to be governed in making up his amended report. This decision was not appealed from, and it is therefore the law of the case. The report of the master, as amended by the directions of Judge Hudson, is now before me on exceptions.

I have considered the opinion of Judge Hudson, and, in my view, the master has carefully followed his instructions. It is supposed by the plaintiff's exceptions that the master has erred in allowing the charge made by the administrator for board, clothing and tuition. I do not think the decree intends to exclude these charges. The children were minors, with a good estate, and were certainly entitled to a support and such educational advantages as became their station in life. When the judge speaks of a separate account with each of the distributees, he does not mean they are not to be supported while the estate is under course of administration. The family is entitled to a support, whether the estate is solvent or insolvent. If it be solvent, the amount paid out for each distributee will be charged to his distributive share in the final settlement; but should it prove insolvent, as did this estate, then the maintenance of the family and the education of the children became a charge on the estate while the same was in due course of administration. Any other rule would throw the family on the cold charity of the world immediately upon the death of the intestate.

I do not mean to say the administrator can keep the estate in hand to support the family, but while he is calling in the debts and collecting the assets, any moneys expended for the support of the family are a legitimate charge on the estate. I do not think it was the intention of Judge Hudson to mulct the administrator when he directed the master that the proper rule was to open a separate account with each distributee and charge upon his share the amounts advanced for his benefit. In this case there can be no such account, for the estate is insolvent, and there is nothing to distribute. Hence, the master was compelled to charge these amounts in the general account, and make the administrator bear them. This was not the intention of the judge who heard the cause.

Nor do I think the administrator intended the maintenance and education of the children as a gratuity. He was under no obligation to confer this benefit, and at the death of the intestate it was supposed the estate was ample to pay the debts and leave a surplus for distribution. This estate shared in the losses common to all as one of the consequences of the war. Creditors and distributees must alike submit to the disappointment of these expectations.

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that all the exceptions be overruled, the report of the master confirmed and made the judgment of the court. It is further ordered, that the administrator do pay over to the master the amount proved to be due in his report, and interest thereon from the date when the balance was struck. It is further ordered, that the administrator turn over to the master the assets in his hands, as set forth and described in the schedule annexed to the report, and that the costs be paid out of the estate.

Defendants appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. That his Honor erred in confirming the report of the master filed on August 31st, 1881.

2. That his Honor erred in not decreeing that the $4,785.68 found by the master as due from the administrators should be credited with the amount paid out by the administrators for *the board, clothing and tuition for the heirs-at-law, who were minors, in the course of administering the estate of their intestate.

Messrs. Ball & Watts, Ferguson & Young, for appellants.

Mr. Justice HUDSON. This is an action by Jacob S. Graves, one of the heirs-at-law of Joseph F. Graves, against John H. Spoon, as administrator of Joseph F. Graves' estate; Ann M. Boyd, as administratrix of the estate of W. W. Graves, deceased, who was joint administrator with John H. Spoon, and the representatives of the sureties on their administration bond, and the other heirs-at-law of Joseph F. Graves. The object of the action is to compel the said administrators and their sureties to account, and to effect a settlement and distribution of the said estate. The appeal is brought up by the said surviving administrator, John H. Spoon, and the legal representatives of the deceased co-administrator and sureties.

After great delay the cause was heard on Circuit at the February term, 1881, of the Circuit Court for Laurens, and on the 28th day of that month a decree was filed, wherein is set forth certain principles upon which the master was directed to state the accounts of the said administrators. In accordance with what he conceived to be the rules therein laid down, the master, after references held, and much testimony taken, stated the accounts and filed his report, in which he finds the sum of $4,785.68½ in the hands of the administrators, and due and owing by them September 21st, 1881. This balance he reports insufficient to pay the outstanding debts of the deceased, Joseph F. Graves. In ascertaining this balance he allowed the administrators no credit for payments made to the heirs by way of partial distribution of the estate, nor for moneys expended by them in maintaining the family of the deceased. He did, however, open separate accounts with the distributees, in which he did allow to the administrators credit for all sums which it was *proved they paid to or expended for them in their support and maintenance. But the estate being insolvent, and there being nothing for distribution, the result of this mode of stating the accounts is, that the administrators have really received no credit for these disbursements.

Upon exceptions to this report, the cause was again heard on the Circuit, and the presiding judge, evidently misapprehending the manner in which the master had stated the accounts, and being led, by inadvertence or otherwise, to believe that full credit for these outlays for the family, had been given to the administrators by the master in his report, and holding in his decree that such credits ought to be allowed under the circumstances of the case, confirmed the master's report. In so doing he reached a result just the opposite to what he intended. From this decree of October 12th, 1881, the appeal is brought up in behalf of the administrators, who seek to correct this unintentional error of the Circuit judge, and to have this court to award to the defendants' administrators the credits which the master refused and which the Circuit judge intended to allow, but inadvertently denied to them by confirming the master's report. On the contrary, the plaintiff, and those defendants who are identified with him in interest, seek to uphold the accounts as stated by the master and confirmed by the Circuit judge, contending that the decree is correct in its result, notwithstanding he may have intended a different conclusion.

It is very clear that the decree of the Circuit judge is different in its result from what he intended it should be, and for this reason must be reversed unless there is found enough in the brief to satisfy this court that the master has correctly stated the accounts, and that the decree confirming the same should stand. A careful examination of the brief in connection with the argument of counsel, satisfies us that the real issue in the case was not pressed either before the master or the Circuit judge in such a way as to secure a direct judgment on the point.

Before the master, the chief inquiry seems to have been as to the amounts to be allowed as credits, rather than the mode and manner of stating the accounts so as to secure the allowance of those amounts as credits to the administrators. The estate being *clearly insolvent, and there being no fund for distribution, the only mode in which credits can be made available to the administrators, is by allowing them in the general account. To open separate accounts with the distributees for the purpose of allowing the credits there, is of no benefit to the administrators; and this is the mode adopted by the master. The master supposed he was following strictly the directions laid down in the decree of February 28th, 1881. But that decree did not contemplate the insolvency of the estate, and prescribed rather the method of adjusting the accounts of a solvent estate where a fund is left for distribution after the payment of debts.

The questions which should have been raised and carefully investigated before the master and the Circuit court are, first, whether the administrators of this insolvent estate are entitled to have credit allowed them at all for any partial distribution of the estate in their hands to the heirs-at-law of Joseph F. Graves, and for any sums expended by them in the support and maintenance of the family of the deceased; and second, if so, to what amount. The last of these inquiries has been made and passed upon, but the first, which is of great delicacy and importance, seems not to have been raised directly, and has not been passed upon except in the reasoning of the Circuit judge, which is at variance with his conclusion.

The doctrine of the decree of October 12th, 1881, is at variance with the authorities, and in its broad, liberal and unqualified terms, cannot be sanctioned by this court. The rights of the creditors of a deceased are superior to the claims of heirs and distributees. The administrator of an insolvent estate, with full knowledge of the insolvency, will never be upheld in bestowing the assets upon distributees, and leaving debts unpaid; nor will he be justified in distributing the assets nor in expending them in educating and maintaining the family, whilst ignorant of the existence of debts, provided, he ought to have known of such. His first duty is to the creditor. He is bound to take notice of the existence of debts, and is required to exhaust all efforts to discover the creditor, and to comply fully with the requirements of the law regulating and prescribing his duty in this respect.

*By all proper diligence the executor or administrator must acquaint himself with the real condition of the estate before he begins to administer the assets. His duty is to gather in the assets, and to ascertain the number of creditors and the amount and the rank of their claims, before he undertakes to pay them. The payment of debts out of their legal order, the payment of legacies before creditors, the payment of family expenses for education and maintenance, partial or full distribution to the heirs in the face of outstanding debts, are all acts of devastavit, if thereby creditors are prejudiced. In respect to creditors, the administrator is held to the rule of strict accountability, and the exercise of the greatest diligence and the best of faith.

A diversion of assets to any of these purposes will be sustained by the courts, only when the administrator shows that in so doing he acted in good faith, and with a due regard to the rights of creditors. This he may show by establishing the fact that he had fully complied with the requirements of the law and the rules of diligence, and good faith in his efforts to ascertain the existence of debts, and made the payments after such effort and in ignorance of the existence of the creditors thereby prejudiced, or he may relieve himself of personal liability, by showing that when these payments were made he was in receipt of assets amply sufficient to pay all creditors, which assets have, however, by some unforeseen and unavoidable calamity, been diminished in value or rendered worthless. His justification must be established by clear proof of the best of faith, such proof as will entirely negative the charge of mal-administration or devastavit.

The rule prescribed by the courts of England on this subject is to be found in 2 Wms. Ex., §§ 1158 et seq. and 1531 et seq. The stringency of this English rule is somewhat relaxed by the courts of the States of our country, but in no State to such an extent as to relieve an administrator from the observance of a strict line of duty and a strict regard for the superior claims of creditors. Uberrima fides must attend all his acts of administration in addition to a full compliance with the letter and spirit of the written law. This rule of the American courts is to be found in 1 Story's Eq. Jur., § 90.

Now, in order to afford the appellants an opportunity to justify their expenditures in educating and maintaining the family of the deceased, and in making partial distribution to them or any of them, of the assets of the estate in compliance with the rule of good faith, diligence and observance of law which we have indicated, the case must go back to the Circuit Court for further inquiry. If the appellants establish before the master their right to the credit claimed, or to any credits, the same must be entered in the general account. Being unable to foresee or anticipate the circumstances under which the administrators made the payments for which they claim credit, but which are alleged by the plaintiff to amount to a devastavit, we have avoided the citation of decided cases, deeming it proper and best only to lay down in general terms the rule of accountability enforced against executors and administrators, and to leave to the court below to

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed; that the accounts as stated by the master be re-opened, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for inquiry into the right of the appellants to the credits claimed by them in the statement of their accounts, and for inquiry into such other matters and things in connection with said accounts as are not concluded heretofore in the course of this litigation.

Mr. Justice COTHRAN, dissenting. Being unable to concur in the opinion of the majority of the court, in this case, I propose to state briefly the grounds of my dissent. Fortunately for the administration of justice the reversal of the Circuit judge's decision by a bare majority of the appellate tribunal, is not attended, in this case, with any unsatisfactory consequences, for the reason that there is no difference between my brethren and myself as to the true rule of stating the accounts of an administrator, the main question involved here. It is only as to the application of the rule to the case under consideration, that a difference of opinion exists.

Owing to the inevitable fate of all the living, the principles of accounting have long since become fixed, and the true statement of such in this case is as they are laid down in

"the horn books" *of the law. The well-established principle of stare decisis, which so commends the system of English jurisprudence to the admiration of mankind, has caused the English judges to adhere to a Procrustean rule upon this subject, from which they have been unwilling to depart, and which is reiterated by Mr. Williams in his great work on Executors, Vol. II., § 1158 et seq.

Our own courts, availing themselves doubtless of the opportunity and of the right afforded by the establishment of the independence of the colonies, have wisely relaxed the strictness of the inflexible English rule. Mr. Story, at section 90 of his work on Equity Jurisprudence, after referring to the harsh rule of the English courts, says: "If this be a true description of the actual state of the law upon this subject, it would become an intolerable grievance if courts of equity should not be able under any circumstances to interfere in favor of executors and administrators, in order to prevent gross injustice. * * * But to found a good title to such relief, it seems indispensable that there should have been no negligence or misconduct on the part of such executors or administrators in the payment of the assets; for if there has been any negligence or misconduct, that, perhaps, may induce a court of equity to withhold its assistance."

Tried by the English rule, where neither upon the score of inevitable accident, destruction by fire, loss by robbery, or the like, nor of reasonable confidence disappointed, nor of loss by any of the other means which afford an excuse to ordinary agents, and besides, in cases of loss without any negligence on their part, these fiduciaries would be found without remedy. But conceding to them all the advantages of the more liberal doctrine of our courts, does the case, as made, entitle them to relief? This is the true question.

The office of administrator is purely voluntary upon the part of him who assumes it. It implies willingness to assume and ability to discharge the duties of the trust. Judge Story says there should be "no negligence or misconduct," and this, I apprehend, should be made by the fiduciary to appear affirmatively—that is to say, the burden is upon him to show that he has been both diligent and faithful. These qualities are "indispensable" *in establishing "a good title to relief," says the learned commentator. Examined in the misty and uncertain light of the principal administrator's own testimony (for he was necessarily almost the only witness), and by the confused state of the records in the ordinary's office, which ought to have been made plain by him, where is the evidence of the "indispensable" qualities of diligence and fidelity in the administration of this estate? and is not the absence of these the most conclusive evidence of "negligence and misconduct"?

The intestate died nearly twenty-five years ago. Administration of his estate was promptly taken out, the personal property was sold, and there, so far as the primary duty of ascertaining and paying of the debts was concerned, the business of the administration seemed to end. Eight or ten years afterwards an effort was made to call them to account. The pursuit of them under great difficulties has been steadily kept up ever since, and through every court that had (rightly) jurisdiction of the subject matter. Pomeroy, § 690; recognized in Lupo v. True, 16 S. C. 586. The administrators chose their line of defense then, and they should be held to it now.

It was a stubborn denial of everything charged against them by the plaintiff. They denied that there was even such a person as their intestate—that they had received and converted his estate—in short, that they owed the plaintiff anything. Through many doublings they have been finally unearthed and now ask to be allowed to adopt another and totally inconsistent line of defense, and thus the game is to be turned loose for the questionable pleasure of another chase. For twenty-five years they had possession of this estate; for more than fifteen years, by means of a false and deceitful answer, have they avoided accountability to those who are entitled to it, nor have they asked anywhere in the pleadings the privilege of resorting to another line of defense. They stated their defense upon a denial of all liability, and it has served them well, but to that should they be held.

It may be said, however, that this general denial is but the observation of counsel. To this it may well be replied, that parties to a cause speak only through their counsel, and that it was upon this observation, now found to be untrue, that the *issue was made up which has been so long upon trial. Ordinary truthfulness, to say nothing of uberima fides, such as induces a court of justice to overlook the shortcomings of fiduciaries should have caused these defendants to come into court when requested so to do in 1866 or 1867, and to have said in substance at least: "We knew the intestate Joseph F. Graves; he had an estate; we sold it and are indebted. We attempted to administer it according to law; his orphan children were hungry and we fed them; they were naked and we clothed them. The assets of the estate were more than sufficient to pay all the debts as was ascertained by us in the manner prescribed by law, but a great revolution has swept over the country, destroying values and wrecking this in common with other estates, and we pray you have us excused."

If they had done this, which I understand to be the requirement of the law as liberalized, I would most cheerfully concur in the main opinion in this case; but in the absence of this, and in the face of the negligence and misconduct of these fiduciaries, I am at a loss to perceive how any distinction can hereafter be made between trustees who act in good faith and those in whose conduct this "indispensable" quality is so conspicuously absent.

Before Kershaw, J., Laurens, November, 1880.

Hon. A. P. Aldrich, of the Second Judicial Circuit, sat at the hearing of this appeal in the stead of the Chief Justice, who had been of counsel in the cause.

Action v. J. H. Witherspoon and Phoebe

G., his wife, against James W. Watts and William Anderson, as executors of the will of John D. Williams, deceased, John G. Williams, John D. Garlington, W. A. W. Anderson and J. D. Watts, commenced December 27th, 1879.

The case was referred to a referee, who took the testimony, and reported the same, together with a statement of the accounts of the executors, to the Circuit Court. The exceptions to this report sufficiently indicate the items and omissions objected to. They were as follows:

Plaintiff's exceptions: 1. Because said referee should have reported that the $2,-192.00 paid out on December 29th, 1879, by executors for land, was from funds really belonging to Mrs. Phoebe Y. Witherspoon and John D. Garlington; that the land should have been transferred to said devisees, or charged for their benefit with the repayment to them of said amount and interest, and that said referee should have put said amount in Schedule B. as a payment made by said executors to said devisees.

*2. In overruling each or any of plaintiff's exceptions which were overruled to introduction of testimony.

3. In allowing each or any of defendant's exceptions, which were allowed, to the introduction of testimony offered by plaintiffs.

4. In allowing each or any of the following contested items of executors' accounts as mentioned in report of referee, to wit, the third item of $506.61; the fourth item of $1,323.45, and the seventh item of $500.00.

5. In allowing commissions to the executors on the amounts received by them for rents of real estate.

6. In not reporting that the accounting herein was not final, but that a large amount of choses in action and personal property of the estate were still on hand, and should be accounted for hereafter, and that the accounting of the executors on the copartnership with the estate as to Homestead Mill place and White Plains place was still open for a further accounting.

Executors' exceptions: 1. Because the referee fails to report that there was a balance against J. Y. Watts, as surviving partner of the testator, John D. Williams, in a farming contract on the White Plains place, of $1,176.74, for the year 1874, together with the items of balance on the same contract, for 1873, of $1,776.50, all of which counsel for executors claimed should have been excluded from their general account as executors.

2. Because the referee omitted to report the testimony upon which he reported vouchers for payment on the John G. Williams' note, $172.20, or to give the law by which he was led to his conclusions.

3. Because the referee, in his statement of account, erred in not stating his findings of fact and conclusions of law therein separately.

4. Because the referee erred in charging the items of $1,776.50 and $1,176.74, the balance for the years 1873 and 1874 respectively, against J. W. Watts, the surviving partner of the testator, John D. Williams, against the executors, when, it is respectfully submitted, these items, amounting to $2,953.24, constitute simply an indebtedness against J. W. Watts individually, but that this amount should, under no circumstances, have been charged *against William Anderson, as executor, either jointly with J. W. Watts or otherwise.

5. Because the referee erred in charging the defendants, the executors, with interest per annual balance, either simple or compound, in his statement of accounts against them.

6. Because the referee erred in not continuing the reference until the creditors of John D. Williams could be called in to establish their claims.

Circuit Decree.

On June 25th, 1870, John D. Williams, of Laurens county, died, leaving in force his last will and testament, in which James W. Watts and William Anderson, the defendants, were named as executors, and afterwards proved the will and qualified, as will appear by reference to a copy of said will annexed to the complaint in this action, the date whereof is April 25th, 1870.

The first clause of the will directs that the debts be paid as soon as practicable.

The second clause is in these words: "I will and bequeath to my beloved Wife, Anna C. Williams, for her sole and separate use and benefit during her natural life, the house and lot in the Village of Laurens, on which I now reside, containing one hundred and twenty-two and one-half acres; also a small wood-land tract of land, on the right side of the Greenville road, adjoining lands of John M. Franks and containing about forty-eight acres; also all my silver plate, dining-room furniture and household and kitchen furniture; all three of my carriages and a pair of horses, two good mules and my riding Mare Fannie, with such other stock as she may desire to keep on the place, and such other provisions as she and the family may need, and provender for the stock on hand, as may be sufficient for their necessities for the time, and hereby give her the power and privilege of disposing at her death, of any of the plate or furniture above mentioned, to either of my daughters or grandson John D. Garlington as she may see fit, they accounting to my estate for the same as an advancement, the balance of the above Estate hereby given to her, at her death to revert to my estate for distribution as hereinafter described."

*In the third clause testator recites that "having heretofore made large advancements to my son John G. Williams, which with the portion of my Estate which I now give to him in this clause, I consider to be a fair proportion thereof: I give and bequeath to my Executors hereinafter named, for his use and benefit during his natural life, my Spring Grove tract of land, including the land which I have added thereto, all lying on the west side of Mudlick Creek and supposed to contain about fifteen hundred acres, together with all the property which was on the said place when he took charge of the same; to remain in his possession and enjoyment unless efforts be made to subject the same to the payment of his debts and liabilities, and in this event to be taken charge of by my Executors to prevent and protect the same from such liabilities, and at his death to be equally divided between such child or children as he may leave surviving him at his death, or should all his children die before obtaining the age of twenty-one years, then to revert to my Estate for division as the residue of my Estate is hereafter directed, and with the provision that no more of the wood land is to be cleared up for cultivation, hereby directing my Executors hereafter named, immediately after my death to deliver and hand over to my said Son all the notes I hold on him and also all the accounts I have against him previous to 1st January, 1869, amounting to several thousand dollars in lieu of his interest in the balance of my Estate."

By the fourth clause of the will testator gave his daughters, Lucy and Phoebe, and to his grandson, John D. Garlington, his White Plains place (reserving the burial ground) and all the property belonging to said place at his death, to be kept together and managed for their maintenance, support and education, until the said grandson came of age, or if he should die before that time, until either of his said daughters should marry; then if either his grandson or either of his daughters desired it, a division of the property bequeathed in that clause might be made by sale or otherwise, as may be most desirable. And should either of his said daughters or grandson die, leaving no children or child living at his or her death, then the share of such decedent should go to the survivor or survivors.

*In the fifth clause of the will testator gave to his grandson, John D. Garlington, all the books that belonged to his father.

In the sixth clause he gave to Dr. Wm. Anderson (the defendant), in trust for the use and benefit of his son, Washington A. Williams Anderson, fifteen hundred dollars, and in case of his death before attaining the age of twenty-one years, then to his mother, Elizabeth L. Anderson, and her children then surviving.

In the seventh clause of his will he gave to J. Washington Watts (the defendant), in trust for testator's namesake, the youngest son of said Watts, fifteen hundred dollars, but if he should die before reaching the age of twenty-one years, then the same to his said father, if he be then living, and if he be then dead, the same to be divided among the other children of the said J. Washington Watts.

The eighth clause of the will is in these words in part: "It is my desire to keep my Homestead in the Village of Laurens in my family; it is therefore my will and desire, after the death of my kind wife, that either of my daughters or my grandson John D. Garlington, take the same at a fair valuation, and if neither of these desire it, then it, together with all the other part of her said life-estate, be sold and divided among my said daughters and said grandson; the child or children of my said daughters or said grandson to represent their parent if the parent be dead."

By the ninth clause testator directs that the plantation which he purchased from the Simpsons, and his interest in the lot upon which he had erected a mill, be held by the executors for the benefit of his wife and daughters and grandson John D. Garlington, to assist in their maintenance and support, and that the arrangement he had made with his friend and relative, Dr. William Anderson, being similar to the one which he had entered into with his nephew, James W. Watts, in reference to the White Plains place, be continued in force until the first day of January, 1875, and as long after as might be desirable or thought best by his executors; and when thought best to make a change, he gave to his daughters and grandson the same privilege to take the same at a valuation as in the case of the homestead; and should neither of them desire it, then that it be sold and *divided as in case of the residue of his estate in the eleventh clause of the will.

In the tenth clause, testator directed the Milton mill to be sold and that the proceeds of the sale be applied to the satisfaction of a note held by him on one Thomas Crowder, deceased, and Thomas H. Crowder, after first crediting the same with one thousand dollars. The balance of said proceeds to be paid, three-fourths thereof to the children of Thomas Crowder, and the remainder to Thomas H. Crowder.

The eleventh clause is in these words (as far as necessary to transcribe the same), to wit: "Having specifically disposed as I desire, I will and bequeath all the rest and residue of my estate such part thereof as I have not otherwise directed, to be sold by my executors at their discretion and the proceeds thereof to be divided as follows: One-fourth part to Col. James W. Watts, and Dr. William Anderson, in trust for the sole and separate use of my said wife during her natural life, with the power on her part of disposing of the same at her death to such persons as she may see fit; and the remaining three-fourths to be equally divided between my two daughters and grandson in equal portions." Then follow limitations over in case of the death of either of them, without leaving issue surviving, first to the survivors with limitations over, in case of the death of the last survivor without leaving issue.

In the twelfth clause of the will, testator expresses the desire that his daughters and grandson remain with his wife as long as they should see fit, and while so remaining to contribute out of their several estates their proportion of the necessary expenses of the household, and, should it become necessary to repair or rebuild any of the houses on the home place or to supply the same with stock necessary for the use of the family, the same was directed to be done by the executors out of the estate.

The thirteenth clause referred to the agreement with James W. Watts, with regard to the cultivation and management of White Plains, which testator desired to be continued until its expiration and longer if agreeable to the parties. The fourteenth clause directs how his estate should be disposed, in case of the failure of all the previous limitations.

The fifteenth clause *directs that the shares of his estate which he has given to his daughters, should be held by his executors in trust for their sole and separate use and benefit. The sixteenth clause is practically revoked by the codicil. The last clause names his executors, and desires them to be well compensated for their services, if their legal commissions are not sufficient; desires his friends, J. Wister and William D. Simpson, as his counsel in all matters pertaining to his estate.

Testator also left of force a codicil to said will, dated June 11th, 1870, wherein he refers to the twelfth clause of his will directing his daughters and grandson to contribute out of their estates for the necessary expenditures of the household and the other directions therein in respect of the same, and directs as follows: "Now in order to make some ample provision for the maintenance of the home place and for the support and comfort of my said wife, daughters and grandson, I further will and desire my executors to supply my said home place during the life of my said wife from my estate, with all necessary provisions, to be taken from any of my plantations or my mill, and likewise to furnish all necessary stock for the place; to keep the roads, fences and houses in good order, rebuilding the same if at any time it may become necessary."

He proceeds to make the directions contained in the sixteenth clause of the will and directs that the mill be disposed of as directed in the ninth clause of the will, and that Dr. William Anderson take control of and manage the mill and be allowed whatever is right for his services. Lastly, he directs the disinterment and removal of the remains of the members of the family, from the family grave-yard at White Plains, and their reinterment at Laurens Village Cemetery, and requests his friend Dr. John W. Simpson to take charge of, superintend and direct the same; charging the estate with all the expenses attending it, including proper compensation for himself, and directing the executors to pay the same.

at-law. Some time in 1871 *Lucy Williams died unmarried and intestate and John G. Williams, the defendant herein, administered on her estate.

Some time prior to April 25th, 1873, Anna E. Williams, the widow, renounced her interests under the will of her husband, and elected to take dower in the lands of the estate, and instituted proceedings to recover the same in the Probate Court of Laurens county. Under these proceedings the sum of twelve thousand four hundred dollars was assessed as the value of her dower in all the lands of her said husband, whereof he died seized, and a decree of the court in said cause directed the executors to pay her the said sum in lieu and bar of her said dower.

September 26th, 1873, the said executors commenced an action in this court against the said Anna E. Williams, John G. Williams, Phœbe Y. Witherspoon and John D. Garlington, setting forth the facts herein before stated; that the election of the widow to take dower, and the death of the daughter Lucy, had introduced important changes into the estate, giving rise to important questions as to the construction of the will and their duties thereunder, among which were, as to what portion of the estate should be sold to meet the dower assessment? To what extent Spring Grove should be subjected to the payment of dower? And what disposition should be made of the interests under the will renounced by the widow, upon which points they desired the instructions of the court.

In that action a decree was rendered by consent, bearing date October 27th, 1873, directing an appraisement of such portion of the personal property which had been bequeathed to his widow by said testator, as Phœbe Y. Witherspoon and John D. Garlington desired to take at a valuation, and the delivery of the same to them respectively upon their several receipts. That the executors have leave to sell at their discretion the balance of said personal property and also the homestead, the small woodland lot devised with it, and the mill tract near the village of Laurens, "for the purpose of meeting the dower of the said Anna E. Williams, the debts and pecuniary legacies, &c., prayed for in the complaint." It was further ordered "that the questions in the pleadings as to the proper construction of the will, as to the rights of the parties growing out of the change in scheme, on account of the election of said Anna E. Williams to take dower, and the renunciation of her interest under said will, be reserved for the further adjudication and determination of this court, and all other equities reserved."

It does not appear that any further order was made in that cause. Under this decree the executors have sold all the lands, &c., therein authorized to be sold, except two tracts, collectively called the Mill tract, containing six hundred and forty acres, which remain unsold. They have paid the money decreed to be paid for the dower. They have had possession of the real estate described in the will, except Spring Grove, which has been in the possession of John G. Williams, and have received the rents and profits arising therefrom, or occupied them as directed by the will; but in regard to White Plains, which was rented by Phoebe Y. Witherspoon under an agreement with the executors, with the personal property thereon, from January 1st, 1876, to December, 25th, 1879, the condition is peculiar. The rent for the year 1876 was fixed at twenty-five bales of cotton, weighing four hundred pounds each; twelve and a half bales to be delivered on or before December 25th, 1876, at Clinton or Chappels depot as the executors might prefer, and the other twelve and a half bales to be receipted for by Mrs. Witherspoon as her interest under the will in the proceeds of the crop of said plantation. The said agreement was to continue after 1876, to December 25th, 1879, at the election of Mrs. Witherspoon. She has continued in possession up to the present time.

There are demands still outstanding against the estate, two in number, one of which is a suit upon a sheriff's bond upon which the testator was surety, and both are in litigation. The amount of these demands is claimed to be large, but as yet unknown.

John D. Garlington became of age October 25th, 1879.

On September 1st, 1875, John G. Williams commenced an action against the executors, setting up a claim to Spring Grove under an alleged parol gift from his father, John D. Williams, and praying that he be decreed entitled to the same, free from the trust and limitations of the will, but said action has never been brought to a hearing.

and claims many liabilities against the executors, and prays that they may be required to account, and to pay the plaintiff, Phoebe, the amount due her; that the property remaining be divided under the will or sold under the direction of the court, and the proceeds distributed; that if, for the payment of debts, it be necessary that legacies and devises abate, that all abate ratably; that the executors be enjoined from further disposing of the property of the estate or receiving money due the same (alleging their insolvency), and that they pay the same into court and turn over to the custody of the court the amounts to be disbursed under the order thereof; that the legatees and devisees account for what they have each received; that all the defendants be enjoined, during the pendency of this suit, from receiving or disbursing moneys of the estate, or disposing of the property thereof, or interfering with or bringing action, or taking any proceeding against the plaintiffs, to oust them of the possession of the White Plains plantation, or the personal property received by them under their lease thereof, and for further relief.

The executors, in their answer, take issue with the plaintiffs in regard to all allegations affecting their liability, or allege circumstances in avoidance of the same. John G. Williams sets up his title to Spring Grove, as obtained under a parol gift from the testator, and adverse possession thereunder for more than ten years before his death, and claims the protection of the statute of limitations as to the personalty upon the place and the legacy of his indebtedness to his father. He also claims, as administrator of Lucy Williams, whatever may be found to be due him in that capacity. The answer of John D. Garlington raises no question with the executors and needs not to be further recited.

An order was entered in the cause at February term, 1880, enjoining the executors from selling any portion of the estate and directing the status of the estate to be maintained until the further order of the court, and directing a reference "to take testimony upon all issues in this case" and to report the same, and to state the accounts of the executors and the sums received by each legatee or devisee, with leave to report any special matter, and granting plaintiffs leave to amend by making the infant legatees, Washington A. Williams Anderson and John D. Williams Watts, parties defendant. The referee has stated the accounts and reported the testimony on the other branches of the case. There were many exceptions to the report, and a number of exceptions to testimony admitted or rejected. In this condition the cause is before me for determination.

The exceptions to the accounts of the executors will first be considered. The referee has given no reason in his report for his decisions upon the questionable points, and this is made the ground of one of the exceptions. Certainly the law requires a judicial officer to give his reasons for his decisions, and the court can obtain but little aid from a referee upon such points unless this is done, but the report will not in this case be returned on this account.

The first and fourth exceptions, on the part of the executors, object that they were jointly charged with balances found due by J. W. Watts on the copartnership between him and the estate, which was continued, in pursuance of the provisions of the will, for some years after the death of the testator. I can see no propriety in charging Dr. Anderson, the co-executor, with this liability. The rule is, "that the actual possession and use by one of two executors, is not in law the possession and use of both, so as to attach any liability upon both." 1 Wms. Ex. "And an executor shall not, under ordinary circumstances, be responsible for the assets come to the hands of his co-executor." Id. 1292. These principles are fully recognized in our own cases. O'Neill v. Herbert, Dudley Eq. 30; Clarke v. Jenkins, 3 Rich. Eq. 319, &c. There are in this case no special circumstances to vary the rule. The decision of the referee in regard to the balance due by J. W. Watts, on the contract in relation to White Plains, for the year 1873, amounting to $1,776.50, and that for the year 1874, amounting to $1,176.74, whereby these balances were charged as a liability against both executors, is reversed, and it is adjudged that the same are chargeable only against J. W. Watts.

The second exception of the executors objects to the rejection by the referee, without reasons assigned, of a due bill paid by the executors to Hugh Leaman. It was given by John D. *Williams to John G. Williams, dated February 13th, 1861, and is not negotiable upon its face. It was entered in the returns as a payment to John G. Williams on a note. The payment to Leaman, or his authority to receive the money, is not questioned by John G. Williams. It should, therefore, have been allowed, unless the payment to John G. Williams would have been an error.

Testator bequeathed that all John G. Williams' notes and accounts be given up to him, "in lieu of all his interest" in the estate. No reference is made in the will to this note or any indebtedness from testator to John G. Williams, and nothing is said therein, whence it might be supposed to be the intention that this legacy should operate as a satisfaction of any demand of this nature held against the testator by John G. Williams. When the testator takes no notice of the debt or leaves the intention doubtful, the legacy will not be held to extinguish the debt. 2 Story Eq. 1123. Slight circumstances will be laid hold of to avoid the construction, that a legacy is to operate as satisfaction of a debt. Hinchcliffe v. Hinchcliffe, 3 Ves. 529. It is said to be "an absurd rule" that a legacy shall be intended as satisfaction of a debt. Barclay v. Wainwright, 3 Ves. 466. A negotiable note will not be held satisfied by a legacy. Carr v. Eastbrooke, 3 Ves. 561. In Chancey's Case, 1 P. Wms. 408, the testator had directed that "all his debts and legacies be paid," and it was held this took the case out of the rule.

So, when the legacy is given diverso intuitu, some particular reason being expressed as the ground of the bequest. 2 Wms. Ex. 932. As in this case, where the reason for the legacy is stated evidently a gratuity in lieu of his interest in the estate as heir-at-law, distributee, &c., because he had been advanced and would be made equal with his co-heirs, &c., by the provision made for him in the will. That assumed equality would be destroyed if his rights as a creditor were taken away. These principles are also sustained by our own cases. It is held in Owens v. Simpson, 5 Rich. Eq. 420, that an express provision to pay debts would take the case out of the rule. Here there is an express direction to pay debts.

it is adjudged that the executors be allowed credit in their accounts for said payment.

3. The exceptions of plaintiffs, as to the items named in their fourth exception, is overruled. The testimony fully sustains the propriety of allowing these as credits to the executors.

4. The first exception of the plaintiffs claims that the funds used by the executors ($2,191) to purchase a tract of land, which was conveyed by Mrs. Crews to J. W. Watts, as trustee for John D. W. Watts, as an investment of the legacy bequeathed to him in the seventh clause of the will, belonged to Mrs. Witherspoon and John D. Garlington, and that the land so purchased should be held for them, or at least charged in their favor to that amount, and that the referee should have so reported. The testimony established that $800 of that sum was derived from a sale of a portion of the lands, which are collectively termed the Mill tract, disposed of by the ninth clause of the will, and also in part referred to in the codicil, and in the sixteenth clause of the will, revoked by the codicil.

In order to determine the question here presented, it is necessary to settle the order in which the legacies and devises stand towards each other, and from what sources the debts and pecuniary legacies are to be paid, and out of what property or fund the widow's dower should have been paid, and, indeed all other questions respecting the administration and settlement of the estate. This decree is growing to such length that these important questions must be briefly determined. In the first place, it is adjudged that the dower is to be charged against the several parcels of land according to their respective values, and to be borne by devisees of lands devised, or paid out of the purchase-money of those parcels sold or to be sold, so far as such parcels may be chargeable with the same.

In Cunningham v. Shannon, 4 Rich. Eq. 140, Chancellor Dargan says: "Dower is a right which, inchoate during coverture, becomes absolutely vested in the wife, as an estate, on the death of her husband, and is as much beyond his control or power of disposition as her own inheritance. It not being his to give, every devise which he makes of the land, upon which the right of dower attaches, is presumed to be given subject to *the legal estate, unless the contrary appears on the face of the will in express words or by the strongest kind of implication." This is the principle—that the land is devised subject to the dower. The assessment for dower must, therefore, be paid by the devisees of the land or their proceeds, when sold. Whatever funds may have been actually employed in paying off this assessment, must be placed by the devisees, or by the executors, out of the proceeds of land sold or to be sold, to the extent that they are liable to dower.

5. "In South Carolina, the whole estate is charged, by law, with the payment of debts; but in the absence of any special direction by the testator, certain rules have been adopted in the marshaling of assets, * * * but a testator has the right to prescribe a law for the disposition of his estate, which is obligatory upon all claiming as volunteers. The inquiry always is, Has the testator expressed an intention to have his assets marshaled in a different manner from that prescribed by law? Does there appear from the whole testamentary disposition taken together, an intention on the part of the testator, so expressed as to convince a judicial mind that it was meant, not merely to charge the estate secondarily liable, but so to charge it as to exempt the estate primarily liable?"

This is the language of the late eminent Chancellor Dunkin, delivering the opinion of the Court of Equity Appeals in Brown v. James, 3 Strobb. Eq. 29. I have transcribed it here because in my opinion the testator has in this case clearly expressed an intention, and has prescribed a law, which will control the question as to what legacies are first to be resorted to for the payment of debts, upon the failure of assets undisposed of specifically, and otherwise primarily liable. Of course the general rule is that personal property not specifically bequeathed, is to be resorted to in the payment of debts, before specific legacies; and specific legacies, before real estate, devised.

ed under a general residuary clause are liable before a specific legacy. Warley v. Warley, Bailey Eq. 397; [McMullin v. Brown] 2 Hill Eq. 457.

In the first ten clauses of his will the testator here has devised and bequeathed the great bulk of his estate. I presume there will be no question that all those devises and bequests are specific, *except the pecuniary legacies bequeathed in the sixth clause to Washington A. Williams Anderson, and in the seventh clause to John D. Williams Watts, or, more accurately, in trust for them respectively. Standing alone, they would certainly not be specific. But in the eleventh clause of the will, testator evidently classed them with the other legacies and bequests, and considered them all together as a specific portion of his estate, carried out and set apart for the persons and uses therein declared. It seems to me clear that the law of this will is that the property and assets, passing under the eleventh or residuary clause, is liable for the payment of debts before any resort is had to the legacies and devises set forth and contained in the previous clauses of the will, and it is so adjudged.

In the ninth clause of the will it said in regard to the property therein devised, that in case neither Mrs. Witherspoon nor John D. Garlington desired to take it at a valuation, "then to be sold, and in either case, the proceeds to be divided as in the case of the residue of my estate in the eleventh clause of this my last will and testament." This disposition is to be considered still as specific, though to be divided as directed in regard to the general residue.

It has occurred to me that some question might be raised as to whether the property given to the widow for life reverts directly to the remaindermen when she renounced the same, or reverted to the estate until the termination of her natural life. In Avelyn v. Ward, 1 Ves. 420, Lord Hardwicke decided the principle when he said, he knew of no case "of a remainder or conditional termination over of a real estate, whether by way of particular estate, so as to leave a proper remainder, or to defeat an absolute fee before conditional termination; but if the precedent limitation by what means soever is out of the case, the subsequent limitation takes place." In the Touchstone (452) it is said: "If one devise his land to another in fee-simple, fee-tail, for life or years, and the devisee after the death of the testator doth refuse and waive the estate devised to him, in this case, and by this means the devise is (as to him) void, and by the refusal of a particular estate, the remainder will be accelerated, and an intended remainder may be converted into an executory devise."

tise on Wills, p. 702,) that "Where real or personal estate is given to a person for life with an ulterior gift to B., the gift to B. is absolutely vested, and takes effect in possession, whenever the prior gift ceases or fail." So in our own case of Lesly v. Collier, 3 Rich. Eq. 128, it is said, "If there be a legacy to one for life, with remainder to another, which remainder, on the death of the testator would be direct and vested and not contingent, and the person intended to be the tenant for life, dies in the life-time of the testator, * * * it cannot be doubted that in such case, the legacy does not lapse, but on the death of the testator goes at once to him who, in the scheme of the legacy, was intended to be only a remainderman." According to these principles, the remaindermen, Mrs. Witherspoon and John D. Garlington, were entitled to the property devised and bequeathed to the widow for life, with remainder to them, from the time of her election to take dower, as if the devise had been directly to them; and it is so adjudged.

It will follow from what has been said, that the legacy to John D. W. Watts was not payable out of the proceeds of the lands devised to Mrs. Williams for life, and that to the extent to which that fund was so employed, compensation must be made to Mrs. Witherspoon and to John D. Garlington to the extent that their interests were affected by such payment. As already said, the property whose proceeds were applied in this manner was portion of that described and disposed of by the ninth clause of the will, and mentioned also in the codicil and in the sixteenth clause of the will. In the contingency that after the termination of the arrangement with Dr. Anderson, neither Mrs. Witherspoon nor John D. Garlington should desire to take the land at a valuation, the same was directed to be sold and the proceeds to be divided as in the case of the residue of the estate under the eleventh clause of the will.

By that clause it was directed that the rest and residue of the estate should be sold by the executors and the proceeds divided as follows: "One-fourth part to Col. James W. Watts and Dr. William Anderson, in trust for the sole and separate use of my said wife during her natural life, with the power on her part of disposing of the same to such persons as she may see fit, and the *remaining three-fourths to be equally divided between my two daughters, Lucy and Phœbe, and grandson, John D. Garlington, so as to give my said daughters and grandson equal portions," &c., with a provision that on the death of either without leaving issue, the share of the party so dying to be divided among the survivors. There is here no disposition of the one-fourth bequeathed to the executors, in trust for Mrs. Williams, for life, with the power in her of disposing of the same at her death. Upon her renunciation of the bequest this provision for her benefit was no longer operative, and the fund which was the subject of it became assets in the hands of the executors, undisposed of by the will, as in the case of a lapsed legacy. Coffin v. Elliott, 9 Rich. Eq. 244.

As to three-fourths of the sum paid by the executors, from the proceeds of the land sold, which were distributed under the ninth clause of the will, "as in case of the residue," the plaintiff, Mrs. Witherspoon, and the defendant, John D. Garlington, are entitled to be re-imbursed out of the estate, and if that be not sufficient, then out of the land purchased by the executors with that fund, in part, for John D. W. Watts. The payment was authorized by the decree which authorized the sale for that purpose, but the rights of the parties were reserved.

The proceeds of the Milton Mills tract, the legacy in favor of the Crowders having failed, fall into the residue.

The devisees are entitled to rents and profits, as to the property devised to her for life, from Mrs. Williams' renunciation. As to the Simpson lands, from the termination of the arrangement made by the testator with Dr. Wm. Anderson, directed by him to be continued until January 1st, 1875, and as long after as should be desirable. As to White Plains, from the termination of the like arrangement with James W. Watts, as provided in the thirteenth clause of the will. As to Spring Grove, from January 1st, 1871. The personal property on these two last named places having been blended with them, and specifically devised with them as a whole, are to be considered as a part thereof.

The pecuniary legatees are entitled to interest from the expiration of one year from the death of the testator.

This brings me to the questions made by the answer of John G. Williams, involving the title to the Spring Grove plantation. I am unable to conclude that the claim is established. Testator placed his son John G. Williams in possession of Spring Grove in 1858, and he has remained continuously in possession ever since. Some time after he went into possession, and before the war of secession, testator proposed to his said son, to substitute White Plains, a more valuable place, for Spring Grove. Testator was desirous of getting his son away from Spring Grove on account of certain associations in that neighborhood which he deemed injurious to him. This proposition, though evidently advantageous to him, was rejected by John G.

On another occasion, about the year 1858, John G. Williams was about erecting a building for a residence on Spring Grove, and he and his father differed at to the site of the house. Testator closed the dispute by saying to his son, "It is your place and you can do as you please about it," and accordingly John's location was adopted. These buildings and other improvements were made, in part, by the assistance of the testator, who furnished workmen and some material. Fencing and other improvements were made on the place by John G., who used and cultivated it as if it were his own, from the time he entered into possession. In 1859 or 1860 testator said to J. F. Leak, a witness, who went to him to rent a portion of the land: "I have given all on the other side of Mudlick creek to my son John, and have nothing to do with it." On other occasions he spoke of Spring Grove as John's place, and said he had given it to him. John G. Williams also has in his possession the title-deeds and original grant of the Spring Grove lands, but it does not clearly appear when or how they came into his possession.

On the other hand, there is no evidence of the distinct assertion, by John G. Williams, of an independent and adverse title contrary to the will, until he filed his complaint, setting up his claim to such title, in September, 1875. He returned no real estate for taxation, and paid no taxes on Spring Grove until after *testator's death. Neither of the executors, nor the members of the family, ever heard of such a claim on the part of John G. Williams, until after testator's death. The place was appraised as part of the estate of testator without objection. John G. Williams was a party to the two suits hereinbefore mentioned, that for dower, and the other for the sale of property to pay the dower, and in neither case did he deny that he held Spring Grove under the will, or assert any independent title thereto.

Considering all these circumstances in connection with the devise of Spring Grove by the testator, I find evidence that satisfies me that the possession of John G. Williams of the Spring Grove plantation, and other property connected with it, during the life-time of his father, was not adverse, but permissive, and understood to be in subordination to testator's title and his right to devise the same, and to define the intent and nature of the estate which it was the intention of both that he should take in the same.

Furthermore, I am satisfied that if the title had been such as now claimed by John G. Williams, the circumstances were such as to require him to elect between accepting the benefits of the will and claiming against it, renouncing those benefits. This election he made when he accepted the surrender and cancellation of his indebtedness to the estate under the provisions of the will, which, with the other benefits derived from the estate, and the advancements previously made to him, his father considered, made him equal with the other children of the testator. The remaindermen under the devise of Spring Grove would be entirely disappointed, if he held that place by an independent title. "It has been holden for an established principle of equity, that when a testator, by his will, confers a bounty on one person, and makes a disposition in favor of another, prejudicial to the former, the person thus prejudiced shall not insist upon his old right, and at the same time enjoy the benefits conferred by the will." Melchor v. Burger, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 634.

John G. Williams accepted the provision made for him in the will, with a full knowledge of the facts. He was a party to the proceedings for dower, and allowed the amount assessed for the same on Spring Grove to be paid or provided for out of the estate, *and as a portion of the lands whereof testator died seized, and which he devised by his will. He was party to a suit, under which, with his consent, other lands devised by testator were sold to pay this dower, he having no interest whatever in such lands. I am compelled, under the circumstances, to conclude, that if this were a case of election, his conduct amounts to a deliberate choice to accept the provisions of the will as absolute and to abide by them. Having done this he cannot recant. Buist v. Dawes, 3 Rich. Eq. 301. It is there said that whenever an election has been made, either at law or in equity, it is a satisfaction of the alternative right, and that the party will not be allowed to retract, unless upon grounds of equity shown to exist, inherent in the circumstances. There are none such here.

The conclusions which have been announced, require that the dower be paid out of the specific lands upon which it was assessed, or out of their proceeds, if sold; that to the extent that other funds have been employed for that purpose, compensation be made by the owners of the land, or the persons entitled to the proceeds of land sold. That, if required for the payment of debts, the legacies and devises abate, after the exhaustion of property and assets not disposed of by the will in consequence of lapse or renunciation of the widow, resort shall first be had to the property and assets which fell into the residue of the estate and passed under the eleventh clause of the will. That, if necessary that the other devises and legacies abate, they contribute equally, pro rata, without any preference between them according to their value at the time when the right of possession or of payment accrued. That, if necessary, the residuary legatees contribute to the payment of the pecuniary legacies. That in all cases compensation shall be made according to the principles herein declared,

As to the demands of the plaintiffs that the executors be suspended from their office and the estate taken out of their hands, no case has been made which would authorize the court to interfere with the wishes of the testator in this respect.

I do not perceive the propriety of withholding the enjoyment of the property devised and bequeathed to the plaintiffs, Mrs.

*Witherspoon and John D. Garlington on account of the outstanding debts. There has been sufficient time to ascertain and discharge them.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the lands of the testator, John D. Williams, remaining unsold, which were directed to be sold by the decree of the court heretofore made for the purpose of paying the dower and the pecuniary legacies, be sold by the master on the first Monday in February next, or some convenient salesday thereafter, at public auction, after first duly advertising them on the terms following, to wit, one-third cash, the balance on a credit of one and two years, to be secured by the bond of the purchaser and a mortgage of the property, and that the same be sold in such convenient parcels as may best promote the interests of the estate. That the proceeds of said sale be held by the master subject to the provisions of the will and the provisions of this decree, to be paid out under the order of this court. That a writ of partition do issue to commissioners to be named therein, directing them to divide the White Plains plantation, with the personal property of the estate thereon belonging to the estate, into two equal parts, respect being had to the value thereof, and to assign and allot in severalty to the plaintiff, Phoebe Y. Witherspoon, and to John D. Garlington one equal share or moiety thereof, according to law and the usage and practice of this court. That the said property, notwithstanding such partition, stand charged in the hands of the said parties with the payment of the debts of the estate, to the extent to which the same may be liable to contribute according to the principle herein adjudged, and also liable for and charged with the payment of such sums as may be adjudged against the parties to whom the same is allotted, in order to adjust the accounts between the parties to this action. That it be referred to the master to restate the accounts of the executors, and between the parties, according to the requirements of this decree and the principles herein announced. That it be referred to the master to take testimony and report a scheme for the payment of the debts of the estate, ascertaining what funds are available therefor, and how much thereof is necessary to be set aside for *that purpose, and that he report a scheme for the final settlement of the estate in accordance with this decree.

It is ordered and adjudged that the exceptions to the rulings of the referee as to the admissibility of the testimony of A. Y. Miller and of C. M. Miller, and also as to the admissibility of the record marked Exhibit A., be sustained. The other exceptions to the evidence are overruled. It is to be remarked here that those exceptions were not specific, but so general as to throw upon the presiding judge the labor of searching through the whole case to ascertain what objections were included in the general terms employed. Nor were they made more specific in the argument; under these circumstances they might have been disregarded by the court.

It is ordered that the costs of this suit be paid by the executors out of the estate of the testator.

It is not intended that the executors should await further proceedings under this judgment before proceeding with their duties, but they are ordered to proceed to realize and collect the assets of the estate and to settle the debts and the legacies as far as they may have assets for that purpose, observing the order of such payments and the proper application of funds as adjudged herein. And all restraining orders heretofore issued, prohibiting such collections and payments, are hereby revoked and overruled, or to that extent modified.

From this decree all parties gave notice of appeal to the Supreme Court. The plaintiffs and John D. Garlington appealed upon exceptions alleging error:

1. In decreeing that the defendant executor, William Anderson, was not jointly with his co-executor chargeable with the items of $1,776.50 and $1,176.74 charged against him in the report of the referee.

2. In overruling plaintiffs' exceptions to the report of the referee as to allowance to executors of commissions on the rents received by them.

3. In not sustaining plaintiffs' exceptions to the referee's report, that the referee should have reported that the accounting herein was not final, but that a large amount of choses in action, as well as other property of the estate, were still in executors' hands, and should be accounted for hereafter, and that the accounting of the executors on their co-partnership with the estate as to the White Plains and Mill places was still open for a future accounting.

4. In not requiring the executors to give bond for the faithful discharge of their duties, or failing in that, in not putting the assets of said estate in the hands of a receiver.

5. In holding that by renunciation of devise by testator's widow, there was a lapse in the devise of one-fourth of the land mentioned in the ninth clause of the will; whereas, it is respectfully submitted that his Honor should have held that by said renunciation, the whole thereof went to Phoebe Y. Witherspoon and John D. Garlington.

6. In not holding that the land purchased for John D. Williams Watts, was charged in favor of Phoebe Y. Witherspoon and John D. Garlington, with the sum of $2,192 with interest from the 29th December, 1879.

7. In holding that, if necessary, the other devises and legacies abate, and that they contribute equally pro rata without any preference between them, according to their value at the time when the right of possession or of payment accrued.

8. In not holding that the specific devises and legacies in favor of Mrs. Phoebe Y. Witherspoon and John D. Garlington should first be paid in full before any payment could be made towards the pecuniary legacy in favor of Washington A. Williams Anderson and John D. Williams Watts.

9. In directing a sale of the mill tract of land before it was ascertained that any debts were owing by the estate, or that the funds in the hands of the executors were insufficient to pay the same.

10. In not decreeing that the value of the dower of testator's widow in the Spring Grove tract of land, together with the interest thereon from the time of testator's death, should be paid by John G. Williams to Phoebe Y. Witherspoon and John D. Garlington, and that the same was a lien or charge upon the life-estate of the said John G. Williams in said tract of land.

11. In not holding that the plaintiffs and John D. Garlington are entitled to all the rents in their hands specifically devised *to them, and also of at least three-fourths of the rents of the real estate specifically devised to them under the will from the death of testator until the election by the widow to take dower in the real estate of testator.

12. In not holding that Phoebe Y. Witherspoon and John D. Garlington were entitled to rents of all the real estate not specifically devised until the actual sale of said real estate.

13. In not holding that Lucy has no estate under the testator's will as claimed by John G. Williams.

14. In not holding that the plaintiffs, Phoebe Witherspoon and John D. Garlington, were entitled to the ——— bales of cotton rents in hand of the executors at time of said decree.

John G. Williams' exceptions are as follows:

1. Because the evidence shows that this defendant had held Spring Grove adversely under parol gift from his father, John D. Williams, for more than two years prior to his death, and that defendant had not estopped himself from setting up this title. His Honor erred in not so finding.

2. Because this defendant is not bound to pay the assessment in lieu of dower in Spring Grove, but it should be paid by executors out of the estate devised and bequeathed to the widow, in lieu of which she elected to take dower. His Honor erred in not so finding.

3. Because the defendant, as administrator of the personal estate of Lucy Williams, deceased, is entitled to an account by the executors of the rents and profits from the estate of John D. Williams, deceased, from his death to hers, and to receive one-third thereof, after deducting the amount expended for her support. His Honor erred in not so finding.

4. Because this defendant is entitled, as administrator as aforesaid, to one-third of the proceeds of sale, and assignment of the homestead and personal property thereon, under the provisions of the second and eighth clauses of John D. Williams' will. His Honor erred in not so finding.

5. Because said decree is in other respects contrary to the law and evidence.

The infant defendants, by their guardian ad litem, and the executors, excepted to said decree:

*1. Because his Honor erred in holding that the sum of $800 paid for the purchase of a tract of land for J. D. W. Watts, was derived from the proceeds of the sale of a portion of the lands of the testator known as the Mill tract, and sold to William Mills.

2. The defendant executors, and B. W. Ball, guardian ad litem, respectfully submit that his Honor erred in not holding that, the property devised to the life tenants, and conditionally to certain devisees, as referred to the residuary clause to pass thereunder, should abate with the property passing under the residuary clause.

May 12th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice ALDRICH. I have been so continuously engaged since the hearing of this case and Pope v. Mathews [18 S. C. 444], that I have not had time to prepare the opinions. My circuits last year were the Eighth, First and Second, which are three of the largest in the State; the business had accumulated and the chambers business on my own circuit was more than usually pressing. As I think my first care is to my circuit duties, I have not had the time to devote to the extra call of the Supreme Court, before now.

The appeal from the exhaustive decree of Judge Kershaw, who heard the cause, presents several interesting questions, which he has so clearly stated and discussed that it will not be necessary to encumber this opinion by a statement of the same.

The first question to which the learned judge addresses himself, is the balance due by J. W. Watts, which is charged by the *referee to both executors, Watts and Anderson. Undoubtedly the rule is, that one executor shall not be responsible for the assets which came into the hands of his co-executor. This is a question of fact, and the Circuit judge, after a full hearing and a mature consideration of the evidence and argument, has decided that it is properly chargeable only to the executor J. W. Watts. I see no reason to dissent from his conclusion of law and fact. See Circuit decree and authorities there cited.

From the evidence, it does appear that there are assets still in the hands of the executors, and there should be an accounting for the balance yet to be administered. It is so ordered.

Next, as to the appointment of a receiver. When a testator, in the most solemn act of his life, deliberately selects two of his friends to act as his executors, his wish is to be regarded, and the appointment he thus makes is not lightly to be set aside. He does not select them because of their ability to respond, but for their integrity and the trust and confidence he has in their friendship and honor. In this case, the testator well knew that these gentlemen were in moderate circumstances, if not insolvent; that the ample estate he was entrusting to their charge, if wasted, would be irrevocably lost and his bounty to his wife and children defeated. With these facts before him, he trusts them with his all, in full faith and confidence that these objects of his love and bounty will not be defrauded by his life-long, trusted friends. Are we to close our ears to this voice from the grave, and say, "You have made a mistake; your friends are not to be trusted," and thus condemn the judgment of the dead and cast a reproach upon the living? An executor may commit errors in his accounts, make mistakes in his construction of the will; these the court will correct, but will not remove the executor unless there is willful misconduct, waste, or improper disposition of the assets, as is said in Wms. Ex., and approved in our own court, in Stairley v. Rabe [McMul. Eq. 22]. The decree of the presiding judge is sustained.

Testator died in 1870. In April, 1873, two years and ten months after, the widow, Mrs. Anna E. Williams, renounced her interest under the will, and elected to take her dower. The proceedings in dower were had in the Probate Court, and the executors directed to pay her $12,400, the assessed value of the this dower to be assessed? Dower being that estate which the wife has in the lands of which her husband was seized during coverture, it seems to me there can be no question she is entitled to have it assessed in each particular tract of land of which the testator was seized. And if, instead of assigning her the land, one-sixth of the value thereof is admeasured to her, as in this case, it follows that each tract must contribute its proportion of value. For as, if the land be assigned, she takes one-third, for life, in land, that is the land from which it is admeasured, so, when money is assigned the land which the money represents is the land out of which the money is to be raised.

The moment the widow renounced her interest under the will she stood as much a stranger thereto as if she had not been mentioned in that instrument. She was entitled to her legal estate and entitled to it out of the land, no matter who is in possession, or how long and for what consideration, before his death, the husband had aliened it. It makes no difference what disposition the testator has made, he could not divest her of her legal estate, favored by the law, by giving her a legacy, and, when she renounced the legacy, the only way in which she could receive her dower was out of each separate tract of which he had been seized; or, if the admeasurement be in money, then the land representing the money is liable therefor. The Circuit judge is right in ordering, "the assessment for dower must, therefore, be paid by the devisees of the land or their proceeds, when sold. Whatever funds may have been actually employed in paying off this assessment, must be replaced by the devisees, or by the executors, out of the proceeds of land sold or to be sold, to the extent that they are liable to dower." And this is manifestly the rule, for if the dower be paid out of the general estate, it may absorb the assets and thus defeat creditors and specific legatees.

The next question is, Are the legacies in trust for Washington A. Williams Anderson and John D. Williams Watts general or specific? If the clause in the will in which these legacies are made stood alone, undoubtedly they would be general. But the will is the law of the case. Now, what did the testator *intend? There was no doubt in his mind that each of these boys would receive every cent of the bounty he intended for them, as evidence of his affection for the sons of his trusted friends, who had named them after his deceased son and himself. He was a man of ample means, had an estate that far exceeded his pecuniary liabilities. In disposing of it, he bequeathed the great bulk of all he possessed in the first ten clauses of his will. Then, to show the nature of these bequests, how he regarded and intended them, he calls them specific legacies, by using this emphatic language, "having specifically disposed."

It is the province and the rule of the courts to give effect to every clause of a will, and always to carry out the intent of a testator, when that intent can be ascertained. That he intended them to have this pecuniary legacy, is clear; that he knew there was ample property to pay, is equally clear; but, to make his bounty and his meaning certain and unailing, he uses the significant expression, "specifically disposed." The testator was a man of large business capacity, an educated gentleman, a "pretty good lawyer," as he is described. Is it to be supposed that such a man used the expressive words, "specifically disposed," at random, without a purpose? I think not. He intended to make those legacies specific, and that the youths should be the recipients of his bounty, beyond a peradventure. The Circuit judge is herein sustained.

The last important question is as to the Spring Grove place. Did John G. Williams have title to this tract of land? The testimony is so full and the reasoning of the decree so conclusive, that it is unnecessary to enlarge on this topic. It is very clear the testator never regarded the land as the property of his son, and never intended it to be subject to his creditors. His wish to induce his son to remove from the place, his disposition of it in his will, is conclusive that he did not suppose he had given the land to John G., or that he had acquired title thereto. And John G. knew that as well as his father.

These are the main points in the case. The other questions are satisfactorily disposed of in the Circuit decree.

The appeal is dismissed.

Where a debtor mortgages his entire real estate, and subsequently a judgment is recovered against him, the judgment creditor has the equitable right to compel the mortgagor [mortgagee] to first exhaust so much of the debtor's land as embraces the homestead. Fraser, A. A. J., dissenting.

Before Hudson, J., Anderson, July, 1881.

In this case Honorable THOMAS B. FRASER, of the Third Judicial Circuit, sat in the place of Mr. Justice MCGOWAN, who had been of counsel in the cause.

The Circuit decree thus states the case:

On July 22d, 1880, the plaintiff, a corporation, filed the aforesaid complaint to foreclose a mortgage on the real estate of Morgan Harbin, and to this action made the other defendants parties, as claiming an interest in said property by virtue of liens held thereon by mortgage and judgment. The parties defendant holding liens answered and claimed, by way of affirmative relief, that their respective liens be foreclosed or enforced, and the same satisfied out of the proceeds of the sale of defendant's land in the order of priority and legal right.

In his answer, the defendant, Harbin, interposes a claim of homestead, which claim is resisted by the defendants, or some of them. Morgan Harbin is the head of a family, and owns no real estate except that described in the complaint, and is thus fully qualified constitutionally to claim a homestead out of the land described in the complaint. The question is whether he has not deprived himself of the right of homestead as against the aforesaid creditors.

The following are the facts found, and about which there seems to be no dispute: On January 23d, 1875, the defendant, Morgan Harbin, executed and delivered to his co-defendant, D. Arrington, his note, and, to secure its payment, a mortgage on all his lands, including the tract whereon he lived —the note *being for $300, with interest at the rate of one per cent. per month. On January 29th, 1877, he gave to the plaintiff, the Savings Bank, his note for $1,535 at the legal rate of interest, and, to secure its payment, he executed and delivered to the bank a mortgage on that part of his land known as the Bolt tract, and furthermore, as collateral security for the note, he delivered to the bank a note due by W. F. Parker for the sum of about $800. This Bolt tract contains 324 acres, and lies adjacent to the Home tract of 276 acres, and the two really form one body of land, though consisting originally of two tracts, and still retaining different names. On March 1st, 1878, Joseph N. Brown, as administrator of the estate of E. M. Brown, deceased, recovered judgment against Morgan Harbin for $59.46, and $6.15 of costs. On February 19th, 1879, Harbin gave his two promissory notes for the aggregate sum of $167.98 to M. W. Coleman & Co., with interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, and, to secure the same, executed and delivered to them a mortgage on all the lands aforesaid. On March 17th, 1879, the defendants, G. W. Maret and P. S. Mahaffey, as executors of the last will of

All the aforesaid mortgages are free from objection as to form and date of recording, the first and last constituting a lien on all Harbin's land, and the second only on the 324 acres or Bolt tract. The judgments are likewise free from objection as to form, were duly entered up, and constitute a general lien on the real estate of Harbin, and the cause of action in each judgment as well as mortgage arose subsequent to the adoption of our present constitution. The judgment in favor of the executors of Coates is the junior lien of all, but the cause of action is perhaps of older date, being in 1872. The tract of land mortgaged to the plaintiff, the 324 acres Bolt tract, has already been sold under a former decree of foreclosure and sale in this cause, all equities being reserved, and brought $1,410.

The questions raised in the pleadings and argument for the determination of the court involve conflicting equities between the creditors by judgment and mortgage as against each other, and Harbin. In behalf of the judgment creditors, it is contended *that they, having a right to enforce their liens only against so much of the land as is in excess of Harbin's homestead, have an equity to compel the mortgage creditors first to exhaust that homestead over which they have a lien and right of enforcing it, before, they can be permitted to receive any part of the proceeds of the sale of the land in excess of the homestead.

It is needless to cite authority for the proposition that when one creditor has two funds to which he can resort for payment, whilst another creditor can resort to but one of them, equity will force the first creditor to exhaust in the first instance that fund to which the latter cannot resort, before he is suffered to share in the fund common to both. This well-established rule settles the equities in this case as between the judgment creditors and those holding mortgages. As between these two classes of creditors the mortgagees are in equity bound to exhaust the homestead before resorting to the excess. This applies specially to the first and third mortgagees, who hold liens on all the land.

As to the plaintiffs, the second mortgagees, they are compellable first to exhaust the note against Parker, and for any balance then due and unpaid, they have an equity to be first paid out of the Bolt tract, except as to what the homestead and home place want in paying Arrington. Should the home place of 276 acres fail to pay Arrington, for the deficiency he will have precedence of the plaintiff on the Bolt tract, and for that deficiency alone.

But the claim raised by the defendant Harbin, is the most perplexing. He claims an equity to have his homestead admeasured as against all the creditors; that the mortgagees cannot resort for payment to this homestead until they have exhausted the excess, and that judgment creditors can in no event sell his homestead nor force others to do so. So far as we know or remember this interesting question has not been decided by our Supreme Court. It has, however, been raised and determined by the courts of last resort in several of the States, but with a conflict of opinion—the courts of some States maintaining the equity of the homestead claimants and others denying it. These conflicting decisions will be found collated in Thompson on Homesteads and Exemptions, §§ 656-666.

thor, and the one *which he seems to found the rule upon, is the case of Searle v. Chapman, 121 Mass. 19. In a note to section 656 will be found a full extract from the opinion of the supreme judicial tribunal of Massachusetts, delivered by Chief Justice Gray. In that case, in an action by a mortgagee to foreclose his mortgage, the mortgagor claimed the equity to compel the mortgagee to exhaust all the excess of land before selling that which should be admeasured as a homestead to defendant. The court below denied the equity, and the supreme judicial tribunal sustained the judgment in the aforesaid learned opinion, holding in substance that the homestead claimant is bound by his conditional sale of the homestead; and that "as against him, the mortgagee has the right to enforce the contract according to its terms and is not bound to elect between different remedies or securities."

Mr. Thompson says that the same doctrine prevails in Kansas; but that in some of the other States this equity of the mortgagor is recognized and enforced. In section 657 the author says: "If this is a sound rule where the only parties affected by it are the mortgagor and mortgagee, it becomes more imperative where to deny it would prejudice the rights of third parties, such as judgment creditors of the mortgagor. It then becomes a rule for the application of the familiar rule of equity, that when a creditor has a claim upon two funds, upon one of which another creditor has also a claim, and such other person will be prejudiced by allowing such creditors to satisfy his debt out of the fund subject to both claims, a court of equity will compel the creditor to take satisfaction out of the fund to which he alone has a claim, in the first instance. He must exhaust that fund before resorting to the other. He must foreclose his mortgage on the homestead before he can claim the right to share with general creditors, as to any unsatisfied balance, in the proceeds of the sale of his mortgagee's estate." In support of this position he cites White v. Polleys, 20

Wis. 530, a leading case which induced the legislature of Wisconsin to pass a special act to meet such an emergency, and to protect the equity of the homestead claimant.

We think that in the absence of a statute of like character in our State, the doctrine of Searle v. Chapman, and White v. Polleys, is the true rule, and in perfect accord with fairness and good *faith. Were a different rule to be applied to the case now under consideration, its hardship and unfairness would be manifest. It would authorize a man owning real estate largely in excess of a homestead to obtain credit upon the faith of that excess, perhaps to the full extent of its value. After these claims have been sued, but before judgment, additional credit of an equal amount is obtained on the faith of a mortgage of the same land. In an action to foreclose the mortgage to which the judgment creditors are parties, it would be in violation of all ideas of justice and equity to hold that the mortgagee could be compelled to shift the lien of his mortgage off the homestead, and first exhaust the excess and thus entirely defeat the judgment debts on contracts senior to the mortgage debt.

In our opinion the debtor, Harbin, having several times conveyed away his homestead by way of mortgage, has no equity now to compel the mortgagees to refrain from selling his homestead, especially since it would work injustice and hardship to the judgment creditors who are co-defendants in this action. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed—

1. That it be referred to the master of this court to ascertain and report the amount of principal, interest and costs due upon the judgments and mortgages afore-said respectively.

2. That the defendant, Morgan Harbin, have until the first Monday of November next in which to pay the said mortgage debts, and that, in case of his failure so to do, the master of this court, having first duly advertised the same, according to law, for sale, &c.

3. That by said sale the said Harbin and all persons claiming under, by or through him any interest in said premises, shall be forever barred and foreclosed of any equity of redemption in and to said land, and the same shall likewise be by said sale free and discharged of any and all lien of said judgment creditors thereon.

5. That before sharing in the proceeds of the said sale herein ordered and that already made, the plaintiff, the Savings Bank of Anderson, must first exhaust its remedy on the note of W. F. Parker and apply the proceeds thereof to the payment pro tanto of its debts against Harbin, and only for any balance remaining *thereafter shall said plaintiff share in the proceeds of the mortgaged premises.

6. That out of the gross sale made and to be made, shall first be paid the costs of said sale and of this action.

7. Subject to the above restrictions, the net proceeds of the sale of said land sold and to be sold, shall be distributed as follows, viz.: 1. To the payment in full of the senior mortgage debt. 2. To the mortgage debt next in seniority in full, if the Bolt tract will pay so much. 3. To the Brown judgment in full. 4. To the mortgage debt of M. W. Coleman & Co. in full. 5. To the judgment of the executors of Coates in full. 6. That should a balance be left, it be applied to any balance of the plaintiff's demand remaining unpaid from proceeds of said note and the Bolt tract, and for any such balance an execution may be issued. 7. Should a surplus still be left, the same must be paid to the defendant Harbin, his agent or attorney.

8. That the parties are at liberty to apply for any further administration order, at the foot of this decree, to carry the same into effect and in furtherance of the cause.

From this decree the defendant, Harbin, appealed in words following:

The defendant, Morgan Harbin, admitting the right of every party to this action who is a lien creditor, to have his homestead sold, if necessary for the payment of their respective liens, except the judgment of the defendants, Maret and Mahaffey, as executors of the will of John Coates, deceased, appeals from the decree of his Honor, Judge Hudson, filed in this action on July 5th, 1881, on the following ground, to wit:

Because his Honor erred in adjudging that the defendant, Morgan Harbin, was not entitled to have his homestead set off as against the judgment of Maret and Mahaffey, executors, because he had created a prior lien thereon by mortgage to other persons of that and other surplus land, enough to pay off such prior liens, adjudging the equity of said judgment creditors to compel the prior mortgagees to go upon the homestead for the collection of their mortgage debts, so as to leave the surplus liable to sale for the payment of said judgment, superior to the equity of the debtor, Morgan

Harbin, to require the mortgagees *to exhaust the surplus in the payment of their debts, so as to leave him in the enjoyment of his homestead.

Mr. J. J. Norton, for appellant.

The appellant is entitled to his homestead as against the judgment of Maret and Mahaffey. Const. of S. C., Art. II., § 32; 15 Stat. 369. The land must be sold in parcels, and only so much as is necessary to pay the mortgage debts, leaving out the homestead. Fifty-third Rule Circuit Court; Smyth Exemp., § 276. If the parcels outside of Harbin's homestead pay the prior liens, then it cannot be sold to pay Maret and Mahaffey's judgment.

Messrs. R. A. Thompson, Wells & Orr, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The facts of this case are so fully and clearly stated by the Circuit judge, that it seems unnecessary to repeat them here.

It is conceded that the question raised by this appeal is novel in this State, and that the authorities elsewhere are conflicting. It is necessary, therefore, to consider the general principles applicable, and from them to deduce the proper conclusion. There is no dispute as to the general rule, that where there are two creditors of a common debtor, one of whom has a claim or lien upon two funds, and the other upon only one of these funds, that the latter has an equity to require the former first to exhaust the fund upon which he has no claim or lien. The only qualification of this rule, laid down in the elementary writers, is that it will not apply where the creditor having the lien upon the two funds will be injured or delayed by its application. 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 633 et seq. This rule is for the benefit of the creditor only, and cannot be invoked in behalf of the debtor unless some peculiar equity springs up from other circumstances, as, for example, where the debtor occupies the position of a surety.

I am unable to perceive any reason why this well settled and universally acknowledged rule should not be applied to the present case. There is no suggestion that its application would *tend to injure or delay the creditors having liens on the two funds. All the parties are before the court, and the only objection proceeds from the common debtor, who does not occupy the position of a surety, and I do not see any equity on his part to interpose an objection to the application of the rule. His right of homestead is not an estate, but is a mere right to have a certain portion of his property "exempt from attachment, levy or sale, on any mesne or final process issued from any court."

If he has voluntarily stripped himself of this protection which the law has thrown around him, by twice mortgaging the land, out of which he would otherwise have been entitled to claim a homestead, he cannot complain at a result brought about by his own act, and he certainly has no such equity as would protect him from the operation of the rule above stated. The only creditor who would be likely to suffer under a different conclusion, is one who seems to have extended credit to the appellant before there were any liens upon any of his property, and it would seem to be manifestly inequitable that this creditor should suffer from an indulgence extended to the appellant, perhaps, in reliance upon a well settled and universally acknowledged rule.

All the authorities seem to concede the proposition that, as between the debtor and his mortgagee, the former has no equity to require the latter first to exhaust the other property embraced in the mortgage before he can go upon that out of which homestead is claimed, and, as Mr. Thompson, in his work on homesteads, section 657, well remarks: "If this is a sound rule where the only parties affected by it are the mortgagor and mortgagee, it becomes more imperative where to deny it would prejudice the rights of third parties, such as judgment creditors of the mortgagor." It would, indeed, be a strange perversion to deny the equity claimed by the debtor in a case where its application would injure no one, and yet allow it in cases where innocent third persons would be the sufferers.

The analogy drawn from the case of a devise of lands to charitable uses, does not seem to me to be complete. Creditors stand upon much higher ground than devisees or legatees, and the reason given by Lord Hardwicke, in Mogg v. Hodges, 2 Ves. *53, for not applying the rule in a case of a devise to charitable uses is, "that a court of equity is not warranted in setting up a rule of equity contrary to the common rules of the court, merely to support a bequest which is contrary to law." In the case now under consideration, it is not proposed to set up the rule of equity as to a creditor having a lien upon two funds for the purpose of securing the payment of an illegal debt, or "to support a bequest which is contrary to law," but simply to provide for the payment of a just debt, subject to no legal exception whatsoever, not out of property exempt by law, but out of property liable for its payment, by throwing another debt upon the homestead property, which the debtor has voluntarily subjected to its payment by giving a mortgage on it.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice FRASER, dissenting. I am unable to concur in the judgment of the majority of the court in this case. The single question presented by this appeal is whether Maret and Mahaffey, executors, judgment creditors of Morgan Harbin, have the right to compel the mortgagees, Arrington and Coleman & Co., who have prior mortgages of the Home tract of land, the homestead of Morgan Harbin, as well as of the Bolt tract of land, to sell the homestead and apply the proceeds to their mortgage debts, so as to leave the Bolt tract for the payment of their judgment. It is not a question here whether these mortgagees have a right, as between themselves and the mortgagor, to demand that the homestead shall be sold before the surplus land, but it is whether the mortgagees, against their will, can be compelled, at the suit of the judgment creditor and for his benefit, to sell the land in that order.

The application of the doctrine of marshaling assets forms one of the most useful, and at the same time most delicate, branches of equity jurisdiction. It depends on this principle: "That a person having two funds to satisfy his demands, he *shall not, by his election, disappoint a party who has only one fund. If, therefore, a person having a claim upon two funds chooses to resort to the only fund upon which the other has a claim, that other person shall stand in his place for so much against the fund to which otherwise he could not have access." 2 Lead. Cas. Eq., H. & W., Pt. I., p. 151; Aldrich v. Cooper, 8 Ves. 382. The doctrine is not confined to claims of creditors, and it is no peculiar equity to which they are entitled. It extends to the widow's paraphernalia (Id., p. 156), to purchasers (Id., p. 171), to legatees and devisees (Id., p. 180), and sureties who are no more than debtors as between themselves and those to whom they are bound as such, will be subrogated to all the rights of the creditor on payment of the debt. Id. 166.

In cases of devises of land to charitable uses, Lord Hardwicke, in Mogg v. Hodges, 2 Ves. 53, says: "That a court is not warranted in setting up a rule of equity, contrary to the common rules of the court, merely to support a bequest which is contrary to law," and he refused to throw the payment of debts and ordinary legacies on the real estate, so as to leave the pure personality for the charity. Id. 157, 191, 192; 2 Story Eq. Jur., § 1180. In the note at pages 191 and 192, in Leading Cases in Equity, it is said to be "well settled that where a devise of lands to charitable uses is prohibited by law, equity will not sustain a bequest to a charity by marshaling the assets, so as to throw the burden of the testator's debts on the land, for this would be contrary to the spirit of the legal prohibition."

Article I, section 20, of the constitution of this State, provides that "a reasonable amount of property, as a homestead, shall be exempted from seizure and sale for the payment of any debts or liabilities." Article II., section 32, defines the homestead, and provides that "it shall be the duty of the General Assembly, at its first session, to enforce the provisions of this section by suitable legislation." In pursuance of this injunction, an act was passed at the first session, and from time to time it was amended. The act of 1873, § 5 (15 Stat. 371): "No waiver of the right of homestead, however solemnly executed, shall be binding upon the head of the family, or in case of his or her death, his or her heirs, so as to defeat the homestead herein pro*vided for." By section 10 of the same act, it was made a misdemeanor in any officer to sell any property in violation of said act, and article II., section 32, of the constitution.

Thus stood the law at the time the liens in this case were acquired. The creditor or other claimant having only one fund is simply subrogated to the rights of a creditor who has two funds, as to the fund to which he is allowed to resort for payment. When, as in this case, the judgment creditor is put by the court in the place of the mortgagee as to the homestead, it is clearly against the spirit of the constitution and the statutes in reference to the homestead, that he shall be allowed to subject the homestead to his claim. The mortgagee certainly had a right to mortgage, and even convey in fee-simple, to whom he pleased, his homestead. But in this case he may well say, I have made no such agreement and I have not even waived my right to the homestead in favor of the judgment creditor.

If the Court of Equity will refuse to marshal assets so as to make a charity indirectly a charge on real estate by throwing creditors on the land and leaving the personality for the charity, because it would be against the policy of the law, the same reason should induce this court, it seems to me, to refuse to marshal the funds in this case so as to make a judgment indirectly chargeable on the homestead, when such homestead is not only exempt by law, but the head of the family is not allowed to waive the right thereto, and the officer forbidden, under heavy penalties, to sell the same.

If the principle on which the judgment of the Circuit Court rests is properly applicable to such cases, then there can be no case in which a homestead could not be sold to pay all outstanding debts, as soon as the head of the family who happens to own other property, ventures to mortgage the homestead and other property, to secure any one of them, or to raise money to meet the exigencies of the family.

It is a new question in this State, and in other States where a homestead law has been longer in existence, the decisions are conflicting. In Searle v. Chapman, 121 Mass. 19, the mortgagee brought his action against the mortgagor for foreclosure, and the mortgagor set up a claim as against the mortgagee to *compel him to sell the surplus first, so as to save the homestead. In this case there was a release by the husband and wife of all claim of homestead and dower. The court refused to sustain the defense.

In Massachusetts, "as between mortgagor and mortgagee, the mortgage is to be regarded as a conveyance in fee," which "gives the mortgagee a remedy in the form of a legal action." Shaw, C. J., in Ewer v. Hobbs, 5 Metc. 1-3, and Howard v. Robinson, 5 Cush. 119-123. It is true that in Massachusetts as to all other partes, as in this State, a mortgage is a mere security for the payment of money, but this difference of view as to the nature of a mortgage, ought to induce this court to hesitate to adopt the conclusions in that case, and to regard it as not sufficient authority for the inference for which it is quoted at the bar as authority in this case—that a judgment creditor has the right to compel the mortgagee to sell the homestead before the surplus. In Searle v. Chapman, the court simply declined to interfere with the rights of the mortgagee.

This distinction has been recognized in Kansas. In the case of Chapman v. Lester, 12 Kan. 592, it was held, "that when a person mortgages his homestead, together with other realty, there is no such implied obligation on the mortgagee first to exhaust his remedy on the realty other than the homestead, as will prevent him from releasing such other realty other than the homestead, and still retaining his lien on the homestead." And in a later case of Colly v. Crocker, 17 Kan. 527, it was held that the grant of a specific lien upon the homestead to secure a specific debt, does not amount to such a waiver of the homestead right, that an unsecured creditor can procure it to be sold in a proceeding for the marshaling of assets. In this case of Colly v. Crocker, a husband and wife mortgaged the homestead and other real estate to A. B. obtained a judgment upon the other property excepting the homestead, and then the husband sold a piece of property covered by the judgment and mortgage lien to C. The court held that the unsecured creditor had no such superior equity over the occupants of the homestead and the purchaser C., that he could compel a marshaling of the assets on the death of the husband.

68 Ill. 180, that "when a mortgagee, not by his own voluntary action and for his own benefit, but at the instance and for the benefit of a judgment creditor for the purpose of having his judgment satisfied, is compelled to resort first, for the satisfaction of his mortgage, to the tract subject to the homestead exemption, as respects the judgment, the mortgagor would then seem to have just cause for complaint that his homestead had been taken away from him in a mode not contemplated by the statute, and whereto he had never given his consent."

In Minnesota, in McArthur v. Martin, 23 Minn. 80, it was said that "homestead exemptions are favored by the courts, and as the application of the rule contended for in reference to the marshaling of assets, would be but an indirect method of subjecting the homestead to the payment of debts, a court of equity would not permit it to be applied in favor of judgment creditors in this case."

In Alabama, in Ray v. Adams, 45 Ala. 168, it was held that "the right of the debtor to his exemption, though inferior to that of his mortgagees, was superior to that of his judgment creditors. The prior mortgage did not enlarge his rights." In Ray v. Adams, there had been a sale under the judgment, and the debtor having been put to his election, had chosen what was set off as a homestead, and the balance of the real estate was sold. Upon a cross-bill by the judgment creditor and purchaser to compel the mortgagee first to exhaust the homestead, for their benefit, the court refused to give the relief sought.

A contrary doctrine was distinctly laid down in White v. Polleys, 20 Wis. 530, in which the court applied the general rule of equity that where one person has only one fund to which he can resort, and another person has two funds, the latter will be compelled to resort to that fund which will leave the means of payment for the person who has only one fund out of which he can be paid. Subsequently to the rendering of this decree a statute was passed in Wisconsin, "the object of which was to repeal the rule laid down in White v. Polleys and other cases." Thomp. Homest. and Exempt., § 660. The cases on this subject will be found well collected in the valuable book last quoted.

the ruling of the *Circuit judge, and leans to the opinion that while a mortgagee may have the right to select to sell the homestead first, and the surplus afterwards, if necessary, or vice versa, as to him may seem best, other creditors have no right to compel their choice one way or the other. I have already shown that the Court of Equity has never, as in the case of charities, applied the doctrine of marshaling, so as to bring about indirectly a payment out of a fund which cannot, by law, be made out of it directly on account of some positive prohibition.

The provisions in the constitution of 1868 in favor of the homestead, reserved it from attachment, levy or sale under mesne and final process to the head of the family, and the acts of the General Assembly in pursuance of the constitution to enforce the same are remedial in their nature, intended to establish a great public policy, and in doubtful cases it is the duty of the court in every fair and legitimate way to extend the remedy. In this State a mortgage is nothing more than a security for the payment of money, and cannot be extended beyond the contract of the parties. It is no part of the contract in an ordinary mortgage that the property shall be liable to the claims of creditors not contemplated in its terms, and it is difficult to see how any rule of equity for marshaling assets can be allowed to work a benefit in favor of creditors which the head of the family cannot create, by "any waiver, however solemn." It is not necessary to say judgment creditors, because all creditors can put their claims into judgments, and if judgment creditors have any rights, then all creditors may sooner or later obtain them.

The judgment creditor, under the constitution and the acts of the General Assembly, has no right to sell the homestead under his judgment in the usual way, and is even forbidden to do so under heavy penalties against the officer executing the process, and the court, I think, has no right to extend the terms of the mortgage, so as to enable creditors not contemplated in it to obtain indirectly an advantage which they could not do directly, because of a positive prohibition of the statute.

Judgment affirmed.

[1. Sheriffs and Constables ⚡88.]

A sheriff cannot refuse to enforce an execution in his office for a balance due by sureties, although after such judgment a former judgment for a less sum against the principal debtor on the same debt had been satisfied.

Judgment obtained against a principal debtor on a note bearing twelve per cent. interest (a judgment bearing only seven per cent.) was paid after a subsequent judgment had been entered against the sureties for a greater sum, resulting from the difference in interest; execution was then issued against the sureties for such difference as an unpaid balance. Held, that the execution against the sureties was not satisfied, and that they were liable for its payment.

Before Fraser, J., Abbeville, November, 1881.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. Armistead Burt, for appellant.

Mr. E. Noble, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was a rule upon the sheriff, Du Pre, for not collecting and paying over a balance alleged to be due the plaintiff on the execution issued in the case of Andrew A. Noble, Executor, v. James S. Cothran and William H. Parker.

It appeared that April 30th, 1872, Miller & Robertson, with the defendants, Cothran and Parker, as sureties, executed a note for $600 to William P. Noble. The terms of the note were "we, or either of us, promise to pay;" and the interest at twelve per cent. per annum was made "payable annually." The plaintiff, as executor of the payee, sued the principal debtors, Miller & Robertson, and on May 19th, 1876, obtained judgment against them for the sum of $785.69, counting the interest at twelve per cent. up to the time of the rendition of the judgment, which, of

The executor also sued in a separate action the defendants, sureties, who, upon some ground, filed a demurrer, which was overruled, and, on February 17th, 1879, judgment was rendered against them for $938.45, the difference in the amount of the judgment and that rendered against the principal debtors, arising from the addition of the interest at twelve per cent. which had accumulated against the sureties in the meantime. Execution was issued on this judgment January 26th, 1881, not for the whole amount recovered, but for the sum of $238.22, balance.

Before the last judgment was obtained against the sureties, an amount sufficient to satisfy the judgment against the principal debtors, and costs, had been paid to plaintiff's attorney, except a balance of $146.70, which was tendered by the sheriff to the plaintiff's attorney on January 22d, 1881, after the judgment had been obtained against the sureties, February 17th, 1879, but before the execution was lodged against them, January 26th, 1881. The plaintiff refused to receive the balance due on the execution in the first case against the principals, in which, after judgment, the interest was running at seven per cent., and ruled the sheriff, Du Pre, for not collecting and paying over to him the whole amount of the execution issued upon the second judgment against the sureties, viz., the sum of $238.22, which was larger than the judgment against the principal debtors, by the additional five per cent. interest which was calculated on the note against the sureties, during the period intervening between the first judgment against the principals and the second against the sureties.

The sheriff in his return stated the facts as above given and concluded as follows:

"The respondent has been advised, and has in good faith acted upon the advice, that as the judgment against Miller & Robertson and that against Cothran and Parker were upon the same note, in which the former were principals and the latter were sureties; the payment of the judgment against the principals was satisfaction of the judgment against Cothran and Parker, the sureties to the same debt, and that he, *consequently, could not levy the property of the latter for a debt which has been paid."

The return came up before Judge Fraser, who held that the late case of Hellams v. Abercrombie, 15 S. C. 110 [40 Am. Rep. 684], covered the point, and was conclusive against the defendants. He ordered that the rule against the sheriff should be made absolute, and from this order the defendants appeal to this court upon the following grounds: "1. Because a creditor cannot recover or collect from a surety a greater sum than he can from the principal debtor. 2. Because the payment and satisfaction of the judgment against Miller & Robertson, the principal debtors, was an extinguishment of the several judgment against J. S. Cothran and W. H. Parker, their sureties. 3. Because payment or satisfaction of the debt of the principal debtor, is the performance and satisfaction of the contract of the surety and his discharge from all liability for his promise. 4. Because the relation of a surety to his principal is the same after judgment as before, and his liability is only secondary, and it was error in the presiding judge to hold that the liability of the sureties was not ended as soon as the debt of their principals was paid and satisfied and they discharged from their liability to the creditor."

The exceptions seem to charge error in the order of the Circuit judge making the rule absolute against the sheriff, upon two grounds, which, for the sake of clearness, we will consider separately. They allege first that a creditor cannot legally recover a larger sum against a surety than he has recovered against the principal on the same debt—that as a rule the liability of the surety is measured by that of the principal; and, second, that even after a larger sum has gone into judgment against the sureties, the creditor cannot collect anything on the judgment against the sureties, in excess of what would pay and discharge the judgment for a less sum against the principal.

In reference to the first branch of the inquiry, as to whether a larger sum may be recovered against the surety than was recovered against the principal debtors, it might in this case be enough to say that the proper time to make that question was when the second judgment was recovered against the sureties; and that after such judgment had been recovered and the lodg*ment of an execution thereon, it was not for the sheriff, a ministerial officer, to suggest that he ought not to be required to enforce the process in his hands for the reason that the recovery was erroneous. But as this question was not raised in the case, we will consider whether the rendition of the second judgment for an amount larger than the first judgment, was error. It seems that the surety defendants did not make the question at the trial. They demurred upon some ground which does not appear, and the demurrer being overruled, there was judgment by default, February 17th, 1879, and the assessment at twelve per cent. was made on the note up to that time and entered into the judgment, which made it to that extent larger than the judgment which had been previously rendered against the principal debtors.

Suppose the sureties had then made the defense that judgment had previously been rendered against the principal debtors for a less sum, could it have been sustained? Although the defendants, Cothran and Parker, were only sureties on the note so far as their principal debtors were concerned, their obligation was in terms "we, or either of us, promise to pay," and in regard to the creditor they were original obligors as well as the principal debtors, and might have been sued alone independent of any action against them, and if they had been so sued, can there be any doubt that the interest on the note at twelve per cent. per annum would have been calculated and added in the judgment? Probably, as springing out of this direct relation of the sureties as debtors of the creditor, it seems to have been settled in this State long before the case of Hellams v. Abercrombie, 15 S. C. 110 [40 Am. Rep. 684], that a former judgment against the principal debtor, still remaining unsatisfied, could not be pleaded in bar of a subsequent action on the same note against the sureties. Treasurers v. Bates, 2 Bail. 362; McDonald v. Pickett, Id. 618; Peters v. Barnhill, 1 Hill 234; Stinson v. Brennan, Cheves 16.

In the case of McDonald v. Pickett, supra, it was held that to "an action on a promissory note brought against the surety in the name of the original payee, it is no defense that the latter had obtained judgment on the same note against the principal." In delivering the judgment of the court, Judge

O'Neill said: "The force of the objection can be tested by a single question, Can the former recovery by the plaintiffs against the principal, Beckham, be pleaded in bar to a recovery in this case without averring satisfaction of it? It is clear that it cannot; and it is equally clear, from the facts already stated, that the judgment is not satisfied." So we may say here, at the time the judgment was rendered against the sureties, the first judgment against the principal debtors was not paid in full. If it had been, it might have been pleaded in bar. It is true that the balance on that case was tendered on January 22d, 1881, before execution was entered, but after the judgment was rendered on the same debt. But that tender of payment could not operate retrospectively and affect the judgment which had already been rendered, and it was necessary for the execution to issue in conformity to the judgment rendered.

But, accepting this view, it is still further insisted that, although the first judgment was not paid until after the second judgment was rendered, the sureties have since paid enough to satisfy the first judgment, principal, interest and costs, and that should operate as satisfaction of the first judgment, and the sheriff should not be required to collect so much of the execution against the sureties as is in excess of the first judgment, arising from the note running for a longer time against them at twelve per cent. interest. Without undertaking now to consider the rights which may exist between the sureties and the principal debtors, but looking to their rights in reference to their creditor and his two judgments, one against the principal and the other against the sureties, we know of no principle which would authorize the court to declare the larger judgment against the sureties satisfied, simply upon it being shown that both judgments were on the same note, and that the first against the principal debtors had been paid in full, principal, interest and costs. One judgment is certainly satisfaction of the other, but only pro tanto. Day v. Hill, 2 Speers 629 [42 Am. Dec. 390]; Jones v. Kilgore, 2 Rich. Eq. 63; Lumpkin v. Ferguson, 10 Rich. 424.

In the case of Jones v. Kilgore, it was distinctly held that "where judgments on the same cause of action are identical in amount, satisfaction of one is satisfaction of all. Where, however, they are not for the same amount, satisfaction of the one for the smaller sum is only satisfaction pro tanto of the others;" or, in the language of Judge Munro, in Lumpkin v. Ferguson, supra, "That the plaintiff is entitled to but one satisfaction of several judgments rendered against the parties, both having been rendered for the same debt, does not admit of a doubt, upon the well recognized principle, that where there are distinct judgments against different defendants for the same debt, all are extinguished, except as to costs, by the satisfaction of any one of them, without regard to the ultimate liabilities of the defendants to each other. Davis v. Barkley, 1 Bailey 140; Noonan v. Gray, Id. 437. But it is manifest that the rule can only apply where all the judgments are founded on the same cause of action, and are identical in amount, for, were the rule otherwise, the most flagrant injustice would often result from its operation," &c.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

POPE v. MATHEWS.

[1. Executors and Administrators ⇨ 106.]

A testator directed his executor to invest the proceeds of certain sales, and his cash and choses in action "in bank stock or otherwise." At his death, testator held note of long standing against A., one against B. with A. as surety, and another against C. The executor permitted A. to renew his own note, and also with his own note to take up the notes of B. and C., neither of these new notes of A. having any surety or other security. The executor lent other of this fund to D. in April, 1860, under D.'s promise to furnish good security, which was never done. A. and D. were perfectly solvent when their notes were taken, but after the ward were insolvent, and the fund was lost in part to the estate. Held, that the executor was not liable for the losses on these notes. Mr. Justice McIVER, dissenting, except as to the renewal of A.'s individual note.

2. Nance v. Nance, 1 S. C. 218, modified. Mr. Justice Aldrich, dissenting.

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, November, 1880.

This was a bill in equity filed in 1867, by Frances M. Pope, V. J. Tobias and Josephine M., his wife, against Bird C. Mathews, as executor of the will of Jacob Pope, deceased.

*Jacob Pope died in August, 1849, leaving of force a will, whereby he gave his entire estate to his wife for life, and certain personality absolutely. The last two clauses were as follows:

4. I give all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate to my grandson, Jacob Pope Rutherford, in fee-simple, after the death of my wife; and I direct my executors to take charge of the property and manage the same for his benefit until he shall attain the age of twenty-one years, selling such portions of the property as they shall see fit (excepting the land and negroes, which are not to be sold), and to invest the proceeds of the sale, and the cash and choses in action, in bank stock or otherwise.

5. I nominate and appoint Thomas H. Pope and Bud C. Matthews executors of this, my last will and testament.

There was a codicil to this will in the words following:

"If my grandson, Jacob Pope Rutherford, should die without leaving issue then living, all the property and estate given to him by my said will shall go to the children then living, of my son, Mark F. Pope, deceased, to be equally divided among them; but neither of the children of my said son shall receive his or her share until he or she shall attain the age of twenty-five years. This codicil is to go into effective operation if my said grandson, Jacob Pope Rutherford, shall die without leaving issue then living, whether it shall so happen in my lifetime or after my death, and at whatever age he may so die without leaving issue then living."

The defendant, Bud C. Mathews, alone qualified as executor. The widow of testator died in 1858, and Jacob Pope Rutherford, without issue, in 1859. The children of Mark F. Pope, living at the death of Rutherford in 1859, were the present plaintiffs, F. M. Pope and V. J. Tobias, who respectively attained the age of twenty-five years in 1865 and 1867.

Many of the issues in this cause were settled by the referee and the Circuit judge. The questions brought to this court were based upon the following facts: At the time of his death, testator held a note on John Belton O'Neill, who was then a judge of our Law Courts, and afterwards Chief Justice of the Appeal Court. This note, dated September 15th, 1840, was for $688.76, and was unsecured. It was renewed to the executor December 31st, 1853, for $1,329.54, without any security. There was another note against George Pope and Judge O'Neill, dated in 1839 or 1840, for $3,594.30, with credits. George *Pope died soon after testator, and Judge O'Neill was his executor. In September, 1855, Mathews, executor, allowed Judge O'Neill to give his own unsecured note for $4,275.57, and thereby to take up the George Pope note, including, says the executor in his testimony, "a debt of $1,000, which Thomas H. Pope took out of Jacob Pope's estate and used."

In April, 1860, Mathews let one Ramage have $600 of the estate money, under Ramage's promise to furnish security to the note then given, which, however, was never done. Mathews testified that Ramage was to "give security, but war came on and he did not." Ramage testified to the same effect.

It was fully proved by the testimony of many witnesses that before the war Judge O'Neill was a man of large estate, and that both he and Ramage were abundantly solvent and in good credit; that it was not customary for solvent men to secure their notes by mortgage, and that to ask a solvent man for a mortgage was considered an insult. Both Judge O'Neill's estate and Ramage were insolvent after the war. From the former nothing was collected during his lifetime (he died during the war), and only a small amount since; from the latter, nothing has been received, and it is doubtful whether any amount can be collected.

The plaintiffs claim that the defendant is liable for these three notes, with interest from the death of Jacob Pope Rutherford. The referee so reported, and ordered the defendant to pay the costs of the action. Upon exceptions to this report, the cause came on to be heard before Judge Kershaw, who filed the following decree:

This case was heard upon exceptions to the report of J. F. J. Caldwell, Esq., referee.

The first question I will consider is, whether the executor is accountable for the loss which has ensued in consequence of the insolvency of the O'Neill notes, and his failure to collect them when they were collectible.

I do not regard the case as the same with that of a trustee, who, having funds in his hands to invest, puts them out upon personal securities without surety or collateral. These notes were never collected by the executor.

They were simply renewed; the *debt remained the same. It is true the note of Judge O'Neill alone was taken as a renewal of the joint and several notes of Pope and himself, but there is nothing in the case to show that the renewal note was not as good as the original. If the executor is to be held liable at all, it must be for not having called in the debt in order to re-invest it, "in bank stock or otherwise," as prescribed by the will. If he had done so, and invested in "bank stock" (the security which seemed to be preferred by the testator, and therefore to be preferred by the executor), it would have been wholly lost to the estate, and in that aspect of what might have been, it was best for the cestuis que trust that that course was not pursued. But if the trustee had any discretion to invest otherwise than in bank stock, why should he not leave the money where it was, in the hands of a man of great wealth and spotless integrity? Where would he have found a better investment, or one more likely to prove good under all circumstances? It remained perfectly good until the conquest of the State by the Northern armies and the destruction of property and values consequent thereupon.

If anything has been lost to the plaintiffs, therefore, it is attributable, not to the omission or failure of the executor, but to the disasters of war. What justice or equity is to be promoted by holding a trustee liable under such circumstances? On the contrary, does it not shock the sense of natural justice to hold one thus liable? If, however, the principles of equity as administered in this State from motives of general policy, require this sacrifice of natural equity, then, however subversive of our sense of right, the executor here must be made the victim.

England, the country from which we derive our laws and system of jurisprudence, has never passed through a crisis like that which destroyed this State and swept away nearly all securities, public and private, and the enlightened judges of that noble commonwealth were therefore never called upon to consider how far such circumstances might modify the rules regarding the liability of trustees, laid down by them for an ordinary and normal condition of affairs.

In this State, however, we have precedents almost identical, arising out of the destruction of values here during the Revolutionary war.

[The learned judge here cites and considers the following cases: Morton v. Smith, 1 Desaus. 123; Webb v. Bellinger, 2 Id. 508; Thompson v. Wagner, 3 Id. 103; Stukes v. Collins, 4 Id. 207; Edmonds v. Crenshaw, Harp. Eq. 224; Doud v. Sanders, Id. 277; Massey v. Cureton, Cheves Eq. 187; Clark v. West, 1 Strobb. Eq. 185; Monk v. Pinckney, 9 Rich. Eq. 293; Martin v. Jefcoat, 10 Id. 118; Taveau v. Ball, 1 McCord Eq. 464; Bryan v. Mulligan, 2 Hill Eq. 364; Glover v. Glover, McMull. Eq. 154; Hext v. Porcher, 1 Strobb. Eq. 171; Boggs v. Adger, 4 Rich. Eq. 410.]

These cases were decided before or during the continuance in office of this executor. If he consulted the law for his guidance, these are the cases to which he was referred by his counsel. He found in them all the same enlightened, reasonable and humane principles which pervaded the old case of Morton v. Smith. He found that he was only required to act with the same care, circumspection and diligence which a prudent man would exercise under the same circumstances, honestly and "for the best." That if he did not violate any of the provisions of the law, or of the will of the testator, and fairly and honestly performed his duty, as he deemed best for the estate, he would not be answerable for consequences which he could not foresee or provide against.

It may be supposed that the view here presented is not the proper one; that the renewing of these notes was, in effect, the same as a collection of the money and its re-investment in the new notes; that this was a violation of duty on the part of the executor, inasmuch as he was directed by the will to invest in "bank stock or otherwise." An investment in bank stock would not, perhaps, have yielded as much profit to the estate as did these notes; for, since the war, the executor has realized on them a considerable sum of money, whereas the bank stock would, at most, certainly have been a total loss.

*But, although bank stocks appear to have been preferred by the testator, the direction was not positive to invest in them. But a discretion was allowed the executor to invest either in bank stock "or otherwise." What, then, was the alternative presented by this word "otherwise"?

In England it would have been held to imply an investment in such securities as the court would approve, to wit, consols. But here we had at that time no rule prescribing what kind of investment should be made by executors or trustees. This is admitted by the late Chief Justice, in Nance v. Nance (1 S. C. 218). "In this State," says he, "while the principles of equity from which the English rule was deduced are recognized and enforced, the rule itself has undergone modification to suit the circumstances of the country. No case is found localizing the English rules on the subject of personal securities in this State." The nearest approach to it is in Spear v. Spear, 9 Rich. Eq. 184, where a guardian, engaged in trade, had employed the funds of his ward in the hazards of mercantile enterprise. The court was "of opinion that the guardian should change, as soon as practicable, the investment of the funds of his ward into public securities, or bonds secured by a lien on real estate, or, at least, bonds of third persons with proper securities."

But this laid down no rule for other cases. Executors were left to their discretion as to the character of their investments, subject only to the rule found in all our cases, that they should use proper diligence, and act in good faith and "for the best." There was good reason for not laying down any arbitrary rules of that sort. Public securities were here very few, and little known to our people. They were a rural population, engaged almost wholly in agriculture, and the great bulk of their wealth was invested in slaves. No investments were so much sought after, and few were so readily available as those based upon property of this character. Our people were often characterized by a very high sense of honor in regard to the obligations of debtors, as may be seen from the evidence in this case. Some of the witnesses state that it would have been regarded as an insult to ask of a debtor the security of a mortgage on lands, *and that such securities were very unusual. The fact is, that the note of a man of large estate in land and slaves, a man of position and high character, and not embarrassed with debt—such a man as Judge O'Neill appears from the testimony to have been—was based upon the security of the lands and negroes which he owned, and there is little doubt that, if this executor had applied to the Court at that time, to sanction his transactions with that distinguished gentleman, he would readily have obtained it.

Be this as it may, there was no arbitrary rule by which he was bound, and hence, when the executor was left to his discretion, to invest in bank stock "or otherwise," he was at liberty to invest in personal securities which were undoubtedly good at the time, and likely to remain so, and did remain so until destroyed by war. But the referee (to whose learning and industry I am much indebted in this case), says that he is unable to find any case where the executor was ex-operated where he failed to take security on a note. On the other hand, we have not been referred to any case in this State, where an executor has been held liable for such a failure, before that of Nance v. Nance. It is not here intended to impugn the authority of the case of Nance v. Nance, but it certainly did lay down a rule which, however right and proper in the present condition of our affairs, had never before been recognized in this State. To hold this executor bound by the law, as pronounced in that case, would be to violate the principles laid down in all the cases which preceded it, as understood and applied by our most eminent judges.

This, however, is not the case of a trustee, who, having funds in his hands which it is his duty to invest, does invest them in securities not recognized as proper. I distinguish the case thus: This executor merely failed to call in these debts, leaving the money out on such securities and in the hands of such persons as testator himself had considered worthy of trust and confidence. In so far as he changed these securities, they were not materially altered; that he exercised a discretion allowed him by the will; that he acted in good faith, with proper prudence, and for the best; that the security remained perfectly *good until affected by the war, which the executor could neither have foreseen nor provided against; and lastly, that any other investment which he might have made, and especially of the sort preferred by the testator, would in all probability have resulted in equal or greater loss to the estate.

The case of the Ramage note is not exactly the same. That was a loan of money of the estate by the executor, in 1860, upon a note without security. He did require security, and Ramage agreed to give it, but the war came on and it was not given. Ramage was in good credit, and solvent at the time, but was ruined by the war. In this case, the negligence imputed to the executor was, that he parted with the money before the surety signed the note. I do not think this sufficient to charge him. It was an unfinished transaction, and the question is whether, if, in the progress of a negotiation of this sort, an executor entrust a man in good circumstances and credit with the funds of the estate, upon an assurance that the contract will be completed, would he be guilty of such negligence as to charge him. If that were so, then he would be liable if he gave up a note or other security to a debtor in good credit, who gave him for it a check on the bank, which was not paid.

In Lord Hardwicke's time, it was held that "where a receiver pays money to a tradesman, and takes bills for the same, in order to remit to London, if he was in credit at the time, though he fail soon after, it shall not affect the receiver." Knight v. Lord Plymouth, 3 Atk. 480; Dick, 140.

There must be some trust somewhere, and the business of life could not get on without it. If Ramage was a man to be trusted in this way (and from the testimony it must be inferred that he was), I do not think the executor was guilty of such negligence as to charge him. Moreover, if the money had not been let out as it was, it would in some form have shared the general wreck of all things brought on by the war; and it is very difficult to say that the estate lost anything by the transaction.

The estate should pay the costs of this litigation. It was scarcely possible that the estate could have been settled without litigation, and the executor is not responsible for the condition *of the business. He was not responsible for the various delays attending the references.

The referee was the judge of the propriety of granting the continuances, and, having granted them without imposing terms at the time, they are not now to be imposed. Furthermore, no question is made of the fidelity and honesty of purpose of the executor. * * *

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the report be confirmed and made the judgment of this court, except as herein modified; that as to those points wherein the exceptions have been sustained, it be referred to the master to correct the said report and to modify the same, so as to make it conform to the principles of this decree.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed, alleging error in discharging the executor from liability for the O'Neill and Ramage notes, and in requiring the costs to be paid out of the estate.

Messrs. James Y. Culbreath and J. S. R. Thomson, for appellants, cited the cases referred to in the Circuit decree and also the following: 1 S. C. 279, 458; 3 Id. 451; 4 Id. 366; 7 Id. 324; 8 Id. 244; 9 Id. 490; 14 Rich. Eq. 300.

Mr. Justice ALDRICH. In Witherspoon and Wife v. Watts et al., Ex'rs, I stated why I have been delayed in filing the opinion assigned me in that case, which also applies to this. Ante p. 396.

This is an appeal from the decree of his Honor, Judge Kershaw, which is so full and convincing, so well sustained by reason and authority, that it is hardly necessary to enlarge on what he has so strongly enforced. The decree collates the authorities on which the judgment of the court is based. The proposition is that a trustee is not liable if he discharges his trust with the same care and prudence that a prudent man will use in the transaction of his own affairs. As was said in Doud v. Sanders, Harp. Eq. 277, executors "are always protected by the court when they have acted conscientiously and for the best." Also in Glover v. Glover, McMull. Eq. 154, "When an executor acts upon a rule established by the habits of society, and in some degree from necessity, it ought not to be imputed to him for negligence." And so, in Hext v. Porcher, 1 Strobb. Eq. 171, "A trustee here is required to act faithfully in the interests committed to him, but the general management is left to his discretion."

This court has not the slightest inclination to interfere with the rule laid down in Nance v. Nance, 1 S. C. 218. But the question now presented is, Does the rule apply to a transaction completed before that case was decided? The testator, Jacob Pope, by his will, made Bud C. Mathews, his brother-in-law and trusted friend, his executor. In the will he gave the executor power to sell a portion of the estate, "and to invest the proceeds of the sale and the cash and choses in action, in bank stock or otherwise." He died in 1849. Among the assets were two notes, one of the late Chief Justice O'Neill and of Pope and O'Neill, the latter being the surety of Pope. Pope died, and O'Neill was appointed his administrator. There was also a note of Ramage. The executors allowed O'Neill to renew his notes, but took no sureties. He also permitted Ramage to renew his note, but required him to give security. Ramage failed to add a surety to his note; the war coming on it seems to have been overlooked in the excitement.

The special objects of the testator's bounty were his widow and his grandson, Rutherford, the sister and nephew of the executor. These plaintiffs only take an interest in the estate of the testator in case of the death of these special objects of his love. The widow, after the payment of some legacies, was to receive the whole estate for life—Rutherford, after her death, when he arrived at the age of twenty-one years. The plaintiffs, in case of the death of Rutherford, without leaving issue then living, to take the estate when they arrived at the age of twenty-five years, which would be in 1865 and 1867.

The referee, Mr. Caldwell, in his report, charged the executor with the notes of O'Neill and Ramage. The case was heard on *exceptions to that report. Judge Kershaw, in a very carefully considered decree, overruled the referee, and decided that the executor is not liable. The question submitted by the appeal is to reverse this decision.

As I have said, the rule in Nance v. Nance, is approved, but is it just and equitable to apply that rule to this case? It has always been the law in this State, "that the trustee is answerable for those losses only which are occasioned by such acts or omissions as a prudent man could not do or omit in his own affairs." So it is said in Nance v. Nance, "The rule as laid down was intended to define the responsibility of trustees while acting within the limits of their discretion, and not to give support to the ideas that the discretion was unlimited as to the character of investments, and their responsibility measured solely by the purity of their motives and the degree of care exercised in the control of the trust fund."

It appears, from the evidence, that the O'Neill and Ramage notes were perfectly good up to the close of the war; that the executor was advised by the judge not to put money in bank stock, but to put it out at interest in notes on individuals. The referee, in his report, says: "The parties executing the notes appear to have been good at the time, and it is not the executor's fault that they are not so now. He has kept the funds separate from his; he has been diligent; he appears to have been perfectly honest; and he thus seems to have acted with that fidelity and sagacity which the great current of decisions in this State pronounce sufficient for a fiduciary's exoneration." He absolves him from all liability for funds and property held by him before and during the war, except the O'Neill and Ramage notes.

At first, I was disposed to think the learned judge was in error; but after carefully considering his decree and reviewing the authorities he has adduced in support of it, I have come to the deliberate conclusion, that it will not only be a hard case to charge this executor with the O'Neill notes, but that it will violate every principle of equity by which this court has heretofore been governed. Undoubtedly, up to the close of the war, the note of Judge O'Neill was a perfectly safe investment; not a shadow of suspicion could be cast on his paper; in addition to his exalted character and large estate, it was not the custom of the community to require mortgages, and it was common to lend money to solvent men without taking a surety. If we add to this the fact that the testator himself had invested in Judge O'Neill's paper, without additional security, how can it be said that this trustee did not act as a prudent man would with his own, especially, too, when he was acting under the counsel and advice of one of the highest legal authorities in the land? That he did not collect the note, is not worthy of consideration. Why collect money, directed to be invested, to lend it out again immediately? Why call in what was then considered as good an investment as the country afforded, to re-invest it in another note, not better, if so good?

The Ramage note is somewhat on a different footing. As regards this investment, the executor did require a surety; but he let Ramage have the money before the surety was given, thus showing that he was entirely satisfied that the note with only Ramage's signature was perfectly good, in which judgment he is fully sustained by all the evidence. The excitement and confusion of the war prevented the completion of the arrangement. It may be said, that he did require a surety showed he was not satisfied with the safety of the investment; but this idea is negatived from the fact that he let Ramage have the money without the surety, and by the abundant testimony as to his solvency and ability to meet his engagements at any time before the disaster of defeat. In addition, the learned judge who heard the cause, was satisfied the executor acted as a prudent man would in the management of his own affairs. I think so, too, for it is more than probable that any surety Ramage may have offered would not have been better than himself, and would, like him, at the close of the war, been broken up and ruined. Would it be equity to say now, because the executor, in the exercise of his discretion, or, if you will, by accident, and occasioned by the confusion and excitement of the war, did not do that which, at first, he intended to do, and which, if he had done, would not have made the fund any more secure, or benefited the estate, shall now be liable for an investment that, under any circumstances, would be worthless? I think not. Besides, this is a question of fact which the Circuit judge, after full hearing and careful deliberation, has decided in favor of the executor; and as no principle of law has been violated, and the will committed the general management of the estate to his discretion, this court will not depart from its practice and overrule the decree on a question of fact, supported by the evidence.

Costs follow the judgment, and there is no error here. The appeal is dismissed.

Mr. Justice McIVER. As I am unable to concur in all of the conclusions reached by his Honor, Judge ALDRICH, to whom was assigned the duty of preparing the leading opinion in this case, I propose to state, as briefly as practicable, my views of the questions involved. [Here follows a statement of the case.]

These notes, so far as the question of the liability of the executor for the amounts thereof is concerned, seem to me to stand upon different grounds. The individual note of Judge O'Neill, given for the amount of his own note to the testator, is manifestly nothing but a renewal of a note in which the testator had seen fit to allow a portion of his funds to remain invested for a considerable length of time before his death, and as the executor was charged with the duty of investing the funds of the estate until the period arrived for turning it over to the parties entitled under the will, I am unable to see any breach of trust on the part of the executor in allowing this amount of the fund to remain in the same way in which the testator had for a long period kept it invested. I agree, therefore, that the executor is not chargeable with the amount of this note.

The other note of Judge O'Neill stands upon a different footing. There is no distinct finding of fact as to what was the intention of the parties in the transaction out of which this note arose; whether the note of Judge O'Neill was taken in satisfaction or payment of the note of George Pope, and the debt of Thomas H. Pope, or whether it was taken as a simple renewal of those debts. The referee, in speaking of the transaction, says that the defendant "allowed Judge O'Neill to take up this note with his own note, for the sum then due," &c., while the Circuit judge, in speaking of the O'Neill notes, uses this language: "These notes were never collected by the executor. They were simply renewed; the debt remained the same. It is true the note of Judge O'Neill alone was taken as a renewal of the joint and several notes of Pope and himself, but there is nothing in the case to show that the renewal note was not as good as the original."

The most natural inference is that the object of the transaction was, as the referee says, "to take up" or extinguish the original note, thereby releasing the estate of George Pope from any further liability thereon, so as to enable his executor to proceed with the settlement of his estate; and when to this is added the undisputed fact that to the amount of that note was added another debt due by another person—the sum of $1,000 due the estate of Jacob Pope by Thomas H. Pope, with which Geo. Pope does not seem to have had any connection—the inference seems irresistible that the object was, not simply to renew the original note, but to extinguish the debt secured thereby, as well as the independent indebtedness of Thomas H. Pope, which, for some reason not disclosed in the testimony, Judge O'Neill was willing to assume, and create a new debt on the part of Judge O'Neill to the executor.

If this be so, then the practical effect of the transaction was that the defendant, as executor of Jacob Pope, collected both of these debts, as well the one due by Thomas H. Pope as the one due by George Pope, and re-invested the amount thereof in the individual note of Judge O'Neill, without any security of any kind. The legal question presented then, is whether an executor charged with the duty of investing the funds of his testator's estate, as this executor was, is at liberty to invest such funds in the note of a private individual without security of any kind. I am not aware of any case in which such an investment of trust funds has ever received the sanction of any court, and, on the contrary, there are at least two cases in which such an investment has been condemned. Spear v. Spear, 3 Rich. Eq. 184; Nance v. Nance, 1 S. C. 209.

In citing the last-mentioned case, I desire to say that while I have no fault to find with the judgment of the Court in that case, I have never been able to approve that portion of the *opinion which undertakes to prescribe the limits within which a trustee is at liberty to exercise his discretion. It does not seem to me that the authorities in this State warrant the use of the following language in the opinion, where, in speaking of the character of the securities in which a trustee may properly invest trust funds, it is said: "Such securities should primarily consist of mortgages of unencumbered real estate, of a value sufficient to guaranty the debt against all contingencies liable to occur or capable of being foreseen. Bonds of individuals should not be taken in lieu of real securities unless unobjectionable investments cannot, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, be procured. When personal securities are taken in lieu of real, it will devolve upon the trustee to make the necessity and propriety of such investments appear, upon an accounting with the cestui que trust."

On the contrary, my understanding of the matter is that we have no rule here prescribing the classes of securities in which trust funds shall be invested, or the preference which is to be given to one class over another; but all that is required is that a trustee shall invest the funds committed to his care upon good and sufficient security. This is the limit of his discretion, and if, within this limit, he manages the funds entrusted to him with the same care and diligence that a prudent and cautious man bestows upon his own affairs, he will not be liable, even though loss may ensue. But where a trustee goes beyond this limit and invests trust funds without any security at all, he cannot escape liability for any loss that may ensue, even though he may be able to show that he has acted in good faith; for, by failing to take security, he substitutes himself as such, and must account accordingly.

It seems to me, therefore, that the executor is chargeable with the larger note of Judge O'Neill, given to take up the note of George Pope, as well as for the $1,000 due by Thomas H. Pope. But, as I understand that the executor has already been charged with such amounts as he has received on this note since the termination of the war, from the assets of Judge O'Neill's estate, the amounts so received should either be stricken from the account already taken, or be allowed as credits to the executor *on the amount of this note, so as to avoid charging the executor twice with the same.

For a similar reason, it seems to me that the executor should be charged with the Ramage note. This was a clear investment of trust funds, without any security whatever, and the fact that the executor intended to take security and failed to do so, only makes the case stronger against him. The excuse suggested for such failure, that the war came on, and, in the excitement and confusion incident to the times, it was overlooked, does not appear to me to be a sufficient reason for such neglect. The note bears date April 6th, 1860, more than eight months before the State seceded, and more than twelve months before hostilities actually commenced. There was, therefore, ample time before these stirring events occurred, for the executor to have arranged this matter, even if he could be excused for letting out trust funds without taking security at the time. It seems to me that the investment of trust funds stands upon a very different footing from accepting payment of a debt in a check upon a bank which proves to be worthless. A trustee might well be excused for doing the latter, as that would be in accordance with the usual course of business, but I do not think it a usual or proper practice for a lender to advance the money to a borrower before the required security has been given.

The question of costs is a matter peculiarly within the discretion of the Circuit Court, and in my opinion the Circuit judge, under all the circumstances of this case, wisely and properly exercised his discretion in requiring the costs to be paid out of the estate.

I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be modified in accordance with the views herein announced, and that the case should be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out these views.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. There being no testimony in this case showing either bad faith or negligence on the part of the trustee, on the contrary it appearing that the loss complained of occurred from causes which could not have been foreseen by *him, I think under the circumstances he should be held harmless, especially as under the terms of the will he was invested with large discretion in the management of the estate entrusted to his care. I do not agree, however, with the remarks of Judge ALDRICH, in reference to the case of Nance v. Nance. On this subject I concur with Judge MEIVER in the dissenting opinion, but this does not affect the result. I therefore concur in the general results herein.†

Judgment affirmed.

STATE, ex rel. ANDERSON, v. SIMS.

[1. Mandamus ⚡74.]

Query. Can the board of State canvassers be required by mandamus to declare an election?

No clerk of court could be lawfully elected on November 7th, 1882, as there was no authority for such an election on that day. The statute (Gen. Stat. 1882, § 160,) authorized an election for clerk of court only at every alternate general election, reckoning from the year 1880; and if the clerk be a State officer, as has been held, then the constitution required the election to be had at every alternate general election, beginning with the year 1868. Const., Art. XIV., § 10.†

This was an original application to this court made in behalf of Julius H. Anderson, the relator, for a writ of mandamus to compel R. M. Sims, the secretary of State, and other members of the board of State canvassers, to declare the relator elected to the office of clerk of court for Horry county, in accordance with the returns in their possession made to them by the board of county canvassers for that county.

*December 2d, 1882. The following order was passed:

PER CURIAM. On hearing the petition and return in the case above stated, it is ordered that the petition be dismissed for reasons which will be stated in an opinion hereafter to be filed.

January 27th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This is an application to this court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, for a mandamus to compel the board of State canvassers "to ascertain from the managers' returns and statements forwarded to them by the board of county canvassers of Horry county, that Julius H. Anderson, at the general election held on the said seventh day of November instant, received the highest number of votes for the office of clerk of the court, in said county, and to declare the same and certify such declaration, and none other, to the secretary of State." The board of State canvassers made return, saying "that they declined to canvass any vote for clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Horry county, at the general election for 1882, in consequence of section 160, of the Revised Statutes of this State. [Edit. 1882.] That section reads as follows: "There shall be a general election for the election of the following county officers, to wit: judge of probate, county commissioners and school commissioner, held in each county at every general election for members of the house of representatives; and for the election of sheriff, coroner and clerk of the Court of Common Pleas, at every alternate general election, reckoning from the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty," so that the sole question made by the pleadings is, whether there was any legal authority for holding an election for clerk at the general election held on the seventh day of November, 1882.

Another question was suggested in the argument, and that is, whether the writ of mandamus, as prayed for, can be issued to the board of State canvassers. This depends upon the result of an inquiry, whether the duty sought to be enforced is such a ministerial duty as that its performance can be enforced by a writ of mandamus, or whether it is judicial. This, however, is a very important question, and inasmuch as it was not raised by the pleadings, and was not fully argued at the bar, we prefer not to enter upon its consideration at this time. Waiving this question, therefore, for the present, and assuming, for the purposes of this case, that the performance of the duty demanded of the board may be enforced by mandamus, we will proceed to inquire whether the relator has stated such a case as would entitle him to the writ of mandamus as prayed for.

If there was no law providing for the holding of an election for the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Horry county on the day of the general election in 1882, then clearly there was no valid election for that office, and there was no obligation resting upon the board of State canvassers to declare the result of an election held without legal authority; and if they had done so their action would have been unauthorized and a mere nullity, and, of course, a writ of mandamus would not be issued to compel the performance of an unauthorized and illegal act. In the absence of any provision in the constitution designating the time for holding the election for clerk, the General Assembly could fix the time; and this they have undertaken to do by section 160 of the General Statutes of 1882 above quoted, to wit: "At every alternate general election, reckoning from the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty."

This necessarily fixes the day of the general election in 1884, and not the day for the general election in 1882, as the time for holding the election for clerk. In fact there is no act of the General Assembly, so far as we are informed, and none such has been cited to us, designating the day of the general election in 1882, as the day for holding an election for clerk in the county of Horry, and hence, in the absence of such an act, there was no more authority for holding an election for that office on the 7th day of November, 1882, than there would have been for holding an election on any other day that might have been suggested.

But, in addition to this, it appears to us that the constitution does fix a day for holding all such elections. Article II., section 11, as amended, is in the following language: "The first election for senators and representatives, under the provisions of this constitution, shall be held on the 14th, 15th and 16th days of April, of the present year [1868], and the second election *shall be held on the third Wednesday in October, 1870; and forever thereafter on the first Tuesday following the first Monday in November, every second year, in such manner and in such place as the legislature may provide." And in article XIV., section 10, it is provided that: "The election for all State officers shall take place at the same time as is provided for that of members of the General Assembly, and the election for those officers whose terms of service are for four years, shall be held at the time of each alternate general election." If, therefore, the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas is a State officer, as has been held by this court in the case of Williman v. Ostendorf, MS. decision filed February 12th, 1877, then it follows that the election for clerk is required by the constitution to be held at each alternate general election, for he is one of the officers whose term of service is four years, (Const. Art. IV, § 27.) and inasmuch as the first general election under the present constitution was held in 1868, all subsequent elections for clerk were required to be held at each alternate general election, reckoning from 1868, to wit: at the general elections in 1872, 1876 and 1880, and, consequently, the next election for clerk cannot be held until the day fixed for the general election in 1884. Thus it appears that section 160 of the General Statutes of 1882, prescribing the day of the general election in 1884, as the time for holding the election for clerk, is not only not in conflict with constitution, as was argued in this case, but is in direct conformity thereto.

We are therefore of opinion that there was no legal authority for holding an election for clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Horry county on the seventh day of November, 1882, and hence that the board of State canvassers could not have been required to declare the result of an election held without such authority. The judgment of this court, in conformity with these views dismissing the petition, has heretofore been rendered.

COUNCIL OF CHESTER.

[1. Statutes ⇨120.]

An act entitled, "An act to provide a local option law for the incorporated cities, towns and villages of this State" (17 Stat. 893), declared in its fourth section, that the act should not apply to any city, town or village in which the sale of liquors is now, or shall hereafter be, prohibited by legislative enactment. Held, that the act related to but one subject—local option—which was expressed in its title.

An act to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the town of Chester (17 Stat. 1059), does not violate article I., section 12, of the constitution, which declares that "no person shall be subjected in law to any other restraints or disqualifications, in regard to any personal rights, than such as are laid upon others under like circumstances."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 167, 649; Dec. Dig. ⇨87, 208.]

Original application for writ of mandamus.

This was a petition entitled the State of South Carolina, ex relatione John K. Coleman and others, against the town council of Chester. The opinion states the case.

Mr. S. P. Hamilton, for relators.

The clauses of the constitution violated are article II., section 20, and article I., section 12. An act violating article II., section 20, is unconstitutional. 13 Mich. 482; 12 Geo. 36. The title of the local option law is general and sweeping, and in it can be found no intimation that it was intended to prohibit local option in certain cases. This section is also violated by the act to prohibit the sale of liquor in Chester, the title of which makes no allusion whatever to the local option law. But there is a broader and more important provision violated, article I, section 12. This section prohibits discrimination. Under its charter, the citizens of Chester have a right to vote—under the local option law they have a right to vote—but the fourth section of the local option law, and the act to prohibit the sale of liquors in Chester, take away the right accorded in a general *law, to citizens of other towns, and is thus a disqualification of electors of Chester. Cool. Cons. Lim. 391. A case most apposite to ours is Kelly v. The State, 6 Ohio St. 269. The local option law must not be confounded with acts controlling municipal corporations in the matter of police regulations, for it divests municipalities of the power to determine the question of license or no license, and gives it to the people. Even the exercise of police power by the legislature may be unconstitutional.

Messrs. E. C. McLure, A. G. Brice, contra.

December 7th, 1882. The following order was passed:

PER CURIAM. On hearing the petition and return, with the agreement of counsel, it is ordered that the petition be dismissed for reasons which will be stated in an opinion hereafter to be filed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This was an application for the writ of mandamus, heard by this court under and by virtue of its original jurisdiction in such cases. The character of the case and the questions involved will appear from the statement which follows.

An act of the General Assembly of this State, approved February 9th, 1882, and known as the local option law, provided that upon the petition of one-third of the number of citizens who voted at the next preceding municipal election of any incorporated city, town or village in this State, the council of such city, town or village was authorized and required to submit the question of license or no license, to the qualified electors of such city, town or village, at a special election to be holden, &c. By the fourth section of this act it was further provided, that it should not apply to any city, town or village in which the sale of ardent spirits is now, or shall hereafter be prohibited by legislative enactment. On the same day that this act was approved, another act, known as "An act to prevent the *sale of spirituous liquors in the town of Chester, in Chester county," was also approved.

On November 11th, certain citizens of the town of Chester, equal and exceeding in number the one-third of the votes cast in the preceding municipal election in said town, petitioned the town council of Chester to hold a special election under the local option law, at which the question of license or no license should be submitted to the qualified electors as provided for in said act. This petition was refused on the ground that the act to prevent the sale of spirituous liquors in the town of Chester being of force, the council was prohibited from entertaining the petition by virtue of the fourth section of the local option law itself. Thereupon the petitioners instituted this proceeding for mandamus to require the town council to grant their prayer.

The questions involved do not demand of this court any extended discussion of the principles upon which the writ of mandamus depends. It may be admitted, so far as this case is concerned, that if the positions taken by the petitioners are sound, the writ should be ordered. We will therefore confine our examination to these positions.

The petitioners claim that the fourth section of the local option law, as well as the act to prevent the sale of spirituous liquors in the town of Chester, are unconstitutional, and consequently that the local option law stands unaffected thereby, which law thus unaffected being applicable to all the towns, cities and villages in the State, entitles the petitioners to the relief which they seek, and this is the question in the case.

It is urged that the fourth section of the local option law is unconstitutional because in conflict with section 20 of article II., of the constitution, which provides that "every act or resolution having the force of law, shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." This section no doubt contains a wise provision, and if properly observed would tend greatly to prevent confusion and doubt as to the exact meaning and intent of legislative enactments, and to this end it should be enforced by the courts in all proper cases, due care being exercised lest a too strict construction might defeat its very object and purpose by clogging legislation and loading down our *statute books, with numberless separate acts wholly unnecessary to the end designed. By such a construction few matters could become the subject of legislation in a single act. Every qualification and condition imposed would have to be embraced in a separate act, which would make it difficult and tedious to ascertain the statute law in any matter, as all the acts scattered through the statutes would have to be examined before any conclusion could be reached.

Take, for example, the general appropriation act. Every section, in fact almost every line in a strict sense, refers to a different subject as different appropriations and for different purposes are certainly made, and if each of these had to be in a separate act it would entail infinite confusion in a matter of the highest importance to the State. It can not be that the framers of the constitution ever intended that such a construction should be placed upon this section. On the contrary, while enforcing it when necessary, it should be at least so construed as to prevent the results indicated above.

Now can it be said that the fourth section of the local option law under consideration is in violation of section 20, article II., of the constitution, when construed under the light of the principle announced above? The title of the local option law is as follows: "An act to provide a local option law for the incorporated cities, towns and villages of this State." The subject expressed in this title is "local option." Does the fourth section relate to a different subject? That section simply provides that the act of which it is a section "shall not apply to any city, town or village in which the sale of ardent spirits is now or shall hereafter be prohibited by legislative enactment." This is the whole of the fourth section. It is apparent that it does not relate to a different subject from that expressed in the title of the act; on the contrary, it has direct reference to that subject and to no other, to wit, local option.

It is true, under the operation of the third section, the privilege of local option may be allowed to some towns, cities and villages, which is denied to others under the fourth section, yet this is not the incorporation of a new subject into the act different from that expressed in the title, but it is simply limiting and *qualifying that subject in its application to the towns, cities and villages of the State in the nature of a proviso, an exception to the act. If the relators' construction be the correct one, no exceptions could be made in the application of acts by provisos. A separate act would always be necessary.

Next as to the act to prevent the sale of spirituous liquors in the town of Chester. The relators contend that this act violates section 12, article I., of the constitution. That section is as follows: "No person shall be disqualified as a witness or be prevented from acquiring, holding and transmitting property or be hindered from acquiring education, or be liable to any other punishment for any offense or be subjected in law to any other restraints or disqualifications in regard to any personal rights than such as are laid upon others under like circumstances."

It is urged that this section was intended to prevent discrimination in legislation as to personal rights. There can be no doubt but that such was its intention, and no one can fail to appreciate the importance and the wisdom of such a restriction upon legislative power. It underlies our constitution and is a fundamental principle in republican governments, and should not be invaded.

But we do not see its application to this case. We do not see that any citizen of Chester is deprived of any right which any other citizen of that town is allowed. It is true that the provisions of the charter of Chester may be different from those which appear in some of the other towns in the State, but it certainly can not be urged seriously that the section of the constitution referred to, is violated by such difference. And yet, upon the relators' construction, such would be the result. Not only so, but when that construction is pressed to its legitimate result it would necessitate exact uniformity in all charters, both public and private. No distinction could be made. The condition and circumstances requiring in one place a different municipal government, from another demanding the exercise of different powers and duties, would have to be disregarded, and a dead sea of exact uniformity established. This could not have been the purpose of this section.

*The judgment of this court has already been pronounced dismissing the petition of the relators; and it is ordered that this opinion be filed as containing the principles upon which said judgment is based.

CHALMERS v. GLENN.

A cause of action exists when the legal rights of one party have been invaded by another, and unless facts to show the existence and the invasion of such rights are stated in the complaint, it will be held bad on demurrer.

A complaint which stated that money belonging to an estate had by order of court been lent to defendant under his bond to account "upon a final settlement of the estate" for the sum received, but which did not allege that any settlement had yet been had or attempted, or that defendant had failed to account, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Before Pressley, J., Newberry, February, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

[For subsequent opinion, see Kinard v. Glenn, 29 S. C. 590, 8 S. E. 203.]

Mr. W. H. Lyles, for appellant.

Messrs. Jones & Jones, George S. Mower, contra.

February 15th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In 1866 a bill was filed in the Court of Equity for the partition of the real estate of G. W. Glenn, late of Newberry county, to which his heirs-at-law were parties, plaintiffs and defendants. A decree was made therein, directing a sale of certain portions of said real estate *partly for cash and partly on a credit, and the proceeds ordered to be distributed according to the rights of the parties. In pursuance of this decree, Silas Johnstone, Esq., the then commissioner in equity for said county, sold the lands embraced in the order, and distributed the cash proceeds. The Court of Equity having been abolished, the case was transferred to the Court of Common Pleas under the act for that purpose, and Jesse C. Smith the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas, from time to time collected a part of the credit portion of the sales.

Afterwards to wit: in January, 1875, an order was made in the cause in the Court of Common Pleas to "loan" out to Dr. George W. Glenn, a son of the deceased and one of his heirs-at-law, such portion of the credit sales as Smith had collected, or that might be paid to him upon Glenn securing the payment either by personal security, or collaterals, or both, upon final settlement of the estate of the deceased. Pursuant to this order Smith, the clerk, loaned to George W. Glenn the funds in his hands amounting to $1,088.31, securing the same by the bond of Glenn, with Mattie S. Glenn and Thomas W. Weir as his sureties, the condition of the bond being "that Glenn should well and truly account for the sum of one thousand and eighty-eight dollars and thirty one cents, upon a final settlement of the estate of George W. Glenn deceased."

The bond was joint and several and made payable to Jesse C. Smith, clerk of said court, his successors in office and assigns in the penal sum of $2,200. The term of office of Smith expired, and E. P. Chalmers, the plaintiff, is the present clerk, or was when this action began. The prayer of the complaint is, first, to have the bond reformed so as to provide for the payment of interest to be paid annually on the amount lent to Glenn, alleging that this stipulation was left out by mistake in drawing the bond; second, for judgment for said sum of $1,088.31 with interest thereon, computed with annual rests, and, third, for such other and further relief as to the court may seem just, with costs.

The defendants demurred to the complaint (which stated only the above facts), upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Upon the hearing Judge Pressley sustained the de-murrer, with leave to the plaintiff to *amend his complaint by adding thereto such allegations as he might be advised, on payment of costs of the demurrer. From this order the plaintiff has appealed, alleging error in that the judge sustained the demurrer.

The question for us to consider is, does the complaint allege a cause of action? This involves the preliminary questions, what is a cause of action? and, to what extent shall it appear in the complaint so as to be sufficiently stated? There is but one form of action under the code, and at law, this action must be for one of three purposes, to wit: the recovery of money, the recovery of real estate, or the recovery of personal property. The cause of action must be that which gives the plaintiff the right as against the defendant to institute the action for the recovery which he seeks, and it depends upon the nature of that recovery. If he seeks money from the defendant, it must be on account of the fact that defendant is under legal obligation to pay him money, and has neglected or refused to do so, his cause of action in such case would be his right to the money and the neglect or refusal of the defendant to pay it. So, if he seeks the recovery of real or personal property, his cause of action would consist of his right to it and the withholding it by defendant. Thus, generally, it may be said that a cause of action exists where the legal rights of one party have been invaded by another.

Now as to the statement in the complaint. It is a general rule, in fact, invariable, that to entitle a plaintiff to recover, he must prove all the facts constituting his case or cause of action; he must prove the facts constituting his right, and its invasion by the defendant. It is another general rule, that the plaintiff can offer no testimony except to such facts as he has alleged in his complaint. It follows, therefore, that he must allege in his complaint all the facts showing his right, and also those showing its invasion by the defendant, and the facts thus alleged must in law upon their face, on the one side entitle him to the right which he claims, and on the other amount to an invasion by the defendant. If his complaint is defective in either of these particulars, he will not only be denied the privilege of supplementing the facts by testimony, but his complaint will fail on *demurrer, for the want of stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

In this action the plaintiff seeks to recover money, and he founds his right thereto upon the bond already mentioned. Has he stated facts showing his right to the bond, that the defendants are under obligation to pay him money on account of it, and that they neglect and refuse to do so? Waiving the question as to his right to the bond, does the statement of facts show the two latter requirements? The condition of the bond is that George W. Glenn shall account on final settlement of the estate of George W. Glenn, deceased, for the sum of $1,088.31. No rights accrue to the plaintiff under the bond, therefore until there is failure on the part of Glenn thus to account on the final settlement mentioned, and no obligation or liability rests upon the defendants until said failure, and there can be no invasion of the right of the plaintiff by the defendants until that right accrues, and then the obligation attaches. All these are suspended until, and depend upon, the failure of Glenn to account according to the terms of the bond.

The failure to account, then, is not only a necessary fact in the plaintiff's cause of action, but a most essential one. It is the central fact in the case, and without which the plaintiff's cause of action vanishes, whatever else may be found in the complaint. Upon an examination of the complaint, it will be found that this essential fact is not stated. There is no allegation that the estate of George W. Glenn has been settled or attempted to be settled. There is no allegation that this has resulted from the acts of Glenn, the borrower, or his sureties.† The matters in the estate, so far as appear in the brief, stand precisely as they stood when the bond was given. At that time a subsequent settlement was thought necessary, and contemplated, as appears in the order of the court authorizing the clerk to lend the money in his hands to Dr. Glenn. This order directed that it should *be accounted for on final settlement. It was borrowed on those terms, and cannot be demanded sooner.

It is not for this court to speculate as to the reasons which influenced the Court of Common Pleas to grant the order to lend the money. It may have been because the estate was not ready for a settlement, and it was thought best that one of the parties in interest should have the use of it, rather than it should lie idle in the clerk's office; or it may have been that it was known or supposed that Dr. Glenn, as an heir, would ultimately be entitled to it, or the most of it, and it was better that he should have it at once, to be accounted for on final settlement. But this makes no difference. He obtained it under an order of the court, and he can only be made answerable upon the terms by which he obtained it, and which appear in his bond. The failure of the plaintiff to allege this material fact upon which his right, as well as the obligation of the defendants depended, is fatal.

As to the prayer to have the bond reformed. The bond seems to have been given in accordance with the terms of the order of the court, authorizing Glenn to get the money. The clerk would have had no right to impose other terms than those imposed by the court. These facts appear in the complaint, and are sufficient to show that the plaintiff has no cause of action on that ground.

† The only allegation in the complaint upon the subject is contained in the ninth paragraph, and is as follows: "That the persons entitled to the distribution of said fund as ascertained by the decree and orders of said Court of Equity hereinbefore alleged are now demanding the same of this plaintiff, and it is necessary to collect said fund in order that it may be distributed."—REPORTER.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the Circuit Court be affirmed, with the right to the defendants to answer should the plaintiff avail himself of the privilege to amend, which Judge Pressley's order, sustaining the demurrer, allowed him.

Before Cothran, J., York, March, 1882.

Action by John Nichols against B. F. Briggs. The opinion states the case.

The sole question discussed before me by the counsel engaged in the cause, and with much elaboration, may be thus stated: Can an action for foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate be maintained, where the note which it is given to secure has been barred by the statute of limitations? It cannot be questioned, since the decision of the court in Arnold v. McKellar, 9 S. C. 335, that the amendment to section 113 of the code (see Lynch's Code, p. 53), as of the 25th of November, 1873 (see A. A. of that year), notwithstanding the supposed irregularity of its ratification and the subsequent re-enactment of it in the A. A. of 1875, is valid and effectual; and that sealed notes in South Carolina are subject to the statutory limitation of six years, as therein provided.

It is also true, as matter of law, that this action having been commenced in January of the present year, the statutory bar is complete, unless there be some existing cause to prevent its operation. No proof to this effect was offered upon the trial, and no suggestion of the kind was made in argument by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, who insisted, with the support of many authorities, that he was entitled to a decree of foreclosure of his mortgage, non obstante. The defendant's counsel, with equal zeal, as stoutly denied the plaintiff's right in this regard. The question thus presented is one of some difficulty of determination, owing to the great conflict of foreign authorities upon the subject, (to which, I am forced to express my regret, that we are becoming so much addicted.), as also on account of *the apparent absence of any direct adjudication of the matter by our own courts.

The plaintiff's counsel, with great propriety, insists that the statute of limitations does not discharge or extinguish the debt, but only takes away the remedy for enforcing the payment of it. Since the case of Sturges v. Crowninshield, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States as far back as 1819, and reported in 4 Wheat. 122 [4 L. Ed. 529], and followed by numerous decisions of our own court, this doctrine may be accepted without question. He further insists, and apparently with equal confidence, that though the debt be barred, the lien of the mortgage should be enforced; and to support this proposition, cites chapters 26 and 27 of 2 Jones

Mort., and the numerous authorities there to be found.

Upon the other hand, the learned counsel for the defendant contends: That in South Carolina the mortgage is but an incident of the debt, deriving its vitality and perpetuity only from the debt itself, and that it cannot, in the very nature of things, survive the substance of which it is but the mere shadow; that the act of 1791, so explicit in this regard, was a departure from the English doctrine and has wrought a fundamental change in the nature and character of mortgages, and of the means of enforcing them; that our own decisions have steadily maintained this divergence; citing numerous authorities, among others, Simons v. Bryce, 10 S. C. 367; Warren v. Raymond, 12 S. C. 21; Reeder v. Dargan, 15 S. C. 175.

And not with unbecoming confidence does he rely upon the opinion of Dargan, Ch., in Gibbes v. Holmes, 10 Rich. Eq., 487, in which that learned judge says: "If a mortgage be given to secure a simple contract debt, when the debt is barred, the mortgage is discharged. Anything that satisfies the debt discharges the mortgage." Unfortunately for the defendant, however, this is but obiter dictum, as the question to which this would otherwise have been decisive was not before the court. Nevertheless, as the positively expressed opinion of a very great judge in his own times—and there were giants in those days—it is entitled to great consideration. The added expression above "Anything that satisfies the debt," &c., seems to me, however, *greatly to weaken the force of the first proposition; for whatever contention there might be as to that, there never could have been a doubt as to the second, which clearly relates to satisfaction of the debt—not to any suspension or abridgment of the remedy. Satisfaction is the whole object, aim and end of the law in all things. I have ventured to say this much in the way of respectful criticism, for the reason that the expression is very positive; it was much relied on by the defendant's counsel, and if other reason be needed, it may be found in what Judge Wardlaw said under like circumstances in Mitchell v. Bogan (I believe) in venturing to differ with Judge Nott.

It might not be matter of unprofitable speculation to inquire how far this expression may have been evoked by the peculiar remedy for foreclosure, furnished by the act of 1791, which, it will be remembered, was a proceeding at law, and was bottomed upon "judgment being obtained in the Court of Common Pleas." But I forbear. It surely could never have been successfully contended in South Carolina that the right of foreclosure in equity, which became, long before the abolition of the Court of Equity, as such, the universal mode of proceeding, was absolutely dependent upon the character or quality of the bond or debt intended to be secured.

In the case of Gillett v. Powell, Speers Eq. 143, property was sold and bonds and mortgages taken for the purchase-money. Foreclosure of one of these was sought, and it was discovered that the bond had been altered in a material part and thereby made void. There was no reference in the mortgage to the bond as produced in its mutilated condition. Chancellor Harper, in delivering the circuit decree, which was affirmed on this point by the whole court, said: "But I am of opinion that the alteration of the bond does not affect the mortgage, and that it must be taken as evidence of the debt. If the mortgage alone had been taken, there can be no doubt but that it would have constituted a specialty debt. At law, it is regarded as a conveyance of the property; in equity, as evidence of the debt intended to be secured by it. * * * The defendant is estopped by his deed to deny the existence of the bond." See upon this point, in part, McCaughrin & Co. v. Williams, 15 S. C. 505.

*Perhaps what has been already said is sufficient to show the bent or inclination of my mind; but in the view which I shall now take of this case, it is not necessary or proper even that I should make a decision of this vexed and interesting question. It is somewhere related of King James I. of England, who largely affected learning and the society of learned men, that upon one occasion he summoned to his presence the savans of his time and propounded to them the following inquiry: "Why is it that a fish placed in a bowl of water filled to the brim will not displace a particle of the contents of the vessel?" Many learned and scientific and highly satisfactory replies were given by the several philosophers interrogated in turn, until the last of the wise men cautiously inquired, before undertaking to account for the alleged phenomenon, if, indeed, the fact were so? Actual experiment showed that it was altogether otherwise. Can it be so in this case? Let us see:

On June 5th, 1874, the defendant made and delivered his sealed note to the plaintiff, secured by the mortgage in question, for the sum of $500, payable twelve months after date. On June 5th, 1875, the note became due, and the statute began to run. On December 24th, 1880, the legislature (17 Stat. 415) amended section 113 of the code, by extending the time for bringing actions "upon bonds or other contracts in writing, secured by mortgage of real property," to twenty years. The statute of limitations had operated upon the sealed note before the court for about five and a half years, and it had still about six months to run before the bar should be complete. What effect did the extension have upon "the contract in writing" secured by the mortgage here? The answer will be found in the case of Wardlaw v. Buzzard, 15 Rich. 160 [94 Am. Dec. 148], and is in these words:

"* * * Nor was it denied that the legislature might extend the statute of limitations before the bar was complete without impairing the obligation of the contract. In fact, its extension gives additional vitality to the contract, and furnishes no ground of complaint to the debtor or creditor. The debtor, if he wishes to pay can do so; and if the creditor desires to sue, *there is nothing in the extension to prevent him." This seems to me to be the conclusion of the whole matter.

Wherefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that it be referred to the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for the county of York, to inquire into and compute the amount due upon the demand herein sued upon; and that upon such ascertainment, that the plaintiff have judgment of foreclosure of the premises mortgaged and described in the complaint, in the usual form, for his debt, interest and costs; and that the plaintiff herein have leave to move for any further order that may be necessary to effectuate the judgment herein rendered.

Messrs. Hart & Hart, for appellant.

February 15th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage upon a tract of land, executed by the defendant on June 4th, 1874, "for the better securing the payment" of his note under seal for $500, bearing date the same day, and payable one year thereafter (June 4th, 1875), with interest from date. The action was commenced January 14th, 1882, and the defense was the statute of limitations. It was insisted that from the time the note fell due, June 4th, 1875, until the action was brought, January 14th, 1882, more than six years had expired, and recovery at law on the note being barred by the statute of limitations, the defendant was not liable to the plaintiff in any way whatever, either on the note or mortgage; adding to the third paragraph of his answer a statement that he invoked the plea of the statute "in order to reimburse himself for one-half of the Gazaway Wilson lands, of which he was fraudulently deprived by the plaintiff herein, by reason of the plaintiff taking advantage of the fact that the agreement that the plaintiff should purchase the said lands for the joint use of himself and defendant was not in writing."

The cause came on to be heard before Judge

swer as undertook to assign his motive for invoking the plea, viz.: all after the words "due and owing by defendant to plaintiff." The judge then considering the case, disallowed the plea of the statute of limitations, and gave the plaintiff a decree of foreclosure for the amount of the debt, on the ground that under the amendment of the code in 1880, enlarging the period of limitations as to "notes secured by mortgage of real property," the note in question was not barred by the statute of limitations.

From this judgment the defendant appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: "1. His Honor erred in striking from the answer of defendant the unnumbered section following section three, it not being 'matter of right' to plaintiff that same should have been stricken out. 2. His Honor erred in not holding that this action, for foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate, cannot be maintained, the action not having been brought within six years, the time limited for its commencement after the debt matured, as evidenced by the note and by it alone. 3. His Honor erred in holding that the act of December 24th, 1880, applied to the cause of action herein. 4. His Honor erred in not adjudging that the complaint be dismissed. 5. The decree is in other respects misleading and contrary to law."

As to the first exception, in reference to the order striking out a portion of the answer as irrelevant, it is only necessary to say that matter is irrelevant when it has no substantial relation to the controversy between the parties to the action, and that the code (section 183) provides that "If irrelevant and redundant matter be inserted in a pleading, it may be stricken out on motion of any person aggrieved thereby." "An answer, otherwise good, may contain a mass of unnecessary or redundant matter, which seems only to encumber the proceedings and conceal or obscure the real issues. In such cases the plaintiff should move for an order striking out such matter as 'irrelevant.'" 2 Wait Pr. 437.

The other exceptions will be considered together. The old statute of limitations, made of force in this State, did not apply to bonds or other instruments under seal, but in 1870 the Code of Civil Procedure was adopted, which, in title 2, under the head of "time of commencing civil actions," provided as follows:

"Sec. 96. The provisions of this title shall not extend to actions already commenced, or to cases where the right of action has already accrued, but the statutes now of force shall be applicable to such cases."

"Sec. 113, Subd. 2. Within twenty years, an action upon a sealed instrument." In 1873, this provision was amended by adding the words "other than notes or personal bonds for the payment of money only, whereof the period of limitations shall be as prescribed in the following section" (that is to say, six years), 15 Stat. 496. In 1880, the provision was again amended by changing the phraseology, as follows: "An action upon a bond or other contract in writing, secured by a mortgage of real property," so that said subdivision, with the amendments thereto, shall read as follows: "Subdivision 2. An action upon a bond or other contract in writing, secured by a mortgage of real property, an action upon a sealed instrument other than a sealed note and personal bond for the payment of money only, whereof the period of limitations shall be the same as prescribed in the following section" (six years), 17 Stat. 415; Gen. Stat. 1882, Code § 111.

According to these provisions of the law, was the sealed note secured by a mortgage of real property in this case, barred by the statute of limitations, on January 14th, 1882, when these proceedings were instituted? The note fell due June 5th, 1875, while the amendment of 1873 was the law, making the limitation upon all sealed notes for the payment of money only six years; and as more than that time had elapsed before January, 1882, when the action was commenced, the note was barred by the statute, unless there was some good reason to the contrary. But it is urged that before the bar of the statute was complete, the legislature, on December 24th, 1880, passed the second amendment above referred to, which restored the twenty years as originally provided by the code, as to "an action upon a bond or other contract in writing, secured by a mortgage of real property," and that, as the note in this case was so secured, the said *second amendment included it and had the effect of extending the statute of limitations as to the note before us from six to twenty years. To this was opposed the view that, although the last amendment did change the statute as to notes secured by mortgage of real property, it was only prospective in its operation, and did not extend the period of the statute as to any contract made before the passage of the amendment.

Did the amendment include contracts in existence at the time it was passed, or should it be construed as applying only to contracts thereafter to be made? There is no doubt that the statute of limitations relates to the remedy and not to the contract itself, and that the legislature had the power, before the bar was complete, as to contracts then in existence, to extend the time necessary to complete the bar, without impairing the obligation of such contracts. The question here, however, is not whether the law-makers had such power, but whether in this case they exercised it. The general rule certainly is that "statutes are not to be construed retrospectively, or so as to have a retrospective effect, unless it shall clearly appear that it was so intended by the legislature." Ex parte Graham, 13 Rich. 277. It may be true, as stated, that statutes of limitations relate only to the remedy, and are enforced according to the lex fori, that is to say, according to the law of the State where the party is sued; but we do not understand that these reasons extended the rule so far as to make applicable only the law of force at the time the party is sued.

It seems that these statutes, affecting the remedy only, constitute no exception to the general rule, that laws and amendments thereof of the same State operate only upon matters which arise after their passage, unless they otherwise expressly declare. "In this country, statutes of limitations are, as a general rule, applied only to a right of action which is to commence in futuro, and are not retrospective in their operation. And it is a well-settled principle of law, that the courts are to give such statutes a prospective operation, where there is nothing indicating a different intention on the part of the legislature which enacted the statute." 7 Wait Ac. & Def. 228.

*The law passed in this State, in 1861, "To extend relief to debtors, and to prevent the sacrifice of property at public sales," commonly called the "stay law," and which received construction in the case of Wardlaw v. Buzzard, 15 Rich. 158 [94 Am. Dec. 148], is no exception to the rule, but rather confirms it. That act shows upon its face that it was the intention, indeed the very purpose of the legislature, that it should apply to contracts in existence at the time of its passage. The fifth section was in these words: "That the operation of the statute of limitations be and the same is hereby suspended during the period in which this act is of force;" and the Court of Errors, in their judgment, said: "There is no distinction made as to the time when the causes of action arose, and they unquestionably meant and intended to embrace all money demands. If not intended to apply to causes of action then existing, the fifth section was unnecessary, and we cannot suppose the legislature would be guilty of the folly of passing an act suspending the operation of the statute of limitations, if intended only to apply to causes arising thereafter, when the act itself was limited to the duration of one year." In the amendment under consideration no such intention is manifest. From its terms we are unable to say that it was clearly intended to operate retrospectively and include contracts in existence at its passage.

Besides, from the form and manner in which the amendment was inserted into the code, certain words having been added to the subdivision 2 of the section as it stood, we think the added words were intended to take their place in the context, remaining as a part of the section, and, of course, controlled by the declaration still unrepealed and standing at the head of the whole title—"The provisions of this title shall not extend to actions already commenced or to cases where the right of action has already accrued." "When the amendment of a statute is made by declaring it shall be amended so as to read in a given way, the amendment has no retroactive force; the new provision is to be understood as taking effect at the time the amended act would otherwise become the law." Potter's Dwar. 165; Cooley Const. Lim. 461. As the law now stands, a note secured by a mortgage of real property executed since the amendment of *1880, would not be barred in less than twenty years, but as the note in this case had been executed and was running to maturity when it was passed, we think that it must fall under and be controlled by the former amendment of 1873, and, according to its terms, being a sealed "note for the payment of money only," was barred by the statute of limitations, in January, 1882, when the action was commenced.

But the most difficult question still remains. Assuming that recovery on the note considered by itself could not be had on account of the statute of limitations, must the mortgage of real property, given to secure the same debt, also be considered as barred? The mortgage, after reciting the execution of a sealed note for $500, proceeds to declare that, "in consideration of the said debt and sum of money aforesaid, and for the better securing the payment thereof to the said John Nichols," &c. A mortgage on land is an instrument of such character as exempts it from the bar of the statute in less than twenty years, so that if it is barred in this case, it must be upon some ground growing out of its relation to the note, which imposes upon it a like fate, that the remedy, which the law afforded to recover the note being barred, must also be barred as to the mortgage.

It is certainly remarkable that this question, so far as we are informed, has never been directly decided in this State. It is true that in Gillett v. Powell, Spears Eq. 145, where a bond given to secure the debt had been altered and thereby destroyed, Chancellor Harper held that a mortgage given to secure the same debt without making any reference to the bond, was not thereby affected, but should be upheld and enforced as an independent security. It is likewise true that in the case of Gibbes v. Holmes, 10 Rich. Eq. 487, Chancellor Dargan said that, "It is a misapprehension, I think, to suppose that the statute of limitations has any application to this case. If it is meant to apply as a bar to the debt, it cannot prevail. If a mortgage be given to secure a simple contract debt, when the debt is barred the mortgage is discharged. Anything that satisfies or destroys the debt discharges the mortgage;" but it is manifest from the extract itself that the point as to the effect of the statute on the mortgage was not in-

involved in the case, and, as *we take it, had not been argued. The declaration cannot be regarded as anything more than one of those expressions which fall from a judge in the glow of argument, and are known as obiter dicta. We must regard the question as still open, and the duty imposed of deciding it upon general principles and such outside authorities as may appear analogous and sound.

There is no doubt that in this State the act of 1791 (except in one state of facts) destroyed the legal estate of the mortgagee, and, adopting the equity doctrine, declared that the mortgagor is the legal owner of the land and the mortgagee only a creditor, with a lien on the land for the security of his debt; but it must be kept in mind that there is a difference between the debt itself and the securities for it. The debt is one, but there may be a number of securities of different kinds, personal, real, pledge, mortgage, collaterals, &c. The note given is only evidence of the debt and one of the means of collecting it, and if there is a mortgage, that is only another security for the same debt. It is true that in the case of Cleveland v. Cohrs, 10 S. C. 224, it is said that "The bond represents the debt, while the mortgage is a mere security for the payment of such debt. One is the principal, the other is the mere accessory." There is nothing in this inconsistent with the views suggested. The bond, undoubtedly, is the most common assurance, and for this reason, possibly, it may be regarded as the primary security and a mortgage as cumulative, or secondary, but in no proper sense can the mortgage be regarded as a security merely for the bond, which, being only the evidence of the debt, may be displaced by substitution or lost or destroyed, leaving the mortgage as a subsisting security for the debt in a new form. Gibbes v. Railroad Company, 13 S. C. 253, and authorities.

"A mortgage being given as a security for a debt, the general rule is that no mere change in the mode or time of payment, nothing short of an actual payment of the debt or an express release, will operate as a discharge of the mortgage. The lien lasts as long as the debt." 1 Hill. Mort., § 3. The mortgage would have been good as a security for the $500 even if the bond had never been given. As the court say in the case of McCaughrin & Co. v. Williams, 15 S. C. 505, contained in the deed, nor upon the form of the indebtedness, whether it be by note or bond or otherwise: it depends rather upon the existence of the debt it is given to secure." Or, as said by Chancellor Harper in Gillett v. Powell: "But here, as I have said, the mortgage has no reference to the bond, and I cannot consider that the party claiming under it is in a worse situation than if the bond had never been taken. If he had taken a single bill and a bond with a penalty, or a bond with and one without security, though there might have been an equity to restrain the enforcement of both, I do not see how the alteration of one could vitiate the other."

We do not understand that this doctrine, as to the different securities for the same debt, conflicts with that other as well established, that payment or anything else which reaches to the debt itself and discharges it, will at the same time discharge all the securities of every kind. We agree that anything that satisfies or discharges the debt, discharges the mortgage of course. What effect did the bar of the note by the statute of limitations have upon the debt evidenced by the note and also secured by the mortgage? It is well settled that the effect of the statute is only to take away the remedy, and not to extinguish the debt. When a security is barred the debt is not thereby necessarily discharged. Wilson v. Kelly, 16 S. C. 216. The rule that the discharge of the debt is a discharge of the mortgage has no application when the debt is merely discharged by the statute of limitations or a discharge in bankruptcy.

In regard to the right to enforce a mortgage lien given to secure a debt barred by the statute of limitations, there seems to be some difference of opinion in the different States, notably in California, Nevada, Texas, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois and Kansas, but in this conflict we are content to take the general rule as laid down by Mr. Jones: "Though the debt be barred, the lien may be enforced. The fact that a debt secured by a mortgage is barred by a statute of limitations, does not necessarily, or as a general rule, extinguish the mortgage security or prevent the maintaining an action to enforce it." 2 Jones Mort., § 1204 and notes. This is the general rule, and we see no reason founded *in principle why it should not be adopted here; indeed, it would seem to have appropriate application in this State, where the law, as it now exists, makes the statutory bar of a "bond or other contract in writing, secured by a mortgage of real property," twenty years. Although as we have held, that law in terms is not applicable to this case, yet we may fairly regard it as at least a legislative declaration that the mortgage given to secure the debt in such cases takes it out of the general rule in regard to the bar of the statute of limitations.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

GARRISON v. DOUGHERTY.

(CRAWFORD v. SAME.)

[Ejectment ⇨ 148; Improvements ⇨ 4.]

The final judgment, within forty-eight hours of which a complaint for improvements under the betterment law must be filed (Gen. Stat. § 1837), means the judgment of the Circuit Court, even in cases where the cause is further prosecuted by appeal. Where such a complaint was not filed until remittitur entered dismissing an appeal, it was not within the time limited.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Godfrey v. Fielding, 21 S. C. 318.

Before Hudson, J., Marion, October, 1882.

These were actions by Vige Garrison and Ervin Crawford against John Dougherty, heard together. The Circuit judge thus states the cases:

These are actions brought against the defendant for the value of alleged betterments made by the plaintiffs upon a tract of land in the county of Marion, the possession of which the defendant, John Dougherty, had recovered of the plaintiffs in an action involving the question of title. The verdict in favor of Dougherty was rendered at the April term of the Court of Common Pleas for Marion county, A. D. 1880, and judgment thereon entered up and filed May 1st, 1880.

In due season an *appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, and by that court the judgment of the Circuit Court was affirmed. The remittitur was sent down to the Circuit Court, and filed in the clerk's office on April 11th, 1881. On the same day the present plaintiffs filed, each for himself, a complaint for the recovery of the value of betterments on that part of the tract claimed by each. In his answer to these complaints, the defendant, Dougherty, sets up several defenses, and among them, that the complaint in each case was filed too late. The proceedings are under chapter CXXI., sections 1-7, of the General Statutes (1872) which requires the complaint for betterments to be filed in forty-eight hours after the rendering of final judgment, or during the term of the court at which such judgment is rendered. The question presented is whether the final judgment contemplated in the statute is the judgment of the Circuit Court appealed from, or that judgment affirmed by the Supreme Court, as evidenced by the remittitur sent down and filed.

A reading of all the sections of the chapter providing this summary and efficacious remedy, and the prompt steps requisite to obtain the relief, satisfies me that the final judgment contemplated is the judgment of the Circuit Court. Within forty-eight hours after the rendering of such judgment, or, at furthest, during the term at which it is rendered, this claim for betterments must be filed. Hence it is that no summons is required to be served, and no notice, except the filing of the complaint, is to be given. A prompt assertion of the claim and its speedy determination are evidently contemplated, and hence the stay of all further proceedings under the judgment for the recovery of the land.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that the complaint in each of these cases be dismissed with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed on the following grounds: 1. Because his Honor erred in holding that the complaint in this action was filed too late, not having been filed within forty-eight hours after the judgment was entered in the Circuit Court. 2. Because his Honor erred in holding that the filing of the complaint in the case within forty-eight hours after the filing of the remittitur of the Supreme Court was too late, and was not in conformity *with the betterment act. 3. Because his Honor erred in holding that the act required the filing of the complaint within forty-eight hours after the judgment of the Circuit Court.

Messrs. Townsend & McKerall, for appellants.

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN [omitting the statement of the case]. The question is simply one of construction of the statute, which having stated that "after final judgment" in an action to recover lands and tenements" &c., goes on to declare "that the defendant in such action shall, within forty-eight hours after such judgment, or during the term of the court in which the same shall be rendered, file a complaint against such plaintiff for so much money as the lands and tenements are so made better, in the office of the clerk of such court, which shall be sufficient notice to the defendant in such complaint to appear and defend against the same," &c. Gen. Stat., § 1837.

The judgment is spoken of as "a final judgment," and the word "final" does ordinarily mean "relating to the end." "ultimate," "last," "latest," but, taking the whole provision together, we can not doubt that the words were intended to apply to the Circuit Court. Manifestly great promptness was intended. "Within forty-eight hours after such judgment or during the term of the court in which the same shall be rendered." There are expressions here which are entirely inapplicable to a judgment of the Supreme Court, sent down with the remittitur, which may not be necessarily during the term of either the Court of Common Pleas or of the Supreme Court, and can not be appropriately said to be "rendered."

The expression "final judgment," as applying to the Court of Common Pleas, occurs several times in the code of procedure. In section 11, "provided, if no appeal be taken until final judgment is entered," &c.; in section 305, "a transcript of a *final judgment directing in whole or in part," &c., and in section 313, "Final judgments hereafter entered shall not of themselves constitute a lien," &c.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

ELLEN v. ELLEN.

[1. Lost Instruments ¶24.]

Whether admissions of the plaintiff's grantor, while in possession of the disputed land, were sufficient evidence of the due execution and contents of an alleged lost deed, under which the defendant claimed, was a question of fact, and, therefore, properly left to the jury to be determined.

Recitals in a deed made by M. of a former conveyance by him to defendant's grantor (which conveyance is proved to have been lost), are evidence against plaintiff, who claims title under E., if E. matured title by twenty years' presumption of a grant from M., but not if plaintiff derived title through an adverse possession of E.

And declarations by M. of a gift to defendant's grantor are admissible against plaintiff, if they were made before E. took possession, claiming under a presumed deed from M., but such declarations can have no application to plaintiff's claim under an adverse possession by E.

After declarations by plaintiff's deceased grantor in disparagement of a claim of adverse possession have been introduced by defendant, other declarations by the same person in support of such a claim may be introduced by plaintiff in reply, only where they were parts of the same conversation already testified to, or accompanied and were explanatory of some special act of ownership.

Before Witherspoon, J., Marion, April, 1882.

This is a second appeal in this case, the first being reported in 16 S. C. 132, where the facts will be found more fully stated. For the purpose of understanding this appeal, the opinion here sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. W. W. Harlee, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant.

Messrs. Townsend & McKerall, W. W. Sellers, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This is a contest over a tract of land containing one hundred acres lying in Marion county. The plaintiff is a son of David Ellen by his second wife, the defendant being a son by the first wife. The defendant is in possession of the land, and this action has been brought for its recovery.

The plaintiff introduced a grant from the State to one Isaac Hyatt, A. D. 1792, covering the land; then a deed from Hyatt to one Robert McKenzie, Sr., dated May 19th, 1804; then evidence of a long and continued possession (some forty years) by his father, David Ellen, which he claimed was adverse; and finally a deed to himself of the said land from David Ellen, dated August 18th, 1871, and rested, claiming that the possession of David Ellen was adverse, and thereby David Ellen had acquired good title before the execution of his deed to the plaintiff, both under the operation of the statute of limitations, and also by the legal presumption of a deed from Robert McKenzie, Jr., and also from the said William B. Ellen, arising from over twenty years of possession.

The defendant claimed title from Robert McKenzie, Sr., first, by a deed executed from Robert McKenzie, Sr., to Zimri M. Ellen, a grandson, and the brother of defendant, William B., dated in 1833 or 1834; and, second, by deed from Zimri to defendant, executed and duly recorded March 12th, 1861; and he denied that the possession of David Ellen, his father, had at any time been adverse either to the title of Robert McKenzie, Sr., Zimri M. Ellen or of the defendant, but that he had always held with full knowledge of and subordinate to these titles. The defendant was unable to produce the deed from Robert McKenzie, Sr., to Zimri M. Ellen. This was alleged to have been lost when Sherman's army passed through that portion of the State, and other and secondary evidence was introduced as to its execution, among which was an admission of David Ellen, through whom plaintiff claimed. Upon this admission the defendant requested the judge to charge that this was "sufficient evidence *of the due execution as well as the contents of such deed, and that no further proof thereof was necessary."

The defendant offered to introduce a deed from Robert McKenzie, Sr., to Robert McKenzie, Jr., containing recitals as to the boundaries, to wit, that Robert McKenzie, Sr., had given the land in dispute to Zimri M. Ellen, which was ruled incompetent as irrelevant. After the defendant had introduced declarations of David Ellen, while he was in possession in disparagement of his title as an adverse claimant, the plaintiff was allowed to introduce David Ellen's declarations also in rebuttal of this testimony. The verdict was for the plaintiff, for the land in dispute and $300 damages.

The defendant has appealed, his appeal raising the following legal questions: First. Did his Honor err in refusing to charge as requested, "that the admission of David Ellen while in possession as to the execution of the deed from Robert McKenzie, Sr., to Zimri M. Ellen, was sufficient evidence of the due execution as well as the contents of such deed, and that no further proof was necessary?" Second. Did he err in excluding the deed of Robert McKenzie, Sr., to Robert McKenzie, Jr., with its recitals? Third. Did he err in admitting declarations of David Ellen in reply, rebutting the testimony of defendant as to declarations of said David Ellen in disparagement of his title by adverse possession? and, fourth, Did his Honor err in ruling out the declarations of Robert McKenzie, Sr., that he had given the land in dispute to his grandson, Zimri M. Ellen, and also ruling out proof that Robert McKenzie, Sr., had gone round the lines of the tract of land in dispute and shown them to his grandson, Zimri Ellen, as his own? There were other exceptions, but as they involve questions of fact they are beyond our jurisdiction and cannot be considered.

This case is now before us upon a second appeal, a new trial having been ordered in the former appeal. In that appeal the defendant excepted on the ground that the presiding judge did not instruct the jury, "that as to the deed of Robert McKenzie, Sr., to Zimri M. Ellen, the admissions of David Ellen, under whom respondent claimed, were conclusive against him not only as to its existence but as to its contents." This ex-

grounds: First, it appeared from a statement made by the presiding judge in refusing a motion for a new trial made on that exception, that it rested on a mistake of counsel as to the precise charge of the judge; and, second, that no request to charge had been made, and consequently no error as to this matter could be assigned upon appeal. Ellen v. Ellen, 16 S. C. 132, citing Madsden v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 1 S. C. 24; Abrahams v. Kelly and Barrett, 2 Id. 238. On this trial the request was made. The judge declined to charge it, but stated that he "would submit all of the testimony, including the declarations of David Ellen as to the alleged lost deed, to the jury, leaving the jury to decide as to the effect of such declarations according to the weight or preponderance of the evidence."

We find nothing in the points and authorities of appellant's counsel upon this exception, nor have we been able to find any authority ourselves to sustain it. The presiding judge pursued the proper course; he admitted the testimony, that, and all other offered, bearing upon the question immediately at issue, leaving its force and effect to the jury. It was beyond his province to discuss the sufficiency of this testimony. This, under the constitution, belonged to the jury, and the judge would have been invading their powers had he charged that any special fact had been proved, and that no further evidence was required. The question at issue was whether a deed from Robert McKenzie, Sr., to Zimri M. Ellen, had ever been executed. This was a question of fact. The admissions of David Ellen were introduced to prove this fact; whether this evidence was competent was a question of law for the court, but its effect and force was for the jury.

Second. Was it error in excluding the deed of Robert McKenzie, Sr., to Robert McKenzie, Jr., containing a recital which called for lands which the grantor had given to his grandson, Zimri M. Ellen, dated in June, 1833? "The recital of a deed in another deed is evidence of the recited deed if the original is lost, against the party who executed the reciting deed, or against any person claiming under him." 2 Phil. Ev., C., H. & E. Notes 574. This seems to be the English doctrine, the *evidence being received as secondary evidence, the recited deed having been lost.

In the United States, however, this evidence has been received as primary evidence, as evidence not only against the parties, but against privies in blood, in estate, and in law. See numerous authorities in Note 476, 2 Phil. Ev. 574, supra. "In regard to recitals, the general rule is that all parties to a deed are bound by the recitals therein, which operate as an estoppel, working on the interest, if it be a deed of conveyance, and binding both parties and privies—privies in blood, privies in estate, and privies in law. Between such parties and privies, the deed or other matter recited needs not at any time to be otherwise proved, the recital of it in the subsequent deed being conclusive. It is not offered as, secondary, but as primary, evidence which cannot be averred against, and which forms a muniment of title." 1 Greenl. Evid. 30, § 23. "But such recital does not bind strangers or those claiming by title paramount to the deed. It does not bind persons who claim by an adverse title, or persons claiming from the parties anterior to the date of the reciting deed." Ibid., Note; Carver v. Jackson, 4 Peters 1, 83 [7 L. Ed. 761].

Now, in the case before the court, the plaintiff rested his claim in part upon a deed from Robert McKenzie, Sr., to David Ellen, presumed to have been executed from twenty years' possession by David Ellen. It is true he also relied upon the adverse possession of David Ellen. But in so far as he claimed through this presumed deed arising from David Ellen's twenty years or more possession, he was to that extent a privy to Robert McKenzie, Sr., and under the authorities above cited would be subject to recitals in the deed of Robert McKenzie, Sr., to Robert McKenzie, Jr., that deed having been executed, as alleged anterior to the presumed deed. And in this case, this would be so whether the limited doctrine of the English authorities as to secondary evidence, or the wider doctrine of the American as to primary is the better law, the fact being that the recited deed to Zimri M. Ellen was lost, and, therefore, secondary evidence in reference thereto was admissible.

We think it was error in the presiding judge to exclude this deed if otherwise proved. The deed should have been admitted

*as applicable to so much of plaintiff's claim as rested upon the presumed conveyance from Robert McKenzie, Sr., to David Ellen, arising from David Ellen's twenty years' possession or more. But it would have no application to plaintiff's title derived through the adverse possession of David Ellen. Note to 1 Greenl. Evid., § 23, supra.

Third, "As to the admission of the declarations of David Ellen in reply, rebutting testimony of defendant as to David Ellen's declarations in disparagement of title by adverse possession." This court held in the former appeal in accordance with the doctrine laid down in 1 Greenl. Evid., § 109, and in our own cases of Turpin v. Brannon, 3 McC. 266, and Martin v. Simpson, 4 McC. 263, that such declarations were admissible when they accompanied an act and were explanatory thereof. It further held that Judge Hudson did not violate this principle in his ruling, as explained by him in dismissing a motion for a new trial, where he stated "that the plaintiff was confined to proof of acts of ownership without declarations as rigidly as possible."

Judge Witherspoon seems to have gone a step beyond this rule, above. He admitted the declarations of David Ellen in support of his title as independent testimony, in reply to his declarations in disparagement thereof, introduced by the defendant. If these declarations had been part of the same conversation as that introduced by the defendant, or had been explanatory of some special act, then they might have been admissible as part of the res gestæ, but the declarations of a party interested can never per se be admitted as evidence of his right. Martin v. Simpson, supra. As we understand the ruling of Judge Witherspoon, he admitted the declarations of David Ellen in support of his own title without regard to their connection with special acts and explanations thereof, but per se and in reply to the declarations introduced by the defendant. This, we think, was error.

Fourth. As to the exception "that the presiding judge erred in ruling out the declarations of Robert McKenzie, Sr., that he had given the land in dispute to his grandson, Zimri Ellen, and also in ruling out proof that Robert McKenzie, Sr., had gone around the lines of the tract of land and shown them to his *grandson, Zimri, as his own." It does not appear in the brief at what time these declarations or this inspection of the lines were made. If before David Ellen took possession, claiming by presumed deed from Robert McKenzie, Sr., the evidence was admissible under the principles discussed above; if afterwards, they were inadmissible. In the absence of the facts the court can make no positive ruling upon the subject. If admissible at all, it could have no application to claim of plaintiff's title resting upon the adverse possession of David Ellen.

The other exceptions of defendant, as to the delivery of the deed from David Ellen to plaintiff, and as to the weight and preponderance of the testimony, being questions of fact, cannot be considered. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

*This was an action by Matilda E. Davis against A. Q. McDuffie and the distributees of Archibald McIntyre, deceased, commenced in December, 1880. The opinion states the case.

The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

Upon hearing the complaint, affidavit and order of injunction above referred to, defendants' counsel insisted that the complaint should be dismissed upon the following grounds, to wit:

1. That the complaint did not set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that, admitting the allegation to be true, there was no cause of action. 2. Because the court has now no jurisdiction of the matters set forth in the complaint.

The plaintiff's counsel insisted that the defendants should have demurred or given notice of a motion to dismiss the complaint, and that having answered, it was too late to object in this way. I held and adjudged that it was not necessary that defendants should have made such objection to the complaint, either by demurrer or answer, or even make a motion to dismiss the complaint; that upon hearing the complaint at the trial, the court, of its own motion, can and should dismiss it, if it does not set forth a sufficient cause of action, or if the court cannot entertain jurisdiction, or will not grant the relief asked for.

I further hold and adjudge: That the complaint asks for a relief the court cannot grant; that the court cannot decree the specific performance by its officer, the master, of a mere understanding or agreement by which he was to give time and indulgence to a purchaser at a sale made by him, which, in law, he had no right or authority to do, and which, in any event, he could only do with the consent of the parties in interest. The terms of sale, fixed by the order of the court, were the law of the case, and they must be strictly followed. They cannot be altered by usage or custom. When plaintiff obtained time and indulgence, without the consent of parties in interest, she took all the risks, and, by her own showing, forfeited all her rights as purchaser, by not complying with bid, in accordance with terms of sale. See cases of Seymour v. Preston, Spears Eq. 485, and Baily v. Baily, 9 Rich. Eq. 392.

But even if a sufficient cause of action had been set forth in the complaint, I hold and adjudge that this court cannot take *jurisdiction now of the matters alleged, because it appears that they have already been fully heard and passed upon by a Circuit judge in open court, viz., by rule, and he has refused to order the master to make title to plaintiff. If she was dissatisfied with said decree of Judge Aldrich, plaintiff should have appealed therefrom, and not come again into the court in another form of proceeding, to ask it to correct its own errors.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, That the complaint be dismissed with costs, that the injunction heretofore granted by Judge Hudson be dissolved, and that the master, A. Q. McDuffie, do proceed to carry out the order for sale, dated October 8th, 1880, by selling the tract of land described in the complaint herein, on the first Monday in October next, or some convenient sales day thereafter, after duly advertising same, on the terms fixed by said order.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. Townsend & McKerrall, for appellant.

Messrs. C. A. Woods, Blue & Walsh, contra.

February 15th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Under proper proceedings instituted in the Court of Common Pleas for Marion county, which are still pending, an order was made for the sale of all the real estate of Archibald McIntyre, deceased, in separate lots or parcels, on the following terms, viz.: one-third cash, the balance on a credit of one and two years, to be secured by bond and mortgage. In pursuance of this order, the master offered the real estate for sale in separate lots, on the first Monday (being the first day) of November, 1880, when one of the lots, No. 2, was bid off by the plaintiff in this case at $2,500, through her husband and agent, Ezra M. Davis.

The complaint, after setting out substantially the foregoing facts, alleges that on the day of sale, the agent of the plaintiff "made an agreement with A. Q. McDuffie, master, that the said *bid would be complied with in a reasonable time by paying the cash portion of the purchase-money, and executing a bond and mortgage to secure the credit portion of the same, as was the custom in such sales in said county; and that on or about the fifteenth day of November, 1880, the plaintiff, by her agent aforesaid, duly tendered to the defendant, A. Q. McDuffie, master, the cash portion of said purchase-money, and her bond and mortgage for the residue," but that said defendant then refused and still doth refuse to make her a conveyance of said lot of land.

It is also alleged in the complaint that, at the instance of the plaintiff, a rule was issued by the Court of Common Pleas, requiring the master to show cause why he refused to make title to the plaintiff, and that upon hearing the rule and answer thereto, the Circuit judge made a decree, in which, while plainly intimating that, in his opinion, the master ought to make titles, yet stated that it was a matter in the discretion of the master, and he declined to order the master to exercise his discretion, especially as the interests of infants were involved, and a paper had been filed, at the hearing of the rule, by one of the parties interested, guaranteeing that the land bid off by the plaintiff would bring, at a resale, at least $1,000 more than her bid. He therefore left the master to act as he might be advised, "so that a proper case may be made for the judgment of the court."

The complaint further alleged, that the master had re-advertised the land for sale on the first Monday in January, 1881. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action, wherein she demands judgment, first, for an injunction restraining the master from selling; second, "that A. Q. McDuffie, master, be required and ordered to fulfill his agreement, and to make a title to the plaintiff" for the said tract of land, "on the plaintiff paying forthwith to him the cash portion of the price at which the said land was bid off, and executing her bond and a mortgage of the land to secure the residue, in accordance with the directions of the said decretal order."

Upon the complaint and an affidavit supporting its material allegations, an ex parte order of injunction was made, restraining the master from selling until the further order of the court. *When the case came up for hearing before the Circuit Court, after the complaint was read, together with the order for injunction and the affidavit upon which it was based, the counsel for defendants made a motion to dismiss the complaint upon two grounds: 1. Because it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. 2. Because the court had now no jurisdiction, as the matter had been disposed of by the decree of Judge Aldrich. The counsel for plaintiff opposed the hearing of the motion, upon the ground that no notice of it had been given, and he also insisted that before the motion could be heard the answers should be read; but the Circuit judge declined to hear them, and, after argument, granted the motion to dismiss the complaint upon both the grounds upon which it was based.

Thereupon the plaintiff appealed upon numerous grounds, which, though stated in various forms, practically raise the following questions only: First. Whether notice of the motion to dismiss the complaint, upon the grounds stated, was necessary? Second. Whether it was necessary that the answer should be read before determining the motion? Third. Whether the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? Fourth. What was the effect of the decree of Judge Aldrich refusing to make the rule against the master absolute?

The first question is disposed of by the case of Brown v. Buttz, 15 S. C. 488. This was not a motion preliminary to the hearing of a cause, nor was it a motion to dissolve an injunction, but it was a motion made at the hearing on the merits of the case, and no notice was required. It was, in fact, a demurrer under section 165 of the revised code, which was not waived by a failure to make the objection by a formal demurrer or answer. Id., § 169.

As to the next question, we can see no reason why the answers should have been read. The questions submitted by the motion to dismiss the complaint depended solely upon the allegations contained in the complaint, which, for the purposes of the motion, were to be regarded as true. The answers could not possibly have thrown any light on the questions submitted for the consideration of the court, and were, therefore, wholly irrelevant, and if read could not have been considered. We see no *error, therefore, on the part of the Circuit judge in declining to hear the answers.

The next and fundamental inquiry in the case, is whether the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. We agree entirely with the Circuit judge, that it did not. Conceding every fact stated in the complaint to be absolutely true, we are unable to perceive what cause of action the plaintiff can have. To say nothing of the anomaly of a court entertaining an action against its own officer for declining to execute fully an order of sale made in a cause still pending, wherein his compliance could be enforced by the more summary proceeding by rule and attachment, we do not think that the plaintiff has stated a case entitling her to the relief demanded—specific performance of an agreement for the sale of land—or any other relief.

It is not very clear, from the statements made in the complaint, what agreement she is asking the specific performance of. If it is the agreement arising from the bid made by the plaintiff, at the sale made under the order of the court, then it is very clear that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief demanded, for, according to her own showing, she did not comply with the terms of that agreement, as fixed by the order of sale, inasmuch as she failed to make the cash payment as required by the terms of that order. If, on the other hand, the agreement she is seeking to enforce is the verbal arrangement made by her agent with the master on the day of sale, then she is not only asking the specific performance of an agreement for the sale of land which was not in writing, but, what is of more consequence, she is seeking to enforce an agreement which the master had no authority whatever to make, for nothing can be clearer than that the master has no power to add to or vary the terms fixed by the court in the order of sale. Seymour v. Preston, Spears Eq. 481; Baily v. Baily, 9 Rich. Eq. 392.

The case of Yates v. Gridley, 16 S. C. 496, relied on by the appellant, is not in point. In that case the order of sale required not that a fixed sum should be paid in cash, but so much as might be necessary to pay the costs of the suit; and it did not appear that the amount necessary for that purpose had been ascertained on the day of sale, and, inasmuch as the clerk afterwards received the cash payment without objection and executed the deed, the legitimate inference was that the parties interested had acquiesced in the delay, and, therefore, could not afterwards make such delay a ground for setting aside an executed contract. Again, in Yates v. Gridley, the contract was executed, while here it is executory merely, and as is said in Gasque v. Small, 2 Strobb. Eq. 76: "There is a material difference between a party who seeks to rescind and one who seeks to enforce an agreement, as it requires much stronger evidence to effect the former, than will be sufficient to enable the defendant to resist the latter, and, in applying either of the remedies, an important distinction must be observed between executory and executed contracts. It seems from what is said by all elementary writers on this subject, that the specific performance of agreements is not an absolute right in the party, but a question of sound discretion in the court."

Hence, even if there was no other obstacle in the way of the plaintiff, it is, to say the least, very doubtful whether the court, in the exercise of its discretion, would enforce the performance of this agreement, where the plaintiff has not herself strictly complied with the terms of the sale, and the court is given to understand that if the property is resold it will bring a much larger price, especially as it appears that the interests of minors are involved.

The only remaining inquiry is as to the effect of the proceedings before Judge Aldrich. Under the view already taken this becomes a matter of no practical importance, but we may say that the proceeding by rule was the proper course for the plaintiff to pursue, and when the relief thus sought was denied, her remedy was by appeal and not by another action. The case in which the order of sale was made was still pending, and if any of the parties to that cause, or a purchaser at a sale made under an order in such cause, who thereby became a party to the extent necessary to enable him to move in the cause, conceived that his rights were prejudiced by the non-action of the officer ordered to make the sale, his remedy would be by rule against such officer, and not by another action.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*McMAKIN v. GOWAN.

[1. Limitation of Actions ⇨46.]

Plaintiff held a sealed note against the defendant, dated in 1862, and in 1873 he received a certain sum in settlement and surrendered the note. In 1879, more than six years afterwards, plaintiff brought this action against defendant, alleging that the settlement was made by agreement under the sealing act, and that there was an error in the settlement by a stated amount, which was unpaid, and for which he demanded judgment. Held, that the action was barred by the statute of limitations.

The action was not for equitable relief, and, therefore, governed by section 120 of the code of procedure, but was founded upon a purely legal demand.

The action not being founded upon the sealed note, but upon an alleged agreement at which the note was surrendered, the limitation of twenty years did not apply.

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, March, 1882.

Action by James McMakin against William Gowan, and after the death of William Gowan revived against his executors. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for appellant.

February 15th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The principal question in this case is whether the claim of appellant was barred by the statute of limitations. The presiding judge, Judge Pressley, so held, and also that the laches of appellant was sufficient to bar the action. The appellant excepted to the rulings of his Honor on both the points. The case was heard on the pleadings without testimony from either side.

The action was in substance an action at law for the recovery of money, $92.76, balance on agreement omitted to be paid by mistake in the calculation. The allegation of the complaint *was that the defendants' intestate, in November, 1862, had given the plaintiff a sealed note for $672; that on July 25th, 1873, at the request of defendant, the plaintiff made a calculation of the amount due according to the Corbin scale, which defendant then paid, the amount being $432.76; that afterwards he found that there was an error in the settlement to the amount of $92.76, of which the defendant was at once informed, but had refused and neglected to pay the additional sum, and the plaintiff prayed judgment for $92.76. The defendant denied that there was any mistake as to the settlement, stating that the note had been given in purchase of a slave; that it being doubtful at that time whether such notes were recoverable, the plaintiff, on July 25th, 1873, after some calculation, agreed with defendant to receive in full payment of the note, by way of compromise, the sum which was paid, the plaintiff at the same time surrendering and delivering up to the defendant the note. He further denied that the sum which plaintiff agreed to take, and which the defendant paid, had any reference to the Corbin act whatever, but was proposed and accepted as a definite sum for settlement by way of compromise. He also interposed the statute of limitations and asked a dismissal of the complaint. The presiding judge dismissed the complaint as stated, with costs.

The settlement was made on July 25th, 1873; this action was commenced on September 10th, 1879, something over six years intervening between the two events. It cannot be doubted that if the cause of action is a money demand, founded on contract to pay a certain sum on July 25th, 1873, only a part of which was then paid, leaving a balance due, for which balance the action has been brought, that then the statute is a complete bar. If not, we cannot conceive of a case where it would be. The right of action accrued on July 25th, 1873, and more than six years have elapsed since without any payment or post-acknowledgment, new promise, or anything that would prevent the statute from being interposed.

This seems to be admitted by appellant on the case stated, but the effort is made to construct out of the facts a different case from the one suggested, demanding the application of a different rule as to the statute. First, it is contended that it is not a case *at law, but a case in equity for relief, and as to the statute of limitations it is governed by section 120 of the code (first edition), which provides "that actions for relief not hereinbefore provided for, must be commenced within ten years after the cause of action shall have accrued."

This has some plausibility, but it is without real foundation. The action is not an action to reconstruct the agreement between these parties and to add something to it, which by mistake was left out at the time it was entered into, but it is to recover a certain sum of money which the appellant alleges the defendant contracted to pay, but which by mistake he did not pay. The cause of action is not the mistake, but the breach of promise. This breach is alleged to have occurred through a mistake in the calculation of the amount due. The calculation was not based on a mistaken agreement; it was based on the agreement as understood by the plaintiff, and the mistake occurred simply in the figures.

This can make no difference as to the cause of action. If the agreement required the defendant to pay the full amount now claimed by the appellant, as he contends, and the defendant has failed to do so from any cause, whether inability, perverseness, mistake or otherwise, the plaintiff has a right of action; not, however, on the cause which produced the failure to comply, but upon the failure itself, arising from whatever cause it may. Taking the agreement of the parties, as understood by the appellant, to be the true agreement, what is it? He alleges that the note was to be settled under the scaling act, but in applying this act he made a mistake in the calculation. Admit this; then it would follow that defendant, according to the agreement, was at that time indebted in the sum omitted by this mistake, having paid all but that; not indebted, however, on account of the mistake, but before the mistake occurred, and on the agreement made. The case in its essential elements is nothing more than an ordinary case of breach of contract, remediable by action at law for the recovery of money, to wit, the amount due according to the terms of the contract, after allowing defendant credit for such amount as he may have paid; and such being the case, the limitation act applicable to such cases, must apply.

*It is contended, however, that the original note was a sealed note, and this will prevent the statute. If the action was upon the note, this point would be well taken; but such is not the fact. According to plaintiff's own statement a new contract was made, which, being performed, as plaintiff understood, the note was delivered up and canceled, and now plaintiff has brought his action, not on the old note alleging that it was lost or destroyed and that there is something yet due on it, but upon the new promise alleging that defendant has failed to comply fully with that promise, and he seeks to recover the balance due on the new contract. He cannot now interject the sealed note, but must stand or fall by the cause of action found in his complaint. We think section 113 of the code (first edition) applies, and six years having elapsed from the accrual of the right of action on the cause alleged in the complaint, the action was properly held barred by the presiding judge. It is hardly necessary to discuss the doctrine of laches. We think, however, that Judge Pressley was right, even supposing that this case was an equity case. Kirksey v. Keith, 11 Rich. Eq. 33; White v. Bennett, 7 Rich. Eq. 260.

The case of Oakes v. Howell, 27 How. Pr. 145, relied on by appellant as to the statute, does not apply. There the action was to reform a sealed agreement entered into between the parties, the plaintiff alleging that by the terms of the contract as actually made, annual interest was to be paid, but that this stipulation was left out of the written agreement by "inadvertence, mistake, or oversight," and he sought to reform this agreement in the equity jurisdiction of the court. The court held that the case was within the ten years limitation prescribed by the code (in our code, section 120). But it will be at once seen that the facts and the object of the two actions were widely different, and therefore Oakes v. Howell can have no application here.

It is the judgment of this court that the order below be affirmed.

[1. Evidence ¶561.]

Comparison, as an original means of ascertaining the genuineness of handwriting, will not be permitted; but when introduced in aid of doubtful proof, already offered, it may be allowed.

[2. Appeal and Error ¶1010.]

Whether the proof is doubtful must be determined, in the first instance, by the trial judge, and his ruling will not be disturbed unless his error be very patent. The direct proof in this case was properly held by the Circuit judge to be doubtful.

[3. Evidence ¶563.]

The rule established in this State does not require the witnesses making the comparison to be professional experts in the matter of handwriting.

Before Wallace, J., Richland, April, 1882.

This was an action by Benedict, Hall & Co. against J. T. Flanigan and others, commenced in March, 1873. Mrs. L. M. Flanigan, one of the defendants, denied her alleged signature, judgment by default being taken against the other defendants. H. R. Flanigan, one of the defendants, and a son of L. M. Flanigan, was called as a witness by plaintiffs, and testified as stated in the opinion. Plaintiffs then called J. H. Sawyer and C. J. Iredell, bank cashiers, and R. S. Desportes, a merchant of long standing, and "a banker in a small way," who testified that from a comparison of the signature to the note with two admitted signatures of L. M. Flanigan, they thought the signature was genuine. This testimony was objected to by the defendant. The judge charged the jury that the only issue before them was the genuineness of L. M. Flanigan's signatures to the three notes. That they, the jury, were to make the comparison of the papers themselves, as well as to consider the testimony of the witnesses who have been examined as experts, and the other testimony in the case; that as we had no professional experts in this State, persons who had experience in the comparison of signatures to notes were competent to testify to the genuineness of signatures in controversy, by comparison with signatures proven to be genuine, and that their testimony was entitled to weight according to their experience and skill in making such comparisons; that cashiers of banks, who, in the discharge of duty, had frequent occasion to examine signatures to notes and determine their genuineness, were competent to testify to the genuineness of signatures in controversy by comparison with signatures proven to be genuine, and that their testimony was entitled to weight ac-

ing such comparisons; that cashiers of banks, who, in the discharge of duty, had frequent occasion to examine signatures to notes and determine their genuineness, were competent to testify to the genuineness of signatures in controversy by comparison with signatures proven to be genuine, and that their testimony was entitled to weight according to their experience and skill in making such comparisons.

The jury found a verdict for plaintiffs against L. M. Flanigan for $3,673.97. Defendant appealed.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The exceptions in this case, six in number, though presented in different forms, raise at last but a single question for the consideration of this court, to wit: The question of the competency of the opinion of a witness not a professional expert, as to the genuineness of a signature, derived entirely from comparison—the witness being wholly unacquainted with the handwriting of the party.

The most direct and satisfactory proof of the genuineness of a writing is the testimony of one who was present and saw the writing executed; but this is not always possible, hence the testimony of those who are acquainted with the writing of the party in question, either from having seen him write or otherwise familiar with his acknowledged writing, has invariably been allowed. From a knowledge thus acquired, the witness is supposed to have a standard in his mind, impressed by his memory, with which he can compare the disputed writing and thus reach a correct conclusion. This being the theory upon which such testimony has been uniformly received it is somewhat illogical that comparison on the witness stand of a disputed signature with one acknowledged to be genuine has been as uniformly rejected by most of the courts.

being nothing more *than a comparison with a standard resting in memory, it would seem that the latter class would be more reliable, resting, as it does, upon a comparison with an acknowledged standard present and in juxtaposition with the disputed writing, especially where the comparison proposed is generally to be made by witnesses of intelligence and familiar with chirography. But, nevertheless, while testimony of the character first above referred to has never been questioned, yet testimony of the latter character has generally been excluded. In England, until the Statute of 28 and 29 Victoria, ch. 18, § 8, the weight of authority was against such testimony. That statute, however, authorized a comparison by the jury and witnesses of a disputed writing with one proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine, and such has been the ruling doctrine in England since. In the American States, the authorities have differed, some holding to the common law decisions and others following the Statute of Victoria.

In our State a medium line has been adopted by our court of last resort. It has been generally accepted here that comparison as an original means of ascertaining the genuineness of handwriting will not be permitted, but when introduced in aid of doubtful proof already offered it may be allowed. We have three decisions upon this subject, from which the rule as just stated may be fairly deduced. The cases of Boman v. Plunkett, 2 McM. 518; Bird v. Millar, 1 McM. 125, and Bennett v. Mathewes, 5 S. C. 478. In the first of these cases a comparison by jury was permitted in aid of doubtful proof. In the second it was permitted to be made by a witness, and the papers were also submitted to the jury, and Judge Evans, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Admitting the principle to be correct, that such testimony is inadmissible in the first instance, yet in a case of conflicting evidence this kind of evidence was admitted in the case of Plunkett ads. Boman, not as original, but as confirmatory evidence, to enable the jury to decide upon which of the witnesses they could most confide. In a practice of many years I have not known the admissibility of this kind of evidence for the purpose stated, questioned."

In the last case, upon the authority of the two first, similar testimony was admitted, the comparison being made by the *witnesses in the presence of the court in aid of doubtful proof, and in that case the witnesses were not professional experts, one of them being nothing more than a book-keeper in a bank, and the other a notary public. Without discussing further the authorities in other States, we may say that it has been settled with us that such testimony is competent when offered not as original evidence, but in aid of doubtful original proof, or when it is conflicting. Nor does it seem necessary that the comparison shall be made by professional experts alone; others will be permitted, the value of the comparison depending in each case upon the intelligence, skill and experience of the witness in such matters.

But the question arises, Who is to determine when the evidence is so doubtful or conflicting as to admit this supplemental testimony? The presiding judge must, of course, determine this in the first instance. The witnesses are in his presence, and the whole matter is before him, and he must at first decide whether the case is of a character to authorize such testimony. His decision is subject to review by this court, as it is not a question entirely of discretion with him, but the case should be a very strong one and the error of the judge very patent, to warrant this court to overrule this judgment. He is more directly in contact with the question, and with all of its surroundings. The witnesses are examined in his presence, and their manner and bearing subject to his observation, and he is the better able to determine the effect of the testimony. His opinion, therefore, is and should be entitled to much weight.

But, independent of this, we think the facts below sustained the ruling of Judge Wallace. Only one witness was examined directly as to the signature of the defendant, a son of the defendant. He testified in chief that he had seen his mother write, and in his opinion the signatures to the notes were not hers; but he afterwards stated that he would take the signatures to be his mother's without comparing them with the other acknowledged signatures presented to him, to wit, her signature to a guano note and the affidavit on the original answer, but upon comparing them he would deny the signatures on the notes sued on to be hers. This certainly raised a doubt as to the reliability of *his testimony. Under such circumstances we think a case was made for the introduction of supplementary testimony. Judge Wallace, in admitting this evidence, properly limited its force and effect by stating that it was entitled to such weight only as the experience and skill of the witnesses making the comparison might demand.

As has already been stated, the rule in this State, as established and illustrated in these cases above referred to, does not seem to require that the witnesses making the comparison shall be professional experts. In Bennett v. Mathewes, supra, they have no higher qualifications in that respect than the witnesses in this case, and yet they were admitted there, and no question was raised as to that in Bird v. Millar. It is true such testimony, as all testimony founded upon opinion merely, is weak and uncertain, and should in every case be weighed with great caution; but the force and effect of such testimony is not before us—we are concerned only with its competency—and we think in this case that Judge Wallace followed the leading of the three cases cited from our own books, and, therefore, his ruling must be sustained.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Messrs. Moorman & Simkins, for appellant.
Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The appeal in this case presents but a single point, as will be seen from a brief statement of the facts. The action was brought by the appellant to recover damages alleged to have been incurred because of the fact that defendant had employed a hired agricultural laborer of appellant (one Jordan Butler), after he had been in the employment of appellant some two months of the year for which he was hired, and that after notice thereof the defendant failed to discharge the said Butler. The presiding judge charged the jury "that the law required the contract between Jordan Butler and the plaintiff, to be made in the presence of one or more disinterested witnesses, and there being no testimony to the effect that it was so made, they should find for the defendant." The jury accordingly found for the defendant. The only witnesses offered to prove the contract were the other farm laborers on the place and embraced in the same contract with Jordan Butler. The judge indicated that this testimony might be received, but that it would not avail the plaintiff, as these witnesses were not disinterested.

The appellant excepted and appeals upon the ground: "Because the presiding judge erred in charging the jury that the law required the contract between Jordan Butler and the plaintiff, upon which this action is based, to be made in the presence of one or more disinterested witnesses, and that there being no testimony to the effect that it was so made, they should find for the defendant."

We think the cases of Huff v. Watkins, 15 S. C. 87 [40 Am. Rep. 680], and Daniel v. Swearingen, 6 S. C. 304 [24 Am. Rep. 471], are conclusive of this case and against the charge of the presiding judge. In Huff v. Watkins, a former appeal in this case, the court held that the relation *of master and servant might be created by contract between an employer and an agricultural laborer, though the laborer was to receive a portion of the crop for his services instead of standing wages; in such case the master could maintain an action against one who, with knowledge of the prior contract, employs such servant. The point as to the evidence of the contract was not made or passed upon, the question being simply whether a farm laborer, for a share of the crop, could be regarded as a servant subject to the common law right of action.

In the case of Daniel v. Swearingen the same principle was announced, and further, that it was not necessary, under the act of 1869, in reference to contracts with laborers, relied on by respondent here, that the contract should be in writing, nor was a master restricted to the mode of redress prescribed in the act. On the contrary, the court said "that this act did not take away or impair the power to contract by parol, as it existed at common law, or limit the remedies for any violation of the contract to those afforded by the said act." This case is quoted with approval in Huff v. Watkins, on that point.

The act of 1869, relied on by the respondent, found now in section 2081 of the General Statutes, provides that all contracts made between owners of land * * * and laborers shall be witnessed by one or more disinterested persons, and, at the request of either party, be duly executed before a trial justice, whose duty it shall be to read and explain the same to the parties, providing in a subsequent section a remedy for the breach of such contract. Now, if this controversy grew out of an effort by the appellant to enforce the remedy prescribed in the act, and with reference to a contract claimed to have been made under it, then we would not say but that it should have been made, either in writing, or witnessed by one or more disinterested witnesses. Neither of these questions are touched in Huff v. Watkins, or Daniel v. Swearingen, supra; the main question in the first being, whether an agricultural laborer for a share in the crop could be regarded as a servant, in the common law sense; and in the second, that question, and also whether, in order to create such a relation, it was necessary that the contract remedy that *could be resorted to by either party for a violation of the contract. In the first case, as stated, it was held distinctly that such relation could exist as to agricultural laborers for a part of the crop as well as to menial servants, or servants for wages, and in that case the contract, though not in writing and not attested by disinterested witnesses, was the subject of the action. In the latter case, it was held that a contract made under the act even, need not necessarily be in writing, unless required by one of the parties, nor were the parties restricted to the statutory remedy for a breach.

It would seem, then, from these cases, and especially from the case of Daniel v. Swearingen that there may be two classes of contracts in such cases, one under the statute and one at common law, each having its own remedy for a violation—the class under the statute to be in writing, if required by either of the parties, otherwise not, but by the express terms of the statute "to be witnessed by disinterested persons." It is only in such a contract that the stringent remedy afforded by the act can be invoked, and where the party intends to rely upon this remedy, the contract must be made in accordance with the requirements of the act. But the act does not declare that all other contracts in such cases shall be void. It does not abolish the common law right of parties intending to enter into this relation, to contract, if they so see proper, as they could do in reference to any other matter. It simply gives them the privilege, for their own protection, to come under the act if they choose to do so, thereby becoming entitled to the remedies which the act affords.

This is the principle upon which the case of Daniel v. Swearingen was based, for the court said: "But even if a writing was necessary, it was only for the purpose of allowing either of the parties to avail himself of the remedy allowed to such contracts by the twelfth section of the act. Its provisions extend alone to those contracting, and were intended for their protection. The employer was not deprived of any rights he might have against a third person for improperly interfering with those in his service in any way by which it becomes less available to him. But in any view, the provisions referred to *do not take away or impair the power to contract by parol, as it existed at common law, or limit the remedies to those afforded by the said section, and the same may be said as to the requirement that it shall be witnessed by disinterested persons. The common law does not require that a contract like this should be witnessed by disinterested persons, nor does the act say that a contract not so witnessed shall be void. It only provides that a contract so witnessed shall be entitled to the remedies prescribed therein."

The second branch of respondent's argument proceeds upon the supposition that if the contract cannot be brought under the act it was void; that Jordan Butler was not bound by it, and that he had the right to leave when he pleased; and such being the case, that no action would accrue to appellant against respondent for employing him. The fundamental fact that Butler was the servant of appellant, being absent, this would be unanswerable if the premise upon which it is based was sound (to wit), that these parties could not contract except under the act, and that the relation of master and servant as to laborers could not exist except by virtue of the act. We think it could, or at least we think it has been so held in Daniel v. Swearengen.

As the appellant is not seeking to enforce any remedy afforded by the act, we think it was error in the judge to charge that it was necessary that the contract should be witnessed by one or more disinterested witnesses.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Before Cothran, J., Union, June, 1882.

This was an indictment against Richard Paulk, a white man, for marrying Dora Brown, a mulatto woman, on April 8th, 1882. The opinion states the case.

Mr. David Johnson, Jr., for appellant.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant was indicted at the June term of the Court of Sessions, A. D. 1882, for Union county, charged with violating the provisions of the act of Assembly entitled "An act to prevent and punish the intermarrying of races," approved December 12th, 1879. The defendant claimed immunity from conviction and punishment on account of insanity caused by gross and excessive drunkenness.

The portion of the charge which is material to the questions raised in the appeal is as follows: The judge said to the jury: "That the well-established rule upon this subject is, that every man is presumed to be sane, and consequently responsible for his acts, until the contrary is made to appear by satisfactory proof. That where the defense of insanity is interposed it must, in order to avail, be sustained by proof sufficient to bear down and overcome this presumption of sanity. The defendant undertakes to do this, and must do it not beyond a reasonable doubt, but by such preponderance of testimony as to overcome the legal presumption of sanity which attaches to every citizen of sufficient age who has not been adjudged a lunatic. That this *question was solely for their determination, and must be decided upon the testimony of the witnesses whom they had seen and heard."

*516

Upon the matter of drunkenness as an excuse for the commission of a crime, they were charged as follows:

"The law makes a distinction between criminal acts which are the immediate result of drunkenness, and committed while it lasts, and acts produced by previous habits of gross intemperance. The former are punishable, the latter not. In other words, the law deals with results and will not punish an insane man. But insanity must exist, and be made to appear by satisfactory proof, to enable him who sets it up as a defense to escape criminal responsibility. It matters not whether that delicate and mysterious organism which we call the mind, and which is supposed to be the seat and center of volition, be destroyed by the acts of the accused or by the touch of the finger of God; if the fact of insanity existed at the time of the commission of the offense, the defendant cannot be legally convicted. But if he has failed with the proof exhibited to overcome the presumption of insanity, and you believe the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution, he is guilty and ought to be convicted. That upon this issue, as upon every material issue in the case, and upon the whole case, the accused is entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt."

The defendant was convicted and sentenced. His counsel, on appeal, relies upon the negative of two propositions laid down in the charge: 1. That when insanity is interposed under a plea of "not guilty" by the defendant in a criminal action, it must be proved by a preponderance of evidence. 2. That when the criminal act was the immediate result of voluntary intoxication, and committed while it lasts, the intoxication affords no excuse as defense. Both of these propositions are denied by the appellant, and error is assigned because they were charged.

The argument of appellant admits the general principle, that as sanity is the normal condition, the law presumes every man to be sane, and judgment will follow, unless the contrary is proved. But it is urged, as if this had been denied to the defendant by the judge, that where insanity is set up as a defense *and this becomes a question of evidence, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of all reasonable doubts in the mind of the jury on that subject, as well as all others pertaining to his guilt, and, therefore, he excepts to the charge, understanding, as he does, that defendant had been denied the benefit of this principle by the judge.

We think the defendant has misunderstood the meaning and scope of the charge. The judge said, that where the defense of insanity is interposed, it must, in order to avail, be sustained by proof sufficient to bear down and overcome this presumption of sanity. The defendant undertakes to do this, and must do it, not beyond a reasonable doubt, but by such preponderance of testimony as to overcome the legal presumption of sanity which attaches to every citizen of sufficient age who has not been adjudged a lunatic. In civil cases the truth of the facts alleged depends upon the weight or preponderance of the testimony, but in criminal cases, by the humanity of the law, the guilt of the defendant must appear beyond a reasonable doubt, and this applies to all essential elements of the crime.

As we understand the charge, Judge Cothran intended to apply this principle to the defense of the defendant, in the extracts above. He did not hold the defendant to the strict rule of proving beyond all reasonable doubt that he was insane when the act was committed, but he held him simply to the rule which prevails in civil cases, to wit, that he should prove it by the preponderance of testimony, with the view to give the defendant the benefit of all reasonable doubt, as to the facts required to be proved by the prosecution. He held the State bound to prove them to that extent and to the same end; when he came to the defense he relaxed the rule and required only a preponderance, stating distinctly that defendant need not prove his alleged insanity beyond all reasonable doubt; on the contrary, if but the preponderance of testimony was on that side, let the defendant have the benefit of it; concluding his charge with the following direct and unmistakable instruction, "That upon this issue (insanity), as upon every material issue in the case, and upon the whole case, the accused is entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt."

*Thus understood, we think the charge was in accordance with the position taken by appellant, in the line of the authorities cited, and certainly as favorable to the accused as it could have been put. If we have not misapprehended the position of the appellant, he has no cause of complaint as to the first exception, because he was permitted to invoke every reasonable doubt, that might exist which is all that he seems to have claimed or was entitled to demand.

If, however, the position of appellant is, that the defendant having interposed insanity as his defense, the State was bound to prove, beyond all reasonable doubt, that he was not insane—in other words, that the mere interposition of the defense of insanity destroyed the legal presumption of sanity and at once shifted the burden of further proof, as to that question, on to the prosecution, with the responsibility of proving by some additional testimony, beyond all reasonable doubt, that the accused was not insane, and that the judge should have so charged, which from some portion of the argument it would seem that appellant claims—then we would say that such a position has no foundation in any principle or authority that we have been able to discover.

It is true that the State is bound to make out all the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt, and until this is done the accused is in no danger, but it would be stretching the doctrine of humanity beyond all precedent to require the State also to prove that the special defense set up by the accused is false beyond all reasonable doubt, in advance of any testimony offered to support it. In a special defense like insanity, the burden of proof rests upon the defendant, and if the defense is sustained not to the extent of a reasonable doubt, but by a preponderance, then the accused becomes entitled to a verdict of not guilty.

With regard to the second proposition, the judge charged: "That the law makes a distinction between criminal acts which are the immediate result of drunkenness and committed while it lasts, and acts produced by previous habits of gross intemperance. The former are punishable, the latter not." That this distinction stated exists, as a general rule, is well settled. 1 Arch. *Cr. Pl. & Pr., Waterman's Notes 32, 832. In People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, cited by appellant, the court held that voluntary drunkenness of whatever degree constitutes no defense to the commission of crime. In Smith v. Commonwealth, 1 Duvall 224, also cited by appellant, the same doctrine is held.

In the first case, Judge Cooley states the ground upon which this is held so strongly that I quote his exact language, instead of simply stating the principle. He says: "A doctrine like this, to wit, that drunkenness should excuse, would be a most alarming one to admit in the criminal jurisprudence of the country, and we think that the recorder was right in rejecting it. A man who voluntarily puts himself in condition to have no control of his actions, must be held to intend the consequences. The safety of the community requires this rule. Intoxication is so easily counterfeited, and since it is so often resorted to as a means of nerving the person up to the commission of some desperate act, and is withal so inexcusable in itself, the law has never recognized it as an excuse for crime," citing numerous authorities. 17 Mich. 19.

But Judge Cothran did not charge that voluntary drunkenness would preclude the idea of insanity, and that if the act was committed while the accused was in that condition, he should be convicted whether he was really insane or not; on the contrary, the fair inference from the language used by him, is that he intended that drunkenness in itself without more would not excuse, because he followed his first remark with the emphatic statement that, "It matters not what may have overthrown the volition of the accused, whether it be his own act or the act of God, yet, if the fact of insanity existed at the time of the commission of the offense, the defendant can not be legally convicted." The defendant can take nothing therefore from his exception resting upon the second proposition.

We think the charge as a whole was in accordance with the principles which govern in criminal cases. As is well understood, one of the most important principles in such cases is, that the accused should have the benefit of every reasonable doubt, and this applies to all the facts necessary to his guilt, the act, the intent, and all other essentials, and the State in the first instance must make out its case as to all these, beyond a reasonable doubt. The legal presumption of the innocence of the accused demands this. The State having made a case which in the absence of defense comes up to this requirement, the accused may overthrow it, and this is done when he raises a reasonable doubt as to the facts made by the State, or by proving an alibi, insanity, or any other defense inconsistent with guilt. These defenses, however, must have some foundation in the evidence adduced by the defendant, before they can have the effect of either overthrowing the State's case, or raising a reasonable doubt thereto, supposing, as we have, that the State has made a prima facie case.

Now the question is, as to the quantum of proof required by such defense to have the desired effect; shall it be such as would prove the defense beyond a reasonable doubt? or, may it be done simply by a preponderance of the testimony? Judge Cothran held the latter, and we think he was right. According to the supposition, the prosecution, by proving the act by testimony, and applying the principle of law as to the presumed sanity of the accused, has made out its case in the first instance beyond a reasonable doubt. This must be overthrown by the accused, either by showing the charge entirely false, or by raising a reasonable doubt of its truth, but to do this certainly some testimony is required.

The question is, how much? It is answered, enough to make it reasonably certain, from the preponderance of testimony, that the defense is well founded. If, with such testimony, a case should go to the jury with instructions from the court that after considering the whole testimony, with the legal presumptions that appertained both as to the question of the sanity and the innocence of the accused, they are satisfied that the charge has been proved beyond all reasonable doubt, then to find a verdict of guilty, in our opinion no exception could be sustained on the ground that the State had not been held to the rule of reasonable doubt, or that the defendant had been denied its benefit.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McIVER. These two cases, involving the same questions, were heard, and will be considered together. They were ordinary actions upon promissory notes, and the defenses were failure and want of consideration. By consent they were heard by the Circuit judge, without a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts, substantially as follows:

The Palmetto Steam Boat Company was chartered in 1873 by the State of North Carolina, but not by the State of South Carolina, for the purpose of doing a general freight, passenger and towing business upon the waters of North and South Carolina. The only property owned by the company was a steamboat called "The Lillington," which was purchased and placed upon the Wateree river, in South Carolina, and seems to have been engaged in passenger and freight traffic between the bridge of the W. C. & A. Railroad Company and Parker's Landing, on that river. On May 13th, 1874, the plaintiff, who was the owner of one-half or more of the stock of the company, contracted with Gettys for the sale of four shares, and with Huckabee for the sale of two shares of said stock. These parties accordingly gave their negotiable notes to the plaintiff, dated May 14th, 1874, payable six months after date, the one

*for $200 and the other for $100. Thereafter, but at what particular date is not stated, certificates for four shares of said stock were filled out in the name of Gettys, and for two shares in the name of Huckabee, signed by E. Parker, president, and F. L. Phelps, secretary, citizens of South Carolina, and delivered to the plaintiff to be delivered to the defendants when their notes matured or were paid. A short time before the maturity of these notes "The Lillington" partially sank in the Wateree river, with a large cargo of rosin, and the company not being able to pay the expenses incurred in saving the cargo and raising the boat, it was sold under a decree of the United States Court, obtained by one English, who had been employed for that purpose, for an amount insufficient to pay his claim. The Circuit judge held that there was a sufficient consideration to support the notes; that there was no failure of consideration, and that the certificates of stock were delivered to the plaintiff as agent of the defendants, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff in both of the cases.

From these judgments the defendants appeal upon various grounds set out in the record. We do not deem it necessary to make a detailed statement of the grounds of appeal, for we think the only questions in the case are: 1. Whether there was any consideration originally for the notes; and, if so, 2d. Whether such consideration has failed.

The first question depends upon whether there was a completed sale of the stock, for, if so, it can scarcely be doubted that the transfer of shares in a joint stock company constitutes a sufficient consideration to support a note given for the price agreed upon for said shares. There can be no doubt that the defendants contracted to buy from the plaintiff shares of the stock, and actually gave him their negotiable notes for the price agreed upon. They had, therefore, done everything required upon their part to complete the purchase. There is as little doubt that the plaintiff procured certificates of stock, to be issued by the proper officers of the company in the names of the defendants, and this operated as a transfer, by him to them, of the property in or title to the stock.

actually delivered to the defendants personally, cannot affect the question. It does not appear that they ever applied for and were refused possession. On the contrary, the Circuit judge finds as matter of fact (and in a case like this his finding of fact must be regarded as having the same force and effect as the verdict of a jury) that the certificates were delivered to the plaintiff as the agent of the defendants, which, of course, is equivalent to a delivery to them personally. The necessary inference from the fact that the officers of the company made out these certificates in the names of the defendants, and parted with the possession of them by delivering them to the plaintiff, would be that the defendants stood on the books of the company as stockholders, and as such entitled to exercise all the rights belonging to stockholders, and the fact that they never saw fit to claim or exercise their rights as such, cannot have the effect of depriving them of their character as stockholders.

of the plaintiff as a security for the payment of the notes, as seems to be the legitimate inference from the conduct of the parties, that would be nothing more, in effect, than a mortgage to secure the payment of said notes, and would, of course, imply ownership of the stock by the defendants. It is scarcely conceivable that defendants would give their negotiable notes for property to which they had acquired no title, and we are, therefore, forced to conclude that the true meaning of the transaction was that the defendants had bought the stock on a credit, and only left the certificates in the hands of the plaintiff as security for the payment of the notes, at maturity, and that upon payment of their notes they will be entitled to demand possession of the certificates of stock. There was, therefore, no want of consideration for the notes.

Our next inquiry is, whether there has been a failure of consideration. The loss of the boat, constituting, as it did, the principal, if not the sole property of the company, cannot operate as a failure of the consideration, for the thing purchased was not the boat, or any undivided interests therein, but shares in the stock of the company, and to these the defendants are still entitled. The stock of a company is a totally different thing from the property owned by the company, and surely it cannot be said that because a corporation or joint stock company loses its property by some accident incident to the business in which it is engaged, that the purchaser of shares therein is thereby released from the payment of the price at which he has bought such shares from another stockholder. That is a loss which falls in common upon all the stockholders, and it would be not only without any warrant in law, but grossly inequitable, to throw it upon any one or more of them for the purpose of relieving those who may have bought some of the stock on a credit, and had not paid the purchase-money before the loss occurred. There is not the slightest evidence in this case tending to show that the loss of the property of this company was the result of any fault of the plaintiff; nor is there any evidence that the plaintiff gave any guaranty whatever that the stock should be worth as much at the maturity of the notes as it was at the time they were given. We are, therefore, unable to discover any ground upon which it can be said that there has been a failure of the consideration for which these notes were given.

The fact that the company, in which the defendants bought shares, was a foreign corporation doing business in this State, cannot be allowed to affect the questions raised. Whether the defendants, after recognizing the existence of such corporation by the purchase of shares therein, are now in a condition to question its legality, might well be worth consideration; but aside from this, it is now well settled by the cases cited in respondent's brief, that a corporation created by the laws of one State may lawfully do business in another State, unless forbidden by its charter or by the laws of such other State. The Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519 [10 L. Ed. 274]; Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 352 [25 L. Ed. 888]. It is not only not suggested that there was anything in the charter of this company forbidding it from doing business in this State, but, on the contrary, it is expressly stated that it was chartered "for the purpose of doing a general freight, passenger and towing business upon the waters of North and South Carolina." Nor are we aware of any law or public policy of this State either expressly or impliedly prohibiting such a corporation from doing business in this State.

So, too, we see nothing illegal or extraor-

ordinary in the fact *that the president and secretary of this foreign corporation were citizens of South Carolina. It is a matter of common notoriety that one of the largest and most important corporations in this State now has for its president, and some of its other officers, citizens of the State of New York. In the absence of any prohibition in their charter, the stockholders in a corporation can select whomsoever they may please to manage its affairs, and persons dealing with such corporation have no right to object.

The judgment of this court is that the judgments of the Circuit Court, in the two cases above stated, be affirmed.

[1. Limitation of Actions ¶60.]

A creditor held a sealed note, dated in 1863; in 1869, the debtor made a voluntary deed, to his wife and daughters, of a tract of land. In 1874, action was commenced on the note and judgment obtained in 1879, and a return of nulla bona had the same year; on the next day action was instituted to vacate the deed. Held, that this latter action was not barred by the statute of limitations.

*Messrs. George S. Mower, Jones & Jones, for appellant.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In September, 1869, Thomas Chandler, now deceased, in consideration of natural love and affection, executed a conveyance to his wife and two daughters, the defendants, of a certain tract of land situate in Newberry county, containing two hundred and sixty acres, reserving a life estate to himself. The deed was duly recorded September 11th, 1869. At the time of the execution of this deed, Chandler, the grantor, was indebted to appellant by sealed note, which bore date in 1863. In December, 1874, which was five years and three months after the execution and recording of the deed, the appellant brought action upon his note against Chandler, before the termination of which Chandler died, but the action was revived against his representatives, and judgment was obtained on February 13th, 1879, for $1,798.07.

In October, thereafter, the sheriff made return of nulla bona on the execution issued on this judgment, and on the next day, to wit, October 2d, 1879, the present action was commenced to set aside the deed to the defendants as fraudulent. The defendants, with other defenses not involved on this appeal, interposed the statute of limitations. The presiding judge, Judge Pressley, sustained the plea, and on that ground dismissed the complaint, with costs. The question before us is whether this ruling was error, and this is the only question in the case.

It is a general principle that the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the right of action accrues. This has been long since settled, and is well understood, as an established initial principle in connection with this statute. Mr. Angell says, "that the time is to be computed from the time at which the creditor is authorized to bring his suit. If the contract is to pay money at a future period, or upon the happening of a certain event, the statute, it is very clear, is inoperative until the specified period has elapsed, or the particular event has occurred, or, *if upon condition, not until the condition has been performed." Ang. Lim., ch. XVI., p. 46. It is also well understood that there are certain disabilities (savings in the statute) which prevent its operation while they exist, one of these being absence from the State of the defendant when the right of action accrues. And it has been held in several cases in our State, that the statute is not set in motion against fraud until the fraud has been discovered. Egleberger v. Kibler, 1 Hill Ch. *113 [26 Am. Dec. 192]; Farr v. Farr, Id. *387; Means v. Feaster, 4 S. C. 249.

All these follow as necessary sequences to the general principle upon which the statute of limitations rests, and which makes it a statute of peace and repose, to wit, unnecessary delay in attempting to enforce a right. Because, when no right of action has accrued, or, if accrued, an insurmountable legal disability stands in the way of asserting it, to permit a party to shield himself by interposing the statute, claiming the benefit of a delay which by no possibility could have been avoided by the plaintiff, would be repugnant to every sense of justice and a reproach to any system of law which claims to be the perfection of reason.

Now, the important questions in this case are, First, When did the right of action accrue? Second, Was the plaintiff, at that time, laboring under any legal disability, and, if so, when was this disability removed? And, finally, was this action commenced within a competent time thereafter? As to the first question, it may be stated as a general proposition, that a right of action accrues the moment a cause of action arises, and not before. Sometimes it may be that this right cannot be exercised at the moment of its accrual, because of some existing disability, applicable either to the plaintiff or the defendant, but, nevertheless, it may exist with its active energy suspended during the pendency of the disability. But the right of action certainly can never accrue before the cause of action arises.

The object and purpose of the present action was to set aside a deed on the ground of fraud upon the appellant. The deed was a voluntary conveyance by the appellant's debtor to the defendants, of a tract of land which, at the date of the deed, belonged to this debtor. It cannot be contended successfully that a voluntary conveyance without consideration, a gift, is *necessarily fraudulent, although made by one in debt at the time. To give, it is said upon the highest authority, is praiseworthy; it not only blesses the receiver but the bestower, and there can be no higher enjoyment than the exercise of this right when properly indulged. Generous and benevolent liberality to the objects of one's love and affection, or to promote laudable and praiseworthy purposes, should not only be free from reproach, but be deserving of commendation.

There is, however, a still higher principle than this, a principle of justice, which demands that one shall be just before he is generous; and this principle, while not discouraging or condemning gifts, will not allow them to stand, if by so doing the just rights of others are defeated. Accordingly, in the harmonious application of these principles, it has been held by our courts, that while a voluntary conveyance of property is not of itself fraudulent even by one in debt, yet, if it was intended to hinder, delay and defeat present creditors, or shall ultimately have that effect, it will be held fraudulent and void.

If at the time of its execution the wrong was intended, the fraud is positive and active, and attaches to the act at that moment. If, however, no wrong was then intended, and the conveyance becomes injurious to creditors afterwards, because at some future time the grantor's property has failed to meet the just demands of the creditors, whose claims existed at the time of the deed, then a passive and legal fraud is developed, which, attaching to the deed, renders it void, not from the beginning, but at that moment. This must be so, because until it is legally ascertained that it requires the property embraced in the deed to respond to the demands of creditors, the rights of the grantee are unassailable. Even the deed of one absolutely insolvent would be good, if he should be so fortunate as to accumulate enough afterwards to meet the claims of creditors in time for their executions. Hence, it has been often held that a creditor, before attempting to assail the conveyance of his debtor, must not simply be apparently unable to secure payment otherwise, but must absolutely fail to do so after exhausting all legal effort to that end, by judicially establishing his debt and having a *return of nulla bona by the sheriff upon an execution issued thereon.

Now, in such case (which is the case here), the important questions are presented: What is the cause of action, and when does it arise? And, consequently, When does the currency of the statute begin? A cause of action has been held in brief to be a legal right of the plaintiff invaded by the defendant, and it arises when the invasion takes place. Or, as stated by Mr. Angell: "Both in courts of equity as well as in courts of law, a cause of action or suit arises when and as soon as the party has the right to apply to the proper tribunals for relief." Did the appellant have the right, at the date of the deed in controversy, to apply to the courts for relief with the view to have the proceeds of the property therein embraced applied to his debt? He certainly did not, because at that time his debt had not been judicially established, nor was he able to furnish the necessary evidence that his debt could not be paid without the aid of this property. Having no such right at that time, there was no invasion, as a right having no existence cannot be invaded.

All the elements of a cause of action at that time were wanting, and no right of action accrued. So the currency of the statute did not then begin. But the appellant did afterwards reduce his note to judgment, and failed by his execution to find property other than this land to satisfy his debt. Then, and not till then, his right attached to seize this property and make it available, and then, and not till then, did the defendants invade this right by retaining possession and refusing to allow it to be sold. Up to that time their possession was legal and beyond the reach of attack, and it was only at that time that the appellant had the right to apply to the courts for relief, because his right of action had never accrued before.

If, then, the statute of limitations is inert and inoperative until the right of action accrues, as announced in the first general principle laid down in the beginning of this opinion, the time of computation here must begin on October 1st, 1879, the day on which the return of nulla bona was entered on appellant's execution. Jones v. Read, 1 Humph. 345; Marr v. Rucker, Id. 347. This action was commenced the next day, to wit, October

*2d, 1879. This was certainly in time to satisfy the demands of any of the statutes, and it will be hardly necessary therefore to discuss the questions whether it required four, six or ten years to bar this action.

But even admitting that the plaintiff's right of action accrued at the date of the deed in 1869, and that the statute of force then requiring only four years is applicable, it cannot be contended that he could then have applied to any court either of law or equity for relief. His hands were completely tied. He was laboring under disabilities far greater than infancy, coverture or absence beyond the seas (the savings in the statute), for such persons have a right to commence their actions, notwithstanding their disabilities, and if commenced the courts will regard them, and grant proper relief. But had appellant commenced his action, it would have been dismissed on the ground that he had no cause of action. It would have been fatal on demurrer because it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a case of action.

Can it be that, notwithstanding this, the statute was running against him because he was not asserting his right when the doors of all the courts were hermetically sealed in his face, and he was denied the privilege of appealing to them? This would be a stigma too great to be admitted, and a court of equity never ought to permit a defendant to shield himself under such a plea, when surrounded by such circumstances. To legitimate such an effort would be a wrong as great and as repulsive as the fraud which it protects. To prevent this, the court should seize upon the analogies arising from other cases, even though no authority directly in point can be found.

Upon what principle has it been decided that the statute does not commence to run until the discovery of the fraud in cases of active fraud, and that when the plaintiff avers in his complaint that the fraud was not discovered within the four or six years, it devolves upon the defendant to prove the contrary? It is upon the principle that the plaintiff could not have commenced action sooner. He had no knowledge of the wrong. Is not this precisely analogous to the case at bar? The appellant here had no knowledge that the deed to the defendants was in his *way until he found no other property available by the return of nulla bona. He had no cause of complaint, until he found it necessary to make that property available. Upon what principle has it been held, that if the debtor is absent from the State and beyond the reach of the court at the time the right of action accrues, the statute is suspended until he returns? It is because the plaintiff could not have sued sooner. So, too, the statute is suspended for nine months after the death of the debtor. And upon what principle is it that infants, feme coverts and parties beyond the seas have been saved in the statute itself? It is because they are not in condition to sue.

This principle, unless authority beyond question the other way can be found, ought to control in a case like this. It is claimed that these principles cannot apply in the face of the positive decision in this State that the statute commences at the discovery of the fraud. This doctrine is not denied, but it must be taken in connection with that other principle, also held in this State, that to give currency to the statute there must be a plaintiff who can sue and a defendant who can be sued. Bugg v. Summer, 1 McM. 333. The discovery of the fraud by a party who cannot sue on account of it, amounts to no discovery. There are cases where an action can be commenced the moment the fraud is discovered, and to such cases this doctrine is properly applicable, but in those cases where this discovery gives no right of action at the time, the reason of its application entirely fails.

It is conceded that this question has never been distinctly decided in this State, except in the recent case of McGowan v. Hitt, to which reference will be had subsequently. In the absence of controlling authority, it does seem that a court, in administering equity, should have some regard to the principles upon which the Court of Equity has always acted, and should decline, in a case like this, to give its aid to a party to escape from the consequences of a fraudulent act, by interposing the bar of the statute. These principles were well expressed in McLure v. Ashby, 7 Rich. Eq. 430, by Chancellor Johnstone, where he said: "In matters of an equitable nature, the statute not extending to them, this court is not imperatively bound to apply it, and only applies it by analogy to the practice at law, and that *it does not apply it where a sound conscience would be offended by its application." So, too, as was said by Chancellor Dargan, in the same case, in drawing a distinction as to the statute in courts of law and the Court of Equity: "They are not obligatory upon this court, and do not apply to proceedings in equity, except so far as the court has thought it conducive to the ends of justice to apply them in analogy to the rules which prevail in a court of law. And as the court only acts on this analogy because of its subserviency to the ends of justice, it withholds such action when it would be obviously subversive of equity."

The respondents, while impliedly admitting the correctness of the positions hereinabove, yet contend that in this case they should not apply, for the reason that appellant allowed five years and more to elapse after the execution of the deed which he now assails, before he attempted to put himself in place to attack it. The deed was executed in 1869, and defendant did not bring action upon his note until 1874. We do not see that this fact has any bearing upon the question involved. The appellant's note was under seal, and he had the right to indulge his debtor for five years, or more, if he saw proper, and why should he be punished for this? non constat that he knew or had any suspicion that Chandler would not be able to pay it, when demanded, or that the tract of land conveyed to the defendants would have to contribute to that end. There was no law which required that he should hasten proceedings in another and independent matter, in order to create a cause of action against the defendants, and we can see no reason why the five years between the deed and the action on the note, which the appellant, under the law, had a legal right to extend them, should now be converted into a limitation to another action, the right to which has not long since accrued, and which at that time he had no knowledge would ever accrue.

The judgment which we propose to announce is directly in conflict with McGowan v. Hitt, 16 S. C. 602 [42 Am. Rep. 650]. That case was decided by a divided court, Mr. Justice McIver having dissented. It is a very recent decision. Judge Pressley, delivering the opinion of the majority, stated that in several of the States cases were found holding that the statute was suspended in cases *like that. See Jones v. Read, 1 Humph. 345; Marr v. Rucker, Id. 347, where the court expressly held that the statute did not begin to run until judgment by the creditor, and that some of the court had grave doubts on the question. Under these circumstances, and upon examination, finding that it has no sufficient support, either in principle or authority, in our opinion it should be overruled and it is so ordered.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Before Fraser, J., Edgefield, October, 1880. The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. P. Carroll, for appellant.

Mr. J. C. Sheppard, contra.

February 15th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This action was brought by the relator, Lewis Jones, upon the official bond of Isaac Boles, formerly sheriff of Edgefield county, against the said Isaac Boles and his surviving sureties to the said bond, and the personal representatives of such of his sureties as have died. The substance of the complaint is that the rela-tor, Lewis Jones, in 1868, *held the oldest judgment against Edward J. Mims; that, under executions to enforce junior judgments against the said Edward J. Mims, his lands were sold, in December of that year, by the said Isaac Boles, as sheriff of Edgefield county, and that the entire proceeds of that sale were wrongfully applied by him towards the satisfaction of said junior judgments, leaving a large balance due upon the judgment of the relator unpaid.

The answer of Isaac Boles denied that he was sheriff of Edgefield county, in December, 1868, but that one John H. McDevitt, having been elected to that office, on November 15th, 1868, demanded and obtained possession of said office, and that thereafter all the funds that went into the said office were received and disbursed by the said John H. McDevitt; that no part of the proceeds of the land sold on sales day in December, 1868, ever came into the hands of the said Boles, but that the same was disbursed by an order of the court, and arranged between the parties interested in the same. And he further denied that the cause or action mentioned in the complaint accrued to the plaintiff within four years before the institution of the same, and the plaintiff's action in that regard was barred by the statute of limitations. The other defendants answered that they knew nothing of the facts, and relied upon the answer of the defendant Boles.

The case was tried before Judge Fraser and a jury. The plaintiff proved the sheriff's bond, and his judgment and execution, that John H. McDevitt did not take possession of the sheriff's office until December 15th, 1868, the entry of the sales, on January 4th, 1869, in the handwriting of Paul, the clerk of Boles, and signed "Isaac Boles, S. E. D." The lands were sold on December 4th, 1868, and Isaac Boles, as sheriff of Edgefield county, executed conveyance to E. A. Mims, on December 6th, 1868, which acknowledges the receipt by Isaac Boles, as sheriff, of the sum of $8,920, the purchase-money of the lands of the said Edward J. Mims, sold on December 6th, 1868. The execution book of the sheriff contained the following entry: "Lewis Jones, bearer, v. John Lyon, John Leigh, Samuel F. Goode and Edward J. Mims, Fi. Fa., November 12th, 1858." The entry of the execution on the index is as follows: "Lewis Jones, *bearer, v. John Lyon, John Leigh et al." In clerk's office the case was referred to in the "abstract of judgments," and also in "the index and cross-index to judgments," as the case of "Lewis Jones, bearer, v. John Lyon et al."

The presiding judge granted a non-suit upon the ground that there was "no proof of actual notice to the defendant, Boles, in accordance with the terms of section 60 of the act of 1839 concerning the office, duties and liabilities of sheriffs, and no proof of any fact affecting the said defendant with the necessary notice."

The plaintiff appealed upon the following grounds:

1. "That the defendant, Isaac Boles, as sheriff of Edgefield district, was bound by law, out of the proceeds of sale made by him of the lands of Edward J. Mims, to satisfy the senior judgment at the suit of the relator, Lewis Jones, against the said Edward J. Mims, which was entered in the execution book in his office, even though it were shown that no actual notice was given him, Boles, of the said judgment before his application of the said proceeds of sale to the payment of the junior judgments against said Mims, and it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in ruling otherwise.

2. "That the facts and circumstances, as established by the evidence, furnished reasonable proof that the defendant, Boles, before applying the said proceeds of sale to the junior judgment against Edward J. Mims, had actual notice of the said prior judgment of the relator, Lewis Jones, and it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in ruling to the contrary.

3. "That the evidence furnished at the least, presumptive proof that such notice was had by the defendant, Boles, and the determination of that fact ought therefore to have been referred to a jury.

4. "That the defendant, Boles, must be held to have had constructive notice of the aforesaid judgment at the suit of the relator, Jones, because the said judgment was duly recorded in the office of the clerk of said district, now county of Edgefield, and was duly entered in the book of abstract of judgments in said office.

5. "That constructive notice had by the defendant, Boles, of *the said judgment at the suit of Jones, prior to his, Boles', application of the proceeds of said sale to the aforesaid junior judgments, rendered him liable to the demand of the complaint in this action, and it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in ruling to the contrary.

6. "That it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in ruling that the notice required by the sixtieth section of the act of 1839, was requisite in the case of the relator, Jones, against Edward J. Mims, when the judgment had been rendered and entered in the clerk's office, and the execution to enforce its payment lodged in the sheriff's office of the district in which the land was sold."

The rule is well settled that if there is no evidence at all to sustain the plaintiff's case, the judge may order a non-suit; but if any such evidence is given, the case must go to the jury. Except the plea of the statute of limitations, the only issue of fact made by the answer, was, whether the defendant, Boles, was sheriff on December 4th, 1868, when the land of Edward J. Mims was sold. Upon this issue, there was proof tending to show that McDevitt did not take possession of the office until December 15th, and that the sale of December 4th was not only made, but the purchase-money received by him, as stated in the deed executed to the purchaser. There was no lack of evidence upon the only point made by the pleadings.

But the judge granted it on another ground, viz., that it was not shown that Boles, the sheriff, had actual notice in accordance with the terms of section 60 of the sheriffs' act of 1839 (11 Stat. 38): "The sheriff shall pay over the proceeds of any real estate sold by him to any judgment having a prior lien thereon, which may have been entered in the clerk's office of any district, whether an execution on such judgment may have been lodged in his office or not; provided, notice of such judgment be given to the sheriff before such proceeds shall have been otherwise paid," &c.

The judgments referred to in this section providing for special notice to the sheriff, it seems to us, must be understood as meaning judgments upon which no executions have been issued and lodged in the sheriff's office, including, especially, those rendered

*in some other judicial district than that in which the sheriff's sale is made. In such cases the sheriff, having no record in his office, it is manifestly proper that he should have actual notice brought home to him. But in this case the execution was lodged in Boles' office and entered in full upon the sheriff's books: "Lewis Jones, bearer, v. John Lyon, John Leigh, Samuel F. Goode and Edward J. Mims." This was actual notice, or, at least, such notice as to put him upon the inquiry. The sheriff is bound to take notice of all records in his office.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

18 S. C. 538

STATE, ex relatione HAGOOD, v. THOMPSON.

[1. Taxation ⇨847.]

Before real estate can become forfeited to the State under our statutes, the following facts must concur: first, the land must appear properly upon the tax duplicate assessed; second, there must be a failure to pay the taxes; third, the land must be exposed to sale under the regulations prescribed for the sale of delinquent lands; and, fourth, there must be a failure to sell for the want of bidders.

Under the assessment act of 1878 (16 Stat. 777), the board of assessors are required to assess the value of all real estate, "and certify their assessment back to the said auditor to be entered upon his duplicate." Held, that this required the board to certify in writing, and parol evidence by a clerk to the board, that he had made entry of the assessment by their direction upon the taxpayer's return was properly excluded, it not being the best evidence of their action.

The auditor's deed for delinquent land is prima facie evidence of good title under the express terms of section 116 of the act of 1874 (15 Stat. 772), but there being no such provision in the next succeeding section relating to forfeited lands, the court cannot supply it, and in such case the State must prove its title.

Before Wallace, J., Richland, April, 1882.

Action by the State at the relation of Johnson Hagood as governor, and others constituting the commissioners of the sinking fund, against Ann F. Thompson. The opinion states the case.

*Mr. J. D. Pope, for appellant.

Mr. Wm. H. Lyles, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was brought by the plaintiffs, appellants, to recover a tract of land which, as commissioners of the sinking fund, they alleged they were entitled to take possession of, because forfeited to the State for non-payment of taxes, having thereby become assets of the State in charge of said sinking fund under the provisions of the act of December 23d, 1879, the second section of which transferred all such lands to said sinking fund commissioners.

Before real estate can become forfeited to the State under our statutes, the following facts must concur: first, the land must appear properly upon the tax duplicate assessed; second, there must be a failure to pay the taxes; third, the land must be exposed to sale under the regulations prescribed for the sale of delinquent lands; and, fourth, there must be a failure to sell for the want of bidders. The first link in the chain is the assessment preliminary to being placed upon the tax duplicate by the auditor. This is regulated by act of assembly, approved December 29th, 1878, entitled "An act to further provide for the assessment of real estate for the purposes of taxation." 16 Stat. 777.

That act provides that the county auditors in the several counties shall, before the time fixed for the assessment of property, appoint for each township a board of assessors consisting of three intelligent freeholders, who, after organizing by the election of a chairman and taking the necessary oaths, shall constitute a board of assessors for the purpose of assessing the value of real estate in their township for the purposes of taxation. The third section of this act provides: "That before entering the value of any real estate upon his duplicate, the county auditor shall submit a description of the same to the board of assessors appointed as aforesaid, * * * and the said board shall thereupon, without delay, assess the value of the same, and certify their *assessment back to the said auditor to be entered upon his duplicate."

The main question in this case arises under this act. The plaintiffs, without producing a certificate from the board of assessors that the property in question had been assessed by them, and by the authority of which the auditor had placed the land upon his tax duplicate, proposed to prove by Joseph Muller that he acted as clerk of the board of assessors, that the board of assessors assembled in the auditor's office in 1879, that the description of the property of the defendant was put before this board in the shape of an original return taken by the auditor, with the column for valuation left blank, that the valuation was then entered therein by the witness, in his handwriting, but by the direction of the assessors; and that the paper so filled up by the witness was turned over to the auditor, who filed the same away, transferring the value so assessed to the duplicate lists. This testimony was objected to by defendant upon the ground that the valuation could be fixed alone by the board of assessors, and that the action of the board could not be proved by parol. The presiding judge sustained the objection and ruled the testimony inadmissible.

It was then urged by the plaintiffs that as, under the 116th section of the tax act of March, 1874, the deed of the county auditor for any real estate sold at delinquent land sale shall be prima facie evidence of a good title, so under the 117th section of the same act, where the land became forfeited to the State, the forfeiture carried with it a prima facie title to the State. As to this, the presiding judge held that as the words prima facie, which were found in section 116, as to the deed of the auditor for delinquent lands sold by him, did not appear in section 117 where forfeiture to the State took place, he could not supply them by construction. He therefore overruled the position of the plaintiffs, holding that the onus probandi rested with the State to establish a good title.

The plaintiffs, therefore, determined to take a non-suit, with leave to set the same aside if so advised, which was ordered on motion of plaintiffs' attorneys. The plaintiffs then appealed *upon two grounds. First, "Because his Honor erred in holding that the assessment of defendant's property for taxation could only be proved by a written certificate signed by the assessors to comply with the provisions of the act of December 24th, 1878." Second, "Because his Honor erred in holding that while under the one hundred and sixteenth section of the act of 1874, the auditor's deed to the purchaser of real estate purchased at a delinquent land sale, shall be prima facie evidence of good title to the grantee, the same rule would not apply under the one hundred and seventeenth section of the same act, where the title passed to the State for the want of bidders at such sale."

We concur with the presiding judge, that the testimony of Muller was inadmissible. The act of 1878, supra, expressly provides that the assessment for taxation shall be made by the board of assessors, and that this board shall certify their assessment back to the auditor to be entered upon his duplicate. It not only directs the assessment to be made, but it specifies the mode by which that assessment is to be authenticated, upon which authentication the assessment is to be placed upon the tax duplicate, to wit, the certificate of the board. It was necessary, therefore, in this case for the plaintiffs to prove, as the first link in their chain of title, that the land in dispute had gone upon the tax duplicate in accordance with the regulations prescribed by the act. This they attempted to do by the introduction of Muller.

It is a general rule of evidence that the best evidence of which the fact in issue is susceptible must be offered to prove it. In the unavoidable absence of this, secondary evidence may be resorted to. The question here was, Had the board of assessors made and certified an assessment upon the real estate of the defendant so as to authorize the county auditor to place it upon the duplicate for taxation? Muller did not propose to prove that the board of assessors had certified their assessment back to the auditor as required by the act, but simply that he, as their clerk, had entered a valuation upon the original return, which paper had been handed to the auditor and by him filed away.

certificate of the *board a part of its duty in the assessment as authority for the auditor to enter the valuation upon his duplicate, the fact of that certificate was a necessary fact in the case, and under the general rule requiring the best evidence of which it was susceptible, the certificate itself should have been produced, or, if lost or destroyed, then secondary evidence of its existence and contents would have been admissible. As has already been said, the witness Muller was not offered to prove an assessment of the board authenticated by its certificate, or the contents of such certificate as a lost paper, but he was offered as an eye-witness to the proceeding of the board to prove its action. This, we think with the presiding judge, was incompetent. The board under the act is an organized body consisting of three members with a chairman. They are required by the terms of the act under which they are constituted to certify their assessments, and the best evidence of their action in this respect is their certificate made in some form in writing attesting their action as an organized body. Dent v. Bryce, 16 S. C. 1; People v. S. F. Union, 31 Cal. 132; Blackw. Tax T. 113. The testimony offered was foreign to this point. It was an effort to prove an assessment in a mode different from that prescribed by the act, and was properly excluded.

As to the second point, we also concur with the presiding judge. The General Assembly in its wisdom saw proper to make the deed of the auditor prima facie evidence of title as to delinquent lands sold by him in express terms as found in the one hundred and sixteenth section of the act of 1874. They also saw proper to leave those words out in the one hundred and seventeenth section, where the land was forfeited to the State for the want of bidders. We have the power to construe and interpret doubtful and analogous phrases or words in an instrument brought before us, so as to reach its true intent and meaning, but we have no power to interpolate or insert words not used; especially should we be restrained in a case like this, where the words in question are expressly incorporated in the one section and left out in the other. We must suppose that the legislature intended, for some good and sufficient reason, that the purchasers at delinquent land sales should stand prima facie *upon the deed of the auditor, while in the case of the stringent doctrine of forfeiture it was the intention that the State should be required to make out its case.

It is the judgment of this court that the order below be affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., March, 1882.

Action commenced February 5th, 1881. The opinion states the case.

Mr. S. P. Hamilton, for appellant.

Mr. T. C. Gaston, contra.

*Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This was an action on three notes executed by Stenhouse, Macaulay & Co., merchants doing business in Charlotte, N. C. The first was executed on July 28th, 1876, to the plaintiffs and payable at Merchants and Farmers National Bank, Charlotte, eighteen months after date. The second was dated October 24th, 1877, executed by the same parties and payable at the same bank, and the third bore date October 25th, 1877, executed by same parties and payable at same bank. All three of the notes were endorsed by the defendant by simply placing his name, "D. Macaulay," on the back of each. Each note also had the following endorsement by the plaintiffs: "Pay to J. H. McAden, president, or order. Sawyer, Wallace & Co." This endorsement, at the trial, had on each been canceled by pen marks drawn through them; also on each was found at the trial, "Pay Patterson & Gaston, or order, for collection. Sawyer, Wallace & Co." Patterson & Gaston were the attorneys who brought the action in the name of the plaintiffs.

At the close of plaintiffs' testimony, the defendant moved for a non-suit on the ground that, it appearing that the notes had been endorsed to Patterson & Gaston, the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue. The judge refused this motion, holding that plaintiffs having alleged ownership in their complaint, and this not being denied in the answer, the ownership must be taken as admitted. The verdict was for the plaintiffs, the amount of the notes, to wit, $1,720.62.

The defendant is now before this court upon six exceptions, four of which assign error in the refusal of the judge to charge certain propositions; the fifth, because his Honor did not allow J. E. Stenhouse, one of the firm, to testify as to the character and business of buying and selling futures and the custom of trade in connection with such transactions generally, and the sixth, because his Honor erred in not deciding that the note for $645.10 (the first note mentioned), being barred in North Carolina before the commencement of this action, the plaintiffs could not recover; and, also, in arrest of judgment, because the three notes being endorsed by Sawyer, Wallace & Co., the plaintiffs, *to Patterson & Gaston, for collection, the plaintiffs could not maintain an action in their own names as owners and holders.

As to the first four and sixth exceptions, which involve errors of omission to charge, we do not find anywhere in the "Case" or "Brief" that the questions there raised were brought to the attention of the judge by request to charge. This, under our decisions, was absolutely necessary so as to permit this court to consider them, and especially does it become the duty of the court to deny consideration when the objection is interposed by the respondent claiming his legal rights. In Madsden v. Phoenix Fire Ins. Co., 1 S. C.

29. Mr. Justice Willard said: "The third ground of appeal is insufficient so far as it is based upon the failure of the judge to charge certain propositions therein set forth for want of a request to charge, as was the case in reference to the second ground. If counsel desire to bring any view of the law of a case to the attention of the jury, they must make such view the subject of a request to charge, and, failing in this, they cannot allege error. The maintenance of this rule is essential to a correct and careful administration of justice when the appellate court is limited to a consideration of exceptions on points of law, and cannot look into the whole case to see that substantial justice has been done between the parties."

In Abrahams v. Kelly and Barrett, 2 S. C. 238, the same justice, speaking for the court, said: "It does not appear that the second proposition was brought to the notice of the Circuit judge at the trial. It was not touched upon in the charge, nor was there any request to charge made in respect to it. The presiding judge is not bound to submit any particular proposition of law unless his attention is called to it and a request made to that effect. However important to the case such a proposition may be, error cannot be alleged unless, after request, he has refused to submit it. Nor is a misstatement of the law error unless his attention is called to it and he neglects or refuses to correct it. It is the office of exceptions to bring before this court only such matters of law as were the subject of contest upon the trial."

held that a failure *to charge a particular proposition of law could not be assigned as error unless the judge on request declines so to charge, and the court said, when such an objection is insisted upon on behalf of the respondent, the court must necessarily regard it.

The same principle was held and enforced in the late case of Sullivan v. Jones, 14 S. C. 365, where Mr. Justice McIver said: "All of these grounds except the first, second and third complain of omission to charge upon points which, so far as the 'Case' discloses, were not brought to the attention of the judge during the trial, either by request to charge or otherwise, and therefore are not properly before us."

Neither do we find anything in the "Case" to sustain the fifth exception. If the presiding judge limited or curtailed J. E. Stenhouse "in his testimony as to the character and business of buying and selling futures, or the custom of trade in connection with such transactions generally," the "Case" submitted fails to show it and it is not admitted by respondent. In fact it is denied in respondent's argument. The only statement we have is found in the exception raising the question. This the court cannot regard.

The "Case" is the source of our information as to what occurred below; its very object is to inform the court authoritatively of the legal questions contested below, and of the facts pertaining thereto. This court has held that as to these matters it confines itself to the "Case." Sheriff v. Welborn, 14 S. C. 480. And it cannot consider statements in exceptions not found in the "Case." The defects in an appeal herein are fatal, especially where the respondent not only fails to admit the statements in exceptions, but denies their existence and demands the legal consequences applicable.

The court, however, could not but regret that an appeal should terminate in this way if there was merit therein which, if otherwise presented and in accordance with the rules in such cases, might have been successful. We have therefore, ex gratia, considered the exceptions so far as to be satisfied that no injustice will be done, or the rights of parties lost or defeated by enforcing the principles which the cases cited require.

The first two exceptions complain that the presiding judge failed to charge that under the law of North Carolina, where *the notes were executed, D. Macaulay, the defendant, and Sawyer, Wallace & Co. were joint sureties by virtue of the endorsements made respectively on said notes, and therefore no action could be sustained by the plaintiffs against defendant, except for his aliquot portion of the amount paid by plaintiffs. The statute of North Carolina referred to, provides that "whenever any bill or negotiable bond or promissory note shall be endorsed, such endorsement, unless it shall be otherwise plainly expressed therein, shall render the endorser liable as surety to any holder of such bill, bond or promissory note, and no demand on the maker shall be necessary previous to an action against the endorser; provided, that nothing herein shall in any respect apply to bills of exchange, inland or foreign." The character of the endorsements by these parties has already been stated. The endorsement of the defendant was his name on the back without more; that of the plaintiffs was a direction to pay the president of the bank at which the notes were made payable, which was afterwards canceled.

While no doubt the act above referred to made the defendant a surety to the makers, dispensing with notice of demand, we do not think it had this effect upon the plaintiffs. The character of their endorsement excludes this idea, and, in the language of the act, "otherwise plainly expresses" its purpose. The notes were payable at the bank of which McAden was president, and the object of the plaintiffs' endorsement was to enable Mr. McAden to collect them. There was no evidence that they were discounted by the bank, or that the ownership was ever changed. It would have been error therefore for the judge to have charged as suggested.

The third exception assigns error, "because his Honor refused to charge that if the jury believes the cause of the losses which are the consideration of the notes, arose directly or indirectly from the transactions in futures, such transactions are illegal and the plaintiffs cannot recover, and that he did charge that contracts in futures, so called, may be legitimate." Even upon the assumption that contracts in what are known in commercial circles as "futures" are illegal, as gambling transactions or against public policy, or violative of the North Carolina act of *1788, yet the judge could not have legally charged in the broad terms indicated in this exception, that if the notes arose "directly or indirectly," &c. This would cover any and all connection, the most immediate as well as the most remote, the guilty as well as the innocent. This would have been too sweeping.

As to the latter part of this exception, "that the judge did charge, that contracts in futures, so called, may be legitimate," we do not know in what connection this was said. The charge of the judge is not set out in the case, either in whole or in part, and in the absence of explanation or connection, and all information as to its application, it would be unjust to the Circuit judge for this court to attempt to pass upon a detached fragment of his charge like this. Besides, the necessary information is not before us. We do not intend, however, to intimate that contracts based on the sale or purchase of futures, would be legal. But we do not think that this distinct question has been sufficiently raised in this case to authorize us to consider it, and therefore it has not been adjudged.

The fourth exception involves a question of fact, to wit, the force and effect of testimony, which was a matter for the jury and not the judge.

As to the fifth, as has been stated, we are not informed of the precise ruling of the judge upon this subject; nor does the "Case" show what connection a general history "of the character and business of buying and selling futures, and the custom of trade in connection with such transactions," had with the case at bar. The object of testimony is to evolve facts pertinent to the issue in contest, and within the knowledge of the witness as applicable thereto. How far the general business of buying futures was involved in this case, we can not tell, and, if involved, whether Mr. Stenhouse was a sufficient expert to be authorized to speak generally upon the subject, we are not informed. We must leave this exception, therefore, as we find it. Any special fact bearing on the case and within the knowledge of Mr. Stenhouse, he was competent to prove, but testimony by him on the subject of futures and the usage and custom of trade therein "generally," it appears to us would have been irrelevant.

*Sixth. "Because his Honor erred in not deciding that the note for $645.10, being barred in the statutes of North Carolina before the commencement of this action, the plaintiffs could not recover on the third cause of action." Even if the proposition of law contained in this exception was correct, yet the judge before charging it was required to assume that the facts upon which it rested had been proved. This he could not do, as the facts are alone for the jury. But is the proposition a sound one? In Levy v. Boas, 2 Bail. 217 [23 Am. Dec. 134], the court held generally, that the limitation of actions is of the lex fori, not of the lex loci contractus, and in that case where the debt had not been barred in Pennsylvania, the place of the contract, yet in this State where the period of limitation was shorter, that period having elapsed, it was held barred. We can see no reason, where the facts are reversed, why the same rule should not prevail. The underlying principle is that the lex fori shall govern as to the remedy and its enforcement, and if in either case the lex fori is invoked, the same principle should control.

If the statute paid or destroyed the debt, then when once barred in any State, it would be gone forever and in all places; but this is not the theory of the statute of limitations. It does not pay the debt; it only suspends the remedy. This may take place in one State, while in another the active energy of the remedy may not be impaired in the least. The case of Morton & Co. v. Naylor, 1 Hill 439, does not touch the question. There the point was as to the effect of a judgment in another State, whether it could be regarded in this State as a debt of record, and, like judgments here, not subject to the plea of the statute. The court held that it would rank here in that respect as in the State where obtained, and if the statute could not be pleaded there it could not here.

Mr. Angell on Limitations, page 69, section 65, says: "Equally well settled is the doctrine that remedies on contracts are to be regarded and pursued according to the law of the place where the action is instituted, and not by the law of the place where the contract is made." He states further that upon the question being made before

Lord Ellenborough, in Williams v. Jones, 13 East, 439, that learned jurist said: "It is said that parties who have contracted abroad return to this country with the same rights only which they had in the country where they are contracted, and, generally speaking, that is so—that is, if the rights of the contracting parties be extinguished by the foreign law by the happening of certain events. But here there is only an extinction of the remedy in the foreign court according to the law stated to be received there, but no extinction of the right: and there is no law or authority that where there is an extinction of the remedy only in the foreign court, that shall operate by comity as an extinction of the remedy here also. If it go to the extinction of the right itself, the case may be different."

Mr. Justice Story, in Leroy v. Crowninshield, 2 Mason 151 [Fed. Cas. No. 8,269], stated the inclination of his mind to be the other way, on the supposition that where the debt was barred by the lex loci, this amounted to a virtual extinction of the right in that place, which ought to be recognized in every other tribunal as of equal validity; but this learned judge admitted that the current of authority was too strong against him to be resisted. In Townsend v. Jemison, 9 How. 407 [13 L. Ed. 194], found cited in a note to Angell, page 76, the question underwent thorough examination, with the inclination of Judge Story's mind above referred to before the court, and pressed upon it, the direct question being, whether the cause of action having accrued in Mississippi and been completely barred there, the bar of the Mississippi statute might not be pleaded in a court of Louisiana. The court said: "The rule in the courts of the United States in respect to pleas of the statute of limitations has always been that they strictly affect the remedy and not the merits." See, also, McElmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Pet. 312 [10 L. Ed. 177]. Under these authorities it would have been error for the Circuit judge to have charged as suggested in this exception.

As to the matter relied on in arrest of judgment, we are satisfied with the reasoning of the Circuit judge when he refused the motion of non-suit made on the same ground at the trial. The ownership of the note was a question of fact; this was alleged in the complaint to be in the plaintiffs and not de-denied in the answer; this, we think, was sufficient, and could not be overthrown by the qualified endorsement to the attorneys for collection.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

GILMORE v. ROBERTS.

[1. Trespass ¶20.]

Under the former system of pleadings, a party not in the actual occupation of land trespassed upon, but having title and in possession of a part of the same tract, or having made entry thereon, might maintain action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a trespasser in possession of the portion upon which the trespass was committed; and since the adoption of the code of procedure, a party having title to property may recover damages for a trespass upon it without regard to the possession.

[2. Appeal and Error ¶997.]

An order refusing a motion for non-suit not disturbed, there having been some evidence against defendant, and the jury having found for plaintiff.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4023, 4024; Dec. Dig. ¶997.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, July, 1882.

This was an action by E. D. Gilmore against Wm. T. Roberts and J. C. Shirar, commenced February 28th, 1882. The charge of the judge to the jury and the opinion of this court constitute a full statement of the case. The charge was as follows:

The plaintiff must recover either on his possession or on his title. If he is not in possession at the time of the alleged trespass, he must show a legal title to the land to enable him to recover. But if by metes and bounds he has possession of a large tract of land to which he has a legal title, and any one obtrudes upon a part of that tract, such obtruder is properly sued in this form of action. If the plaintiff here has a legal title to the whole tract of land with actual entry, he may maintain the action of trespass quare clausum fregit, as it was formerly called, against any one who obtrudes himself into the actual possession of a part of the land. The facts are for the jury. What do these facts prove? Have these defendants made themselves liable under the law as laid down? Has the plaintiff satisfied the jury that the land in dispute is a part of the larger tract to all of which he has legal title? That is the question to be solved. If the jury find for the plaintiff, he is entitled to some damages. If the jury believe that the plaintiff was not in possession, as explained by the law already cited, and had not a good legal title to the land in dispute as that law requires, their verdict must be for the defendants. Gilmore's title as a good legal title to the Mill tract is admitted. Is this a part of that tract?

Thereupon the jury rendered the following verdict: "We find for the plaintiff, and one dollar damages."

Mr. W. S. Monteith, for appellants.

Mr. Andrew Crawford, contra.

February 28th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action to recover damages for a trespass on the lands of the plaintiff. It was conceded that the plaintiff had the title to a tract of land known as the Patterson Mill tract, and the principal contest below seems to have been as to the true location of the lines of that tract, whether they embraced the land where the trespass was alleged to have been committed. The jury, under a charge from the Circuit judge, to which no exception was taken, found for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal upon three grounds, but as the third has been abandoned it need not be stated here. The remaining grounds of appeal are as follows: First, "Because his Honor erred when he refused to charge the jury at the request of the defendants, as follows: If the jury believe that Shirar, defendant, is in possession of the land in dispute, either himself, or by his tenant Mims, the plaintiff cannot recover in this form of action, and the verdict must be for the defendants. Second. Because his Honor erred in refusing the motion for nonsuit as to the defendant, William T. Roberts."

We do not think there was any error in refusing the request as submitted. While it may have been true formerly, when it *was necessary to preserve the distinctions between the different forms of action, that the action of trespass quare clausum fregit could not have been maintained against a defendant in possession of the land upon which the alleged trespass was committed where the plaintiff, though having title, was not in the actual occupation of the land and had not made entry thereon, yet it never was true that the simple fact that the defendant was in possession was sufficient to deprive the plaintiff, who had title, of his right to bring this form of action, because if he too had actual possession of a part of the tract his title would draw to it possession of the whole, and he could maintain the action, or if he had made entry thereon the same result would follow. Grimke v. Brandon, 1 N. & McC. 356; Amick v. Frazier, Dud. 341; Pearson v. Dansby, 2 Hill 466; McColman v. Wilkes, 3 Strob. 465 [51 Am. Dec. 637]; Cleveland v. Jones, 3 Strob. 479, note; Watson v. Hill, 1 Strob. 78.

The case of Vance v. Beatty, 4 Rich. 104, relied on by the appellants, does not conflict with these views, but on the contrary it expressly recognizes the authority of some of the cases above cited, and simply decides that where the plaintiff has title but has never had any actual possession, the constructive possession derived from his title is not sufficient to enable him to maintain the action of trespass quare clausum fregit against one who is in actual possession.

It would have been error, therefore, to have charged the jury in the unqualified form demanded by the defendants' request, especially where, as in this case, there was direct testimony that the plaintiff had been in the actual occupation of the land for many years, by his tenants, and had been in the continuous use of it, holding it adversely, as he said, ever since he bought it in 1860, until these defendants, in 1879, intruded themselves into the possession of a part of it. The Circuit judge seems to have been aware of the distinction indicated, for he framed his charge in conformity to it. So that even under the law as it stood prior to the adoption of the code of procedure, the request in its unqualified form was properly refused, for if the plaintiff was in the actual possession of a part of the land, having title to the whole, at the time the defendants intruded upon him, the *action could have been maintained, even under the former practice, although the defendants might have been in the actual possession of that portion where the trespasses were committed, at the time the action was commenced.

But since the distinction between the various forms of action has been abolished, it may well be questioned whether there would be any foundation for the proposition contained in the request to charge, even if qualified, as we have suggested. If a plaintiff has title to a piece of property, whether real or personal, and also shows that another has trespassed upon it, by any unlawful use of or interference with it, we see no reason why he should not now be permitted to recover damages for such trespass. The wrong done is to the property of the plaintiff, and whether that property is, at the time, in his possession, or has been seized upon by a trespasser, would seem to be a matter of small consequence, so far as the substantial rights of the parties are concerned. While, therefore, under the former system of pleading, there may have been good reason why the distinctions between the different forms of action should have been rigidly observed, and the action of trespass quare clausum fregit, which was designed to afford redress for damages to the possession, should have been confined to cases where his possession was intruded upon, we see no reason now for observing any such distinction, and, therefore, where a plaintiff shows that his legal rights have been invaded, he ought to be entitled to redress from the wrongdoer, in the only form of action which he is now permitted to bring. We do not see, therefore, how, in any view of the case, the first ground of appeal can be sustained.

As to the second ground of appeal, which complains of error in refusing the motion for a non-suit as to the defendant Roberts, we are at a loss to discover upon what ground the non-suit was claimed. None is stated in the "Case," and none is suggested in appellants' argument. If we are left to presume that it was because there was no evidence connecting Roberts with the alleged trespasses, we can only say, as was said by O'Neill, J., in Watson v. Hill, supra: "Whatever might have been the doubt before, after the jury have held that the evidence satisfied them that the defendant committed the trespass, there can surely *be no room to say that the judge below ought to have ordered a non-suit." But in addition to this the plaintiff distinctly testified to the trespasses by both of the defendants, for he said, in speaking of the land, "Shirar and Roberts trespassed upon it, as I have stated, in 1879," and this, of course, was sufficient to go to the jury.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[1. Costs ⇨243.]

On appeal from a Circuit decree overruling a demurrer, with costs to be paid out of certain proceeds of sale, this decree was reversed and the complaint dismissed. Held, that the direction for the payment of costs fell with the decree, although not mentioned in the exceptions nor in the opinion of this court.

[2. Costs ⇨4.]

Costs in equity causes, after the act of February 20th, 1880, (17 Stat. 303.) were governed by the former practice under rule 72 of the Circuit Courts, and, therefore, followed the event of the suit, if not otherwise ordered in the judgment.

[3. Costs ⇨13.]

Costs being in the discretion of the Circuit judge, his direction concerning them will not ordinarily be disturbed, and in this case is approved.

Before Cothran, J., Chester, April, 1882.

Action by John S. Bratton against B. H. Massey et al., commenced in August, 1879, heard by Kershaw, J., in June, 1880; an appeal from his decree was heard by this court, November term, 1880. See 15 S. C. 277. The opinion states the case.

The decree from which this appeal was taken, was as follows:

At common law, costs were not given either to plaintiffs or defendants. But as a matter of statutory regulation (and it is purely such), it is of great antiquity. For a time, beginning with 6 Edward I., costs were allowed only to plaintiffs succeeding, or "demandants," as the parties were styled in the statutes. *Afterwards by the Statute of Marlbridge, in the time of Henry III. they were allowed to the defendant prevailing;

*556

and so to this day. When one brings his action and succeeds, it is difficult to perceive upon what grounds of justice or equity the party sued and who is obviously in default, should be relieved from the payment to the prevailing party of the expenses of the suit, by what name soever such expenses should be denominated. Upon the other hand, and upon grounds of equal justice, the defendant (should the plaintiff's action fail) must be entitled to be repaid the expenses he has incurred in defending a wrongful claim. This seems to me to be the bed-rock, the very foundation-stone, of the just and rudimentary principle, that costs should follow the event of the suit.

I am not, however, so blindly devoted to this principle as to hold it to be of universal application. Like all general rules, it is not without exceptions. But in the case presented here, within the exceptions to the rule, it is as certain now as anything can be made, that a false claim was raised against the defendant, Massey (I do not mean this offensively), and that his land, descended from Mrs. Gilmore, was not liable to the debts of W. Taylor Gilmore, excepting that the plaintiff stands acquitted here of all imputations of bad faith. So far as the result is, he might as well have selected any other parcel of land in Chester county for the satisfaction of his debt.

It is contended, however, by the plaintiff's counsel (1) that the Circuit judge ordered the costs to be paid out of the proceeds of the land; (2) that from this portion of the decree there was no appeal; (3) that the Supreme Court left that portion of the Circuit decree untouched, and thereby affirmed so much of it as decreed costs against the defendants. Admitting the facts as stated, is this a legal sequence? I think not. It will be seen, by reference to the brief in the cause, that the defendant "appeals from the decree made," &c. What part of the decree? The answer would naturally be, from the whole decree. Certainly not from any particular part of it.

True, specific grounds of appeal are set out, bringing properly to the attention of the court of review the precise views which the appellant had of his case, and which he sought to impress *upon the minds of the justices, regarding the matter of costs as an incident of the Circuit judge's view of the case, and only as an incident, and as such, in my opinion, it has followed the case through its various stages. Abiding the final determination of the cause, the following authorities were cited by the defendants' counsel, which I think sustain his view of the case. Woodson v. Palmer, Bail. Eq. 96; Muse v. Peay, Dudley Eq. 236; Cleveland v. Cohrs, 13 S. C. 402; 3 Wait's Pr. 454.

It is necessary, however, in order to complete this decree, to pass upon certain other allowances of costs which appear in the itemized taxation made by the clerk; that is to say: J. & J. Hemphill, attorneys, $35; A. G. Brice, attorney, $30. These attorneys represented others of the defendants than B. H. Massey, and the items above were allowed to them, and charged upon the proceeds of the land, which it will be borne in mind was sold by consent of parties pending the litigation hereinbefore referred to.

Having determined that this fund is not liable for the costs in controversy, how shall they be paid? The plaintiff's proceeding in this cause was not for the benefit of all who would join him in the suit and contribute to the expenses thereof. The attorneys above named represented creditors of W. Taylor Gilmore, whose claims were assailed by the plaintiff, and his complaint having been dismissed, and the assault rendered thereby futile, I know of no rule, equitable or otherwise, that can relieve him from liability to them for these costs. It is true that the plaintiff brought them into court. He invited them to go upon the voyage, but not for the purpose of sharing with him the pleasure or the profit of the round trip; for he gave them to understand most distinctly, in paragraph VII, of his complaint, that he would throw them overboard, if he could. The bark which sailed forth under such auspicious circumstances has been wrecked, and, hard as it may be, the inevitable consequence must follow the event of the suit.

Wherefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed as follows:

I. That the itemized taxation of costs, as made by the clerk, be and the same is hereby affirmed.

II. That the decision of the clerk, that said costs be paid from the proceeds of the sale of the lands sold in accordance *with the decree of his Honor, J. B. Kershaw, be and the same is hereby reversed.

III. That the defendant B. H. Massey, and the defendants represented by Messrs. J. & J. Hemphill and A. G. Brice, have leave to enter up judgments for the several amounts of costs allowed to them in the clerk's taxation against the plaintiff, John S. Bratton, with leave to issue executions for the same.

IV. That the three last items, to wit: Printing notice of sale of land twice, $17.50; taxes on property sold, $25.00; Clerk Curtis, commissions on sales, $27.30; total, $69.80, and any other expenses incident to the said sales, if there be any, be deducted from the proceeds of the sale, according to the proportionate interest of B. H. Massey and his cotenant, Mobley, therein.

V. And that the costs of this appeal be taxed by the clerk of the court against the respondent, John S. Bratton, and that the several parties interested herein have leave to issue executions for the same.

Mr. Giles J. Patterson, for appellant.

Messrs. W. B. Wilson, R. E. Allison, J. & J. Hemphill, A. G. Brice, contra.

February 28th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The action in this case was brought by the plaintiff, as a creditor of one W. T. Gilmore, against the defendant, Massey, who claimed the land in question under a deed from said Gilmore, the other creditors of Gilmore and his heirs-at-law, for the purpose of subjecting certain real estate to the payment of the debts of Gilmore. The real contest was as to the true construction of the deed under which Massey claimed, and Judge Kershaw, who heard the case on its merits, held that the land was subject to the payment of Gilmore's debts and ordered it sold for that purpose, the costs of the case to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale. From this decree Massey appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed the decree of Judge *Kershaw and dismissed the complaint. Bratton v. Massey, 15 S. C. 277.

Subsequently the costs of the case were taxed by the clerk of the court, who held that they should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, which had been made by consent, pending the appeal. This decision of the clerk was excepted to by Massey, substantially upon the ground that the clerk erred in deciding that the costs should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, he contending that the costs should follow the event of the suit in the absence of any special provision to the contrary. Judge Cothran sustained the exceptions to the clerk's decision and adjudged that the defendant Massey, as well as certain of the creditors of Gilmore, whose claims were alleged by plaintiff to have been paid or otherwise discharged, and the defendant Annie McLure, an infant, the only one of the heirs-at-law of Gilmore who answered the complaint, were entitled to tax their costs against the plaintiff; that the costs and other expenses incident to the sale of the land should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, and that the costs of the appeal from the clerk's decision should be paid by the plaintiff.

From this judgment the plaintiff appeals upon various grounds which may be stated substantially as follows: First. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the decree of Judge Kershaw, so far as it related to costs, was reversed. Second. Because of error in holding that, in the absence of any special provision to the contrary, the costs followed the event of the suit. Third. Because costs were adjudged against the plaintiff in favor of some of the defendants who concurred in the prayer of the complaint. Fourth. Because, under all the circumstances of the case, the costs should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale.

It is quite clear that the first ground cannot be sustained. The appeal was not from any particular portion of Judge Kershaw's decree, but the appeal was from the decree—meaning, of course, the whole decree—and the judgment of the Supreme Court was "that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the complaint be dismissed." This, of course, operated as a reversal of the whole decree. It is very true that in the former appeal that portion of the Circuit decree relating to costs *was not specially attacked, but the provision as to costs was a mere incident to the judgment on the merits, and when that was ascertained to be erroneous and was reversed, and the complaint was dismissed, the provision as to costs was likewise reversed and fell with the judgment on the merits.

The judgment of the Supreme Court not having made any provision as to costs, they would necessarily be governed by the general rule upon the subject. The inquiry then is, What was the rule upon the subject at the time this case was determined? Prior to the adoption of the code of procedure the well settled rule was, that in cases of the class to which this belongs, in the absence of any special provision in the decree as to costs, they followed the event of the suit. Woodson v. Palmer, Bail. Eq. *95; Muse v. Peay, Dud. Eq. 236; Higginbottom v. Peyton, 4 Rich. Eq. 316; Brown v. Wood, 6 Id. 360. It is true that by section 332 of the code of procedure, as originally adopted, other provision was made as to costs, in cases like this, where the relief sought was such as, prior to the code, could only be obtained in a court of equity (Mars v. Conner, 9 S. C. 79), but that section of the code was repealed by the act of February 20th, 1880, (17 Stat. 303.) prior to the hearing of this case, and that act contains no provision upon the subject. Hence, at the time judgment was rendered in this case, there was no statute or rule of court prescribing which of the parties should pay costs in a case like this, and hence, under rule 71 (now known as rule 72) of the Circuit Court, "the practice, as it has heretofore existed in the courts of law and equity of this State," must govern. We do not see, therefore, how the second ground of appeal can be sustained.

As to the third ground, which questions the propriety of the decision of the Circuit judge as to the costs of certain of the defendants; and the fourth ground, which claims that, under all the circumstances of this case, the Circuit judge should have directed that the costs should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the land, it is sufficient to remark that, under the practice governing at the time this case was heard, costs in an equity case were in the discretion of the Circuit judge, and, therefore, the manner in which that discretion has been exercised is not *ordinarily a subject-matter of appeal. Singleton v. Allen, 2 Strobb. Eq. 174; Hext v. Walker, 5 Rich. Eq. 7; and we may add that we think, in this case, the Circuit judge has fully vindicated the propriety of his conclusions.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

It not appearing that the question presented by this appeal was ever brought to the attention of the Circuit Court, the well settled rule forbids its consideration by this court; but, under the circumstances of this case, the rule was relaxed and the point adjudicated.†

[This case is also cited in De Walt v. Kinard, 19 S. C. 286, 295, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Cothran, J., Lexington, September, 1881.

The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

This cause came on for trial before the court and a jury, at the fall term, 1881, of the court of Lexington county. By *agree-

†This rule was here relaxed, as stated in the syllabus, and in the case of Sawyer, Wallace & Co. v. Macaulay, ante p. 543, exceptions having no proper foundation in the Case submitted to this court, were considered ex gratia. But in both cases, the result reached was the same as if the technical rule had been applied. It is not probable that such exceptions would be considered, the appellee objecting, if they led the court to a reversal of the judgment below.

The principal case shows the necessity of having it to appear in the brief that points made on circuit and not alluded to in the decree of the Circuit judge, were so made. Where this is not shown by exceptions to a master's or referee's report, it can be accomplished by a simple statement to that effect.—REPORTER.

ment of parties, the question as to the amount of the penalty of the bond signed by defendant's intestate, John C. Hope, as surety of Levi Gunter, the administrator of Martin T. Leaphart, was alone submitted to the jury, upon which they were required to find a special verdict, all other questions being reserved for the judgment of the court. The jury having found that the penalty of the administration bond signed by defendant's intestate was $20,000, it devolved upon me to ascertain and fix the liability of the defendant's intestate as the surety of Levi Gunter.

The facts of the case, in so far as they are necessary for the proper understanding of this question, are as follows: Simon A. Leaphart, late of the county of Lexington, departed this life intestate some time during the year 1853, leaving as his only heir-at-law his widow, Mary Leaphart, and an only child, Polly Leaphart. Shortly thereafter his brother, Martin T. Leaphart, administered upon his estate, and reduced the same into his possession, reporting, on January 1st, 1854, a balance in hand of $4,894.50.

On April 24th, 1855, Mary Leaphart and Polly filed their bill in the Court of Equity for said county, against said Martin T. Leaphart, as administrator of Simon, praying an account of the estate of his intestate. The rights of the said Mary and Polly to claim, as heirs of Simon, were contested upon the ground of the illegality of the marriage of Mary with Simon, and the consequent illegitimacy of Polly.

Martin T. Leaphart died in the month of May, 1860, never having accounted; and thereafter Levi Gunter administered upon his estate, giving bond to the ordinary of Lexington county for the faithful discharge of his duty, with John C. Hope, defendant's intestate, as surety on said bond. Prior to his death, to wit, on April 9th, 1860, Martin made a deed of assignment to Gunter for the payment of his debts, under which Gunter sold the property of the said Martin, amounting to $15,164.57, out of which he paid Martin's debts, as directed in the assignment. Martin died before the sale. Gunter administered upon his estate, and sold the balance of his personal estate for about $150, and in his account with the ordinary, *as administrator, in January, 1861, showed a balance in hand of $11,125.

On March 28th, following, the said complainants filed their bill of revivor against Levi Gunter, as administrator of Martin T., with whom were joined, as defendants, George J. Leaphart, James E. Drafts and Sarah, his wife—the other heirs-at-law and next of kin of the said Martin T. By the several answers to this bill of revivor, like issues as to the legality of the marriage of Mary with Simon and the legitimacy of Polly, were raised, which had to be settled before an accounting could be had.

These questions being decided favorably to the complainants, (Leaphart v. Leaphart, 1 S. C. 199,) the other issues, both of law and fact, were, on January 5th, 1871, referred to Francis W. Fickling, Esq., who, on March 1st, 1871, reported in favor of the plaintiff Mary the sum of $4,047.68, and in favor of the plaintiff Polly the sum of $8,095.37, against the said Levi Gunter, being the amount due the estate of Simon by Gunter's intestate, Martin T., and in favor of the plaintiff Polly the further sum of $2,048.60, as one of the distributees of the said Martin T.

This report having been confirmed by the court, judgment was thereupon, on October 30th, 1873, entered up in favor of said complainants against the said Levi Gunter, and his entire estate advertised and sold by the sheriff of Lexington county. After applying the proceeds of such sale to the satisfaction of the judgment, there remained still due and unpaid by the said Levi Gunter the sum of $15,490.48. Mary Leaphart died intestate some time during the year 1872, and thereafter, to wit, on September 2d, 1872, Thomas L. Kaminer, one of the plaintiffs herein, administered upon her estate.

Upon the judgment of the court thus rendered against the said Levi Gunter, this action was instituted against the said John C. Hope (who was then living), one of the sureties upon Gunter's administration bond, for the balance due on said judgment. The cause was brought to a trial before the Honorable Thompson H. Cooke, one of the judges of this court, and a jury, at Lexington, in July, 1876, and upon a full submission of the cause to the jury the following verdict was rendered: "We find *that the penalty of the bond executed by Levi Gunter, as administrator of Martin T. Leaphart, with John C. Hope, the defendant herein, as surety, was for the sum of $20,000. We find that the amount now due by Levi Gunter, as administrator of Martin T. Leaphart, to the plaintiff by reason of his devastavit of the estate of said Martin T. Leaphart, and for which John C. Hope is liable in this action, is the sum of $15,498.48, with interest thereon from October 5th, 1874." A motion was thereupon made for a new trial, which having been refused, an appeal was prosecuted to the Supreme Court, the order of the Circuit Court reversed and a new trial granted. Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 253.

This cause is now to be considered in the light of that judgment; and it having been therein held "that the plaintiff could not recover in this action the amount due the estate of Simon A. Leaphart by the late Martin T. Leaphart, as administrator, in the absence of an administrator de bonis non of Simon's estate," the pleadings were amended by adding William J. Assman, who had been in the meantime appointed administrator de bonis non of Simon A. Leaphart, as one of the plaintiffs. John C. Hope having also in the meantime died, the pleadings were further amended by adding as a party defendant, James C. Hope, as the administrator of John C. Hope. As thus amended, the cause is again presented for trial.

The plaintiffs claim that the defendant's intestate is liable for the full amount of the judgment rendered against his principal, Levi Gunter, by the Court of Equity. The defendant sets up three defenses: First. He denies the execution of the bond set forth in the complaint. Second. He denies the liability of his intestate upon the administration bond for a devastavit committed by Martin of the estate of Simon, and avers that the sureties upon the administration bond of Martin are alone answerable for such devastavit. Third. He denies that the sum of $4,047.68 and $8,095.37 were found to be due respectively in favor of Mary Leaphart and Polly Leaphart against the said Levi Gunter as administrator of Martin T. Leaphart, and chargeable upon the administration bond of Levi Gunter as a devastavit of the estate of the said Martin T. Leaphart.

*The first defense has been settled by the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiffs. The remaining defenses involve the questions reserved for the court, which I shall now proceed to consider:

It is urged by the defendants that as to the devastavit of Martin T. Leaphart, these plaintiffs should proceed against the sureties upon his official bond. True, they may elect so to do; but why, when it appears that he (Martin) left an estate ample for the payment of debts, which passed into the hands of his administrator, Gunter? The demands of the plaintiffs against Gunter is for the payment of a debt due by Martin to the estate of his intestate, Simon. I say a debt due the estate of Simon upon the death of Martin—for any sum which he was in arrears to Simon's estate was a debt due by the former to the latter. Davis v. Wright, 2 Hill 567; Gill v. Douglass, 2 Bail. 387.

Gunter admits assets, but in the proceedings before the Court of Equity fails to account for them. I am, therefore, unable to see upon what principle his surety can avoid responding to his default, according to the condition of his bond. The liability of the surety is to make good the injury which may be sustained in consequence of the misconduct of the principal. Ordinary v. Shelton, 3 McC. 417; Davis v. Wright, 2 Hill 567; Wiley v. Johnsey, 6 Rich. 358; Ordinary v. Mortimer, 4 Rich. 275.

These authorities furnish an ample exposition of both the responsibility and the liability of the surety. Martin having converted the entire estate of Simon, the only right which remained to the administrator de bonis non was to demand of the personal representative of Martin an account, and ask judgment for such balance as may be ascertained to be due by the latter to the estate of his intestate. Villard v. Robert, 1 Strobb. Eq. 402.

Such accounting being had and balance ascertained against the administrator, it is the well recognized practice for the administrator de bonis non, upon the decree of the ordinary or Court of Equity, to sue the administrator of the former administrator upon his bond in an action at law, and, when necessary, to join in the action the sureties upon his bond.

Governed by the rule laid down in Ordinary v. Carlile, 1 *566

*McC. 100, the defendant's intestate can be discharged only by showing that his principal, Levi Gunter, received no assets which were liable for the payment of the devastavit committed of the estate of Simon A. Leaphart, or by otherwise pointing out in what particular it would be improper to charge him in this action with the entire amount of the judgment against Gunter in the former suit. Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 257. This he has not done, though full opportunity was allowed. This, in fact, he could not do, since it appears from the returns of Gunter before the ordinary in January, 1861, that there remained in his hands, after the payment of all the debts of Martin T. Leaphart, an amount largely in excess of that due the estate of the said Simon A. This Gunter should have applied in payment of the claim of Martin's intestate, or, pending the litigation, he should have paid the fund into court or otherwise invoked the aid of the court, and sought the appointment of some one to whom he would be authorized to pay the same. He, however, saw fit to join in the controversy raised by the Leaphart family, who were all in antagonism to plaintiffs, and to assume the risk, pending the litigation, of holding and controlling the fund. That it has been lost is the result of his own voluntary act, and the obligation to secure parties in interest against just such risk the sureties assumed by the very condition of his bond.

But suppose, as is urged by the defendant, that the plaintiffs be required in the first instance to proceed against the sureties of Martin. Would they not, having been required to respond to Martin's default, have the right to proceed against Martin's estate, in the hands of Gunter, his administrator, and to hold him and his sureties for the default of Martin by them paid? This being true, why insist upon such diversity of action? The sureties of Martin would be subrogated to any right of the creditor of Martin whose claim they had been required to pay. Hampton v. Levy, 1 McCord Eq. 116; Lowndes v. Chisolm, 2 Id. 455 [16 Am. Dec. 667]; Perkins v. Kershaw, 1 Hill Eq. 344; Rhame v. Lewis, 13 Rich. Eq. 330, 332.

It is further urged by the defendant that he can, under no circumstances, be held for a greater sum than that found by the referee in favor of the plaintiff Polly, against Levi Gunter, as administratrix of Martin T.; and he denies that the sums of $4,047.68 and $8,095.37 were found to be due respectively in favor of Mary Leaphart and Polly Leaphart against the said Levi Gunter, as administrator of Martin T. Leaphart, and chargeable upon the administration bond of the said Levi Gunter as a devastavit of the estate of said Martin T.

This defense is bottomed upon the judgment of the referee, which is as follows: "I therefore find for the plaintiff Mary, the sum of $4,047.68, and for the plaintiff Polly, the sum of $8,095.37, against the defendant, Levi Gunter, on account of the estate of Simon A. Leaphart; and for the plaintiff Polly, the sum of $2,048.60, against the defendant, Levi Gunter, as administrator of the estate of Martin T. Leaphart." The argument of the defendant is that in respect to these two amounts the judgment is against Gunter personally—not against him as administrator of Martin, and, therefore, his surety cannot be held liable.

It must be observed that the manner in which the referee has stated the account was a necessary consequence of the separate interests of the plaintiffs, Mary and Polly, and should not be construed as indicating a liability of Gunter in different capacities. The bill was wide in its scope, seeking in the outset an account alone of the estate of Simon A. in the hands of Martin T., his administrator. Upon the death of Martin T., pending the suit, the bill had to be revived against Gunter, his administrator, and thenceforward involving the additional interest of Polly as one of the distributees of Martin.

The referee adopted a convenient and proper mode of expressing the separate interest of each of the plaintiffs; but I cannot see that it operates to charge Gunter in any other capacity than as administrator of Martin. The proceeding throughout, so far as it operated against him, was in his representative capacity, and a judgment could only be rendered against him as such, except, however, that as for any devastavit adjudged against him satisfaction may be ordered out of his individual estate. The amounts adjudged, as appears by the referee's report, in favor of Mary and Polly, respectively, were due by Martin to the estate of Simon, his intestate, and assets sufficient for the payment of same having come into the hands of Gunter, he and his sureties are liable therefor.

But, further, in support of the view I feel constrained to take of the defenses now under consideration, I regard the judgment of the Supreme Court heretofore rendered in this case (9 S. C. 253) conclusive of the proposition. The defenses herein set up were all before the court in the former trial and before the Supreme Court upon the appeal. After deciding that the refusal on the part of the Circuit judge to charge upon certain propositions of law as requested by the defendant was sufficient ground for a new trial, Kershaw, acting Associate Justice, speaking for the court, says: "Other questions are made by the appeal which it will be proper to settle in order that the new trial may be conducted in the light of a decision of the points of law involved."

The very questions now under discussion were then considered, and in holding that the judgment against Gunter could only be prima facie evidence against his surety, the court say: "The appellant has, therefore, a right to look into the decree and point out in what particulars it would be improper to charge him in this action with the entire amount of judgment against Gunter in the former suit. Of that amount the sum of $12,143.05 was for a liability of Gunter to the estate of Simon A. Leaphart. This arose from the sale and conversion of assets of the estate of Simon, which were in the hands of Martin as administrator, and by him assigned to Gunter, together with the bulk of his own estate, upon a trust to pay certain debts of the assignor from the proceeds. The decree against Gunter was for the residue of the fund left after performing the trust. This residuum, it is here claimed, was an asset in the hands of Gunter, as administrator of Martin, to be accounted for by him in that capacity. He himself so treated it in his accounts. The plaintiffs, also, have so treated the funds, and thereby ratified, so far as they are concerned, the conversion by Martin of Simon's assets. The fund derived from such conversion is, therefore, for the purposes of this decision, to be treated as vested in Martin's estate and to be accounted for by his administrator."

*To whom, then, assuming this view of the argument as most favorable to the plaintiffs, is he, Gunter, to account for the fund? Evidently to the creditors of his intestate in the first instance, and afterwards to his distributees. Of the amount decreed against Gunter, $12,143.05 was due the estate of Simon A. Leaphart, for devastavit of Martin as administrator. Can this fund be recovered of the defendant in this case by the distributees of Simon A. Leaphart without an administration of the estate of Simon? Simply stated, the question is whether distributees can sue for and recover debts due their intestate's estate. Put in this form the affirmative would hardly be contended for. "It follows that the plaintiffs cannot recover in this action the amount due the estate of Simon A. Leaphart by the late Martin T. Leaphart, as administrator, in the absence of an administrator de bonis non of Simon's estate." 9 S. C. 257, 259.

Undoubtedly this amount was regarded by the court as a debt due by Martin to the estate of his intestate, for which Gunter, his administrator, was liable to account to the proper representative of Simon's estate. This party is now properly before the court, in the person of William J. Assman, as administrator de bonis non of Simon A. Leaphart, and I fail to see in the several grounds urged by the defendant anything to relieve his intestate from the liability of his principal.

The defendant further sets up the plea of "plene administravit præter," and files with his answer certified copies of the inventory and appraisement, and also of his return before the Probate Court for the year ending December 31st, 1880, by which it appears that the defendant possessed assets of his intestate to be administered, amounting only to the sum of $961.06. No effort was made on the part of the plaintiffs to impeach these returns, nor to charge the defendant with more. This admission must, therefore, be taken as true, and the defendant can only be chargeable with the amount thus admitted, unless other assets of the intestate shall hereafter come into his hands to be administered as suggested in his answer.

There is no conflict between the plaintiffs in respect to their respective interest in the amounts sued for; but, in view of the judgment of the Supreme Court, I deem it proper to settle by *the judgment now to be delivered these respective claims for the protection of the administrator de bonis non. In the course of the argument, the defendant, while urging the proposition that he could not be held liable for the amounts adjudged by the referee against Gunter on account of Simon's estate, contended that the amounts heretofore collected from Gunter should be credited wholly upon the recovery in behalf of Polly, as one of the distributees of Martin. In the view I have taken of the liability of the defendant's intestate as the surety of Gunter, it is a matter of no consequence to him in what manner this application is made; and while to the plaintiffs it is also a matter of minor importance, I adopt the ratable application of such collections as the most proper.

It is therefore adjudged that the plaintiff William J. Assman, as administrator de bonis non of Simon A. Leaphart, recover against the defendant, as administrator of John C. Hope, deceased, the sum of $13,277.56, with interest from October 5th, 1874; and the plaintiff Polly Leaphart recover against the said defendant, as administrator as aforesaid, the sum of $2,212.92, with interest from October 5th, 1874; said debts, interests and costs to be levied of the goods and chattels which were of the said John C. Hope at the time of his death, in the hands of the said James C. Hope as administrator as aforesaid to be administered, and which may hereafter come into the hands of the said administrator to be administered, and of the lands, tenements and hereditaments which were of the said John C. Hope at the time of his death.

From this decree the defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because it is respectfully submitted that the learned judge in his able opinion erred in the said judgment in this: That he has entirely overlooked the important point, earnestly pressed upon the court, that by the proceedings in equity (to which John C. Hope was not a party) referred to Francis W. Fickling as referee, and introduced as evidence in this case to show the amount of the liability of Levi Gunter as principal, and thereby to fix the liability of John C. Hope as surety, it appeared that *the accounting was had at the suit of the administratrix pendente lite of Simon A. Leaphart, and not at the suit of an administrator de bonis non.

*571

2. Because, this being true, until there was an accounting by the principal at the suit of an administrator de bonis non, there was no breach of the condition of the administration bond legally ascertained, and no verdict could be legally rendered and no judgment could be legally predicated on such verdict.

3. Because, this being a correct conclusion of law, the Circuit judge erred in ordering judgment in any amount whatever, under any finding as to the penalty of the bond, before the breach of the condition had been legally ascertained in the suit against the principal, and, a fortiori, in a suit against the surety.

Mr. J. D. Pope, for appellant, cited 1 Strobb. Eq. 402, 414; 2 Bail. 373, 387; 1 Rich. Eq. 123; Rice 350; 16 S. C. 432.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The facts of this case are so fully and clearly stated in the Circuit decree, that it is not necessary for us to do more than to make such a brief statement as will be necessary to indicate the single point raised by this appeal, especially as the case, in different forms, has been before this court on two former occasions when it was reported—first, under the title of Leaphart v. Leaphart, 1 S. C. 199, and, next, under the title of Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 253, where a full history of the litigation between these parties may be found.

The present action was brought against John C. Hope, as surety upon the bond of Levi Gunter, administrator of Martin T. Leaphart, and, upon his death, continued against the present defendant as his administrator, to recover the amount found due by Gunter as such administrator, as well to the estate of Simon A. Leaphart, of whom his intestate, Martin T., was administrator, as to the plaintiff, Polly Leaphart, as one of the distributees of said Martin T. The proceeding under which these amounts were found due by Gunter, as administrator of Martin T.

Leaphart, was a bill in equity originally filed by Mary Leaphart and Polly Leaphart, claiming to be distributees of Simon A. Leaphart, against Martin T. Leaphart as his administrator. Upon the death of Martin T., Levi Gunter was appointed administrator of his estate, and a contest arising as to who was entitled to administration upon so much of the estate of Simon A. as was left unadministered by Martin T., letters of administration pendente lite were granted to Mary Leaphart. A bill of revivor was then filed, making Gunter, as administrator of Martin T., and the heirs-at-law of Martin, parties, and under this bill the account was taken which forms the basis of the present action.

The appellant contends that inasmuch as the account was taken in a proceeding in which the estate of Simon A. Leaphart was represented, not by an administrator de bonis non, but only by an administrator pendente lite, it was without authority and not binding, and, therefore, constituted no sufficient foundation for the present action, because the only person who could demand from the administrator of Martin an account of his actings and doings, as administrator of Simon, was an administrator de bonis non of the latter, and that such accounting could not be had at the instance of Mary Leaphart as administratrix pendente lite.

The respondent, however, makes a preliminary objection to the hearing of this appeal, which must first be disposed of. The objection is, that it nowhere appears in the "Case," as prepared for argument in this court, that the question now presented by this appeal was ever made or considered in the Circuit Court, and that according to the well-settled rule, we are precluded from considering such question. That such is the rule has been so often declared by this court that it is scarcely necessary to refer to the numerous cases in which it has been announced. It is only necessary, therefore, to ascertain whether it is true as matter of fact that the "Case" fails to show that such a question was made in the court below. We have examined the "Case" carefully and are unable to discover any evidence that such a question was ever presented to the Circuit judge for decision. His decree presents the facts of the case clearly, and discusses the legal questions presented fully and satisfactorily, and there is no intimation whatever that any such question as *that now presented was ever brought to his attention. The grounds of appeal do not assail the correctness of any of the legal propositions laid down in the decree, but simply complain that the Circuit judge "overlooked" the point now relied upon. It is true that in the first ground of appeal it is distinctly asserted that the point was earnestly pressed upon the court below; but, as we have frequently had occasion to say, we are not at liberty to accept any statement of fact incorporated into the exceptions or grounds of appeal, unless such statement appears also in the "Case," and have found it necessary by a recent amendment of the rules of this court, to distinctly and formally declare the proper practice in this respect.

But this court is always reluctant to dispose of a case upon merely technical or formal grounds, and as the evidence incorporated in the "Case" shows clearly that the accounting relied upon as the basis of the present action was taken in a proceeding to which the administrator de bonis non of Simon A. Leaphart was not a party, but that his estate was represented in that proceeding by Mary Leaphart, as administratrix pendente lite, and as the question has been fully argued at the bar, we are disposed to relax the rule in this instance, and consider the question made by the appeal, as if there were no technical objection in our way.

It does not appear, nor is it suggested, that when the accounting relied upon was taken, Gunter, who was a party to that proceeding, interposed any objection on the ground of a want of proper parties, or in any way questioned the right of an administrator pendente lite of the estate of Simon A. Leaphart, to demand an account from him of the administration by his intestate, Martin T. Leaphart, of the assets of the estate of Simon A., and therefore Gunter would scarcely be in a position now to question the result or effect of such accounting; nor is it clear that Hope, as his surety, could question it on that ground, even though not himself a party to the proceeding in which such accounting was had, especially when the person who is admitted to have had the right to demand such accounting, the administrator de bonis non of Simon A., is now before the court *recognizing and adopting, and thereby being bound by, such accounting.

But waiving this, let us consider the main question presented, whether the administratrix pendente lite of the estate of Simon A. could maintain an action against Gunter as administrator of Martin T., to recover the amount due by him as administrator of Simon A., or could this be done only by an administrator de bonis non of the estate of Simon A.? It is quite true that Gunter, by virtue of his administration on the estate of Martin, was not the administrator of Simon, and that whatever balance which may have been due to the estate of Simon by the estate of Martin, was nothing more than a debt due by the one estate to the other. Hence, as was held at the former hearing of this case, (Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 253,) such a debt could not be recovered by the distributees of Simon, but must be sued for by a proper representative of his estate, and none such being then before the court, Mary Leaphart, who had been administratrix pendente lite, having died before the commencement of this action, it was necessary that the proceedings should be amended by making the administrator de bonis non of the estate of Simon, a party; which was subsequently done.

But the question still recurs, whether the administrator pendente lite was not such a proper representative of the estate of Simon, as that she could maintain an action to recover the debt due to her intestate's estate by the estate of Martin, or could the action be brought only by an administrator de bonis non? It seems to be well settled, both upon principle and authority, that while the authority and power of an administrator pendente lite is much more limited in its nature than that of a general administrator, yet he may bring actions to recover debts due his intestate's estate. The leading case upon the subject, which has been repeatedly recognized since, is the case of Walker v. Woollaston, 2 P. Wms. 576, in which the doctrine above stated was distinctly laid down, and in the argument of counsel in that case, which seems to have been adopted by the court, but which is too long to be transcribed here, it is conclusively shown to be fully supported both by reason and authority, and absolutely necessary to effect the objects of such a limited administration. See also the cases of Knight v. Duplessis, 1 Ves. Sr. 325; Ball v. Oliver, 2 Ves. & B. 97; Gallivan v. Evans, 1 Ball & B. 192; Wills v. Rich, 2 Atk. 285.

In our own State, we do not think that the question has ever been distinctly decided, the authorities relied upon by the appellant not being in our judgment directly in point. They are all cases in which the question was, whether the action could be maintained by creditors or distributees, and we are not aware of any case in which the distinct question made by this appeal has been raised. It is true that in some of the cases strong language is used implying that such an action as this could only be maintained by an administrator de bonis non, but those expressions must be taken with reference to the facts of the cases in which they occur, and signify that, as between creditors or distributees and an administrator de bonis non, the action can only be maintained by the latter.

In Gill v. Douglass, 2 Bailey 387, (which, however, has been qualified by the subsequent case of Ford v. Dangerfield, 8 Rich. Eq. 110,) the action was by the escheator of Lancaster district to recover a balance due by the estate of the defendant's intestate on his administration of the estate of Dr. Clancy, who had died intestate, leaving no one entitled to claim as next of kin. The court held, that the escheator stood as a distributee and could not maintain the action, which should be brought by a legal representative of the first intestate; but whether such legal representative must necessarily be an administrator de bonis non, or whether an administrator pendente lite would not answer as such representative, is not even hinted at in the case.

In Easterling v. Thompson, Rice 346, an effort was made by creditors to reach the assets of the first intestate through an administrator of the deceased administrator of such intestate, and the court held that they could only proceed against an administrator de bonis non, whose duty it would be to require an account from the administrator of the first administrator, and no question was raised as to what would be the rights or duties of an administrator pendente lite.

In Stevenson v. Wilcox, 16 S. C. 432, the action was brought by the creditors of an intestate against the sureties of an administrator pendente lite, and the court held that such an administrator was accountable only to the general administrator, and not to the creditors or distributees, as he had no authority to pay debts or distribute the assets; but the question, whether an administrator pendente lite could maintain an action to recover a debt due his intestate's estate, was not, and could not have been, raised in the case.

In Villard v. Robert, 1 Strobb. Eq. 393, the question was whether a settlement, made by the representatives of an executor, on an accounting had with an administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo, for assets of the testator, converted into money by the executor in his life-time, was a bar to an action by the legatees against the representatives of such executor; and the court held that it was, because the administrator de bonis non had a right to demand such accounting from the executor, practically overruling what was said in Smith v. Carrere, 1 Rich. Eq. 123, on this point; but nothing was said as to the right of an administrator pendente lite to bring an action for such accounting.

From this review of the authorities, it seems to us that the English cases establish the proposition, that an administrator pendente lite may maintain an action to recover a debt due the estate of his intestate, and that there is no controlling authority in this State to the contrary; and inasmuch as to deny this right to such an administrator would, in many cases, practically defeat the object of appointing a limited administrator, by delaying the collection of the assets of an intestate, and thereby, perhaps, incurring the hazard of their entire loss, pending a controversy in the Court of Probate, we think that the doctrine established by the English cases has not only the support of authority, but is well founded in reason. We must, therefore, conclude that, outside of any mere technical objection, this appeal cannot be sustained.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[This case is also cited in Groesbeck v. Marshall, 46 S. C. 538, 22 S. E. 743, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Fraser, J., Spartanburg, July, 1881.

Action by A. J. Williams and Diana, his wife, against Walker, Fleming & Co. The Circuit decree was as follows:

This case came before me on the report of the special referee, C. P. Wofford, Esq., and exceptions thereto by the defendants. The action was brought to set aside a note and mortgage given by Diana Williams, one of the plaintiffs, to the defendants, on the grounds: First, that she was forced to execute the same by threats and intimidations; and, second, that there was no consideration for the same.

The real estate covered by the mortgage was the property of Diana Williams, derived by her from the estate of her first husband, her two children being entitled each to one-third of the tract of land, and her one-third only being mortgaged. It appears from the testimony that Diana Williams intermarried with A. J. Williams, her present husband, over sixteen years ago, and, of course, before the adoption of our present State constitution. The mortgage in this case is signed by her alone, and her husband did not join, neither is there any renunciation of inheritance by her. Perhaps, for some good reason which these proceedings do not reveal, no question has been made as to the right of Diana Williams to make any valid conveyance of her land in the mode adopted in the execution of this mortgage.

It is unnecessary to consider whether the failure of the plaintiffs to except to the report of the referee on the ground that the *referee found that there was no duress, can prevent this court from coming to a different conclusion, if, on examining the testimony, it appears that for any reason the referee did not err in the language of second exception, "in finding that the said note and mortgage are void," or of the fourth, "in refusing to dismiss the complaint."

The husband and wife had both been arrested on a charge of selling property under a lien without giving notice to the purchaser. The husband was in jail and the wife was informed that she must find bail in the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000), or go to jail. The only other alternative left to her was to sign the note and mortgage of this land for an amount sufficient to pay her husband's debts to the defendant, except a small deduction of $40. For these debts she was in no way liable, and a large part of the indebtedness was an old debt not even covered by the lien held by defendants on the husband. It may be that both plaintiffs might have been convicted if the prosecution had been pressed against them.

I am satisfied, however, that whatever benefit or advantage the defendants expected to derive from the transaction, or whatever other incidental advantages in the way of a deduction of $40, and an extension of time, may have accrued to A. J. Williams, the husband, no such benefit accrued directly to Diana Williams. She had no pecuniary interest in the arrangement or settlement of the debts of A. J. Williams. The only consideration moving to her was the release from arrest and the discontinuance of the prosecution. The clearer her guilt, the stronger the motive. "Courts of equity watch with extreme jealousy all contracts made by a party while under imprisonment, and if there is the slightest ground to suspect oppression or imposition in such cases, they will set the contracts aside." 1 Story Eq., § 239.

The general rule is that agreements for compromise of public prosecutions are illegal and void. This doctrine was conceded in Corley v. Williams, 1 Bail. 588, and the only exception contended for was that it did not apply to assaults and batteries, and other misdemeanors of a private nature. The reason for this exception is given by

Judge O'Neill, in Mathison & Kingsby v. Hanks, 2 Hill 625, in these words: "This double remedy (in assaults and batteries) is unnecessary, for the universal practice in England, and in this State, is, when the prosecutor is the party injured, and the defendant makes adequate reparation to him, to impose only a nominal fine."

The analogy between the offense charged against these plaintiffs and cases of assault and battery fail in at least two very important particulars: First. The least punishment that a judge can inflict on a person convicted under the act of 1873 (15 Stat. 332) is imprisonment for not less than ten (10) days and a fine not less than ten (10) dollars. I do not regard this as nominal. Second. In assault and batteries the very act which is the gist of the prosecution in the criminal action is the gist of the action in the Common Pleas, or the civil side of the court.

The injury done to the person who holds a lien over property, which is sold without notice, is the non-payment of his debt, and unless this is the result there is no injury done to him. The public offense in law is the same where the property sold is the last or only resource for the payment of his debt, or whether there is ample left to meet all demands on the property. The act is in itself no private wrong, and, unless an injury should follow, there is nothing to redress but the public wrong, which can be redressed only by a criminal action.

The practice of using the criminal process of the courts to redress private wrongs is not to be encouraged; and I am especially unwilling to lend the aid of the court to private parties who use the criminal process of the court to enforce against parties in no way liable for them, their claims against another person, and which, as in this case, have no connection whatever with the act which is the subject of the criminal action.

It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged: First. That the exceptions be overruled, and that the report of the referee be confirmed. Second. That the defendants and each of them be forever enjoined from collecting or attempting to collect and enforce the payment of the note or foreclosure of the mortgage described in the pleadings in this case. Third. That the defendants do deliver, the said note and mortgage to the clerk of *this court, to be by him canceled and delivered to the plaintiff Diana Williams. Fourth. That the defendants pay the costs of this action.

Defendants appealed.

Messrs. Bobo and Carlisle, for appellants. Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff Diana owns an undivided one-third interest in a certain tract of land in Spartanburg county, derived from the estate of her former husband, prior to her marriage with her present husband, and her two children by her former marriage own the remaining two-thirds. The family live upon this tract of land and work it together. In the year 1879, A. J. Williams gave a lien on the crop to defendants for fertilizers, and in the fall of that year C. E. Fleming, one of the members of the firm of Walker, Fleming & Co., sued out a warrant against A. J. Williams and Diana Williams for selling property covered by the lien without giving notice to the purchaser of the existence of such lien, in violation of the provisions of the act of February 12th, 1873, (15 Stat. 332.)

Under this warrant the plaintiffs were arrested and required to give bail in the sum of five thousand dollars, the maximum of the pecuniary penalty prescribed in said act, and A. J. Williams, in default of bail, was committed to jail. While Diana Williams was under arrest, but before she was actually committed to jail, negotiations were opened for a settlement of the whole matter, which resulted in an arrangement whereby Diana gave her note to the defendants, dated November 20th, 1879, payable twelve months after date, with interest from date, for $323.05, in satisfaction of the amount due under the lien, and also of an old note due to Walker & Fleming, by A. J. Williams, upon which a deduction of $40 was made, and also paid the costs of the criminal proceeding. Thereupon the plaintiffs were discharged from arrest and imprisonment and the criminal proceedings were discontinued.

*Soon afterwards this action was commenced for the purpose of having said note and mortgage declared void, and the same delivered up to be canceled. By consent the case was referred to a referee, "to take testimony, pass upon all issues of law and fact arising herein, and report the same to court with his recommendations thereon." The referee took the testimony, which is set out in the "Case," and made a report in which, while he failed "to find such circumstances of duress as will, of themselves, avoid the note and mortgage, if the arrest was legal and regular," he did find as matter of fact "that the whole consideration of the note and mortgage in this case, was the release of the plaintiff from arrest and the stopping of the prosecution." And as matter of law he found "that the said note and mortgage are void * * * and should be delivered up to be canceled, and that the defendants should be forever restrained from proceeding to enforce them."

To this report the defendants excepted, alleging error in the findings both of fact and law. The Circuit judge overruled the exceptions and confirmed the report, and from his judgment defendants appeal upon various grounds, which may be stated substantially as follows: 1st. Because the Circuit judge erred in overruling the exceptions to the referee's report. 2d. Because of error in holding that a consideration to support a contract must import some advantage to the promisor. 3d. In holding that the testimony showed no legal consideration for the contract of the plaintiff Diana Williams, evidenced by the note and mortgage, except the discontinuance of the criminal prosecution against her. 4th. In holding that said contract was thereby rendered void.

The question as to what was the real consideration of the note and mortgage, was one of fact, and that question has been answered adversely to the appellants, both by the referee and the Circuit judge, and so far from their being any lack of evidence to support their findings, we think it must be clear to every unprejudiced mind, from the testimony in this case, that the sole moving cause which induced the plaintiff Diana to sign the note and mortgage was to secure release from arrest and imprisonment, and a discontinuance of the criminal proceeding. She *was in no way responsible for the debts of her husband, and although she may, as the referee says, have participated in the benefit accruing from the money advanced under the lien, and perhaps in the money or supplies which were the consideration for the old note, yet this is nothing more than what might be said in most, if not all, cases in which a husband living with his wife obtains money or supplies upon his own credit, or upon the faith of a lien on his crop. She was not bound, either legally or morally, to pay such a debt, and the creditor who chooses to extend credit to the husband alone, must look alone to him for payment. There was no evidence whatever tending to show that A. J. Williams had leased the land upon which the crop was made, from his wife and her children by a former marriage, and thereby acquired a right to give a lien on it, but, on the contrary, the referee says that "they all worked the place together, and the plaintiff A. J. Williams shared in the proceeds of the crop." It may well be questioned, therefore, whether he had any right to give a lien upon the crop.

Assuming, then, as matter of fact, as we are bound to do, not only from the concurrent findings of the referee and the Circuit judge, but also from our own view of the testimony, that the true consideration of the note and mortgage was the release of the plaintiff from arrest and imprisonment, and a discontinuance of the criminal proceeding, the next inquiry is, whether such a consideration was sufficient to support the contract evidenced by the note and mortgage. The general rule is that such a consideration is illegal, and the only exception seems to be in cases of assault and battery, and other misdemeanors of like nature, where it has been held that a note given to the party injured by the person who has inflicted the injury may be sustained upon the ground that the real consideration is the compensation due to the one by the other for the personal injury which he has sustained, the amount of which has been ascertained by an agreement of the parties, instead of by the verdict of a jury; and inasmuch as it is the settled practice in this state to impose only a nominal punishment under a conviction for assault and battery where the party injured has also sought re-

But where a note is given by a person not liable for the damages sustained by the party injured, for the purpose of stopping a prosecution even for assault and battery, it will be held void as based upon an illegal consideration, because, in such a case, the consideration cannot be referred to the compensation due by the one to the other, for there is nothing due in such a case from the maker to the payee of the note, and the consideration must be referred to the stopping of the prosecution, and is, therefore, illegal. These views are fully supported by the following cases: Corley v. Williams, 1 Bail. 588; Mathison v. Hanks, 2 Hill 625; Banks v. Searles, 2 McM. 356; Gray v. Seigler, 2 Strob. 117.

Now, even conceding, what may well be questioned under the circumstances of this case, that Diana Williams might have been made liable, in a civil action for damages, for disposing of property covered by the lien, yet, as we have seen, she was never liable for the debts which the note and mortgage were given to secure, and there is no pretense that the note was given as a compensation for such damages. If she had been arrested for burning a house of the defendants, and the prosecution had been stopped upon her executing a note and mortgage to secure the payment of debts due by her husband, for which she was in no way liable, it might well be said that, as she would be liable for the damages done to the defendants by the destruction of their house, such liability would constitute a sufficient consideration to support the note, as it can be said, in this case, that her liability for damages in disposing of property covered by the lien in favor of the defendants, constitutes a valid consideration for the note and mortgage here in question.

A court of equity will not readily sanction or recognize a contract which one has been induced to enter into for the purpose of securing immunity from a criminal prosecution. Such a use of criminal process violates every consideration of public policy, and whoever resorts to it should meet with condemnation rather than encouragement. It is quite manifest, from all of the circumstances of this case, and, indeed, is openly avowed by the *defendant, who was the active agent in the whole proceeding, that the real purpose of the criminal proceeding was, not to promote the ends of public justice, but to secure the payment of a debt. Such a mode of collecting debts is certainly not entitled to the favorable consideration of a court of justice.

The second ground of appeal is taken under a misconception of the decree of the Circuit judge. We do not understand him to lay down the proposition, that a consideration to support a contract must necessarily import some advantage to the promisor, or to deny that forbearance or a release of part of a debt may constitute a sufficient consideration to support a promise to pay the debt of another. Under the view which he took of the testimony, such a question could not arise, and, therefore, it was not necessary for him to express any opinion upon it, nor did he undertake to do so.

We concur, therefore, in the view taken of the case by the Circuit judge, and are unable to see any ground upon which this appeal can be sustained. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

PATTERSON v. PAGAN.

[1. Parties ⇨63.]

A party brought in as defendant because the real claimant of the property in dispute, may put in issue the plaintiffs' capacity to sue.

[2. Parties ⇨76.]

Plaintiffs' incapacity to sue, not clearly appearing from the statements of the complaint, this defense could not be taken by demurrer; it was, therefore, properly made by answer and proof of the facts.

[3. Executors and Administrators ⇨524.]

The proper probate of a will in another State, with letters testamentary there duly issued to the executors, and an exemplification of these proceedings marked by a probate judge in this State, "filed and admitted to probate," do not authorize such executors to bring action in this State, no letters testamentary being here issued.

[This case is also cited in Jerkowski v. Marco, 56 S. C. 242, 34 S. E. 386, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Fairfield, September, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

*Mr. Jno. S. Reynolds, for appellant.
Mr. T. C. Gaston, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action by the plaintiffs, as executors of the will of Robert Patterson, deceased, late of Pennsylvania, originally brought against John D. McCarley, sheriff of Fairfield county, to recover the proceeds arising from the sale of certain crops seized and sold by him as sheriff under a warrant to enforce an agreement for rent of land executed by James Pagan to Robert Patterson, deceased. More than "thirty days" had elapsed between the said sale and the commencement of this action. By an order of June, 1882, James Pagan was interpleaded as a defendant, and answered.

The trial was had at the September term, 1882. The complaint alleged that "Robert Patterson, then a resident of the State of Pennsylvania, departed this life, leaving in full force his last will and testament, wherein the said Robert E. Patterson, W. Heyward Drayton and Henry P. Smith, the plaintiffs, were appointed his executors, and that said will having been admitted to probate in the State of Pennsylvania, was duly admitted to probate and filed in the office of Probate judge of Fairfield county, in the State of South Carolina; and that the said executors have heretofore qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties." The defendant answered, denying that the plaintiffs had legal capacity as executors to sue in this State.

It appeared by an exemplification of the proceedings that the will of Robert Patterson was duly admitted to probate in the proper office of the city and county of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, and that letters testamentary thereon had been granted to the plaintiffs, as executors, on August 12th, 1881. A full copy of the proceedings in Philadelphia in probating the will had been recorded in the office of judge of Probate for Fairfield county, South Carolina, endorsed, "Filed and admitted to probate December 29th, 1881," but no further proceedings were taken. The persons named as executors never *qualified as such or received letters testamentary in this State. The sheriff testified that James Pagan had never filed an affidavit denying that the amount claimed was due on the lien for rent mentioned in the complaint, but before the sale of the cotton he had served written notice claiming that the cotton was his property, not subject to Patterson's lien.

The plaintiffs here rested and the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the plaintiffs had not established their legal capacity to sue. The motion was refused, a verdict rendered for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals to this court upon the following grounds: First. For that his Honor held that upon proving the testator's will in the office of the judge of Probate, the plaintiffs become legally capable of suing in this State. Second. For that his Honor held that under section 1875 of the general statutes, the plaintiffs, as executors, are authorized to prosecute this action to judgment. Third. For that his Honor did not hold that to enable the plaintiffs, as executors, to prosecute this action, they must have qualified in this State according to the form prescribed in the general statutes. Fourth. For that his Honor did not hold, in order to enable the plaintiffs, as executors, to prosecute this action to judgment, they must have received letters testamentary from the Court of Probate in this State. Fifth. For that his Honor did not hold that the plaintiffs have not legal capacity to sue, and dismiss the complaint.

The plaintiffs contend that the defendant Pagan has no right to make the objection of want of capacity on their part to sue, for the reason that no claim was made against him—that he was not originally sued, but the sheriff for money in hands, and Pagan claiming the same money was brought in by interpleader and thereby merely allowed to support his own claim to the money, but not to dispute others. We find Pagan on the record as the defendant, and we know of no rule of law which limits his rights as defendant on account of the manner in which he was brought in. No authority was cited to sustain the view suggested. It does not appear at whose instance he was made a defendant, but we suppose that he was substituted for the party originally sued, under the authority of the last paragraph of *section 145 of the code, which provides, that at the instance of a defendant against whom a claim is made for the property in controversy, by a person not a party to the action, the "court may grant an order to substitute such person in his place," &c.

The plaintiffs also claim that Pagan could only avail himself by demurrer of the defense of want of capacity in the plaintiffs to sue. The defendant is authorized to demur when the facts which constitute the defense appear upon the face of the complaint; but if it does not show the facts upon its face, the objection can only be made by answer and proof of the facts. Code, § 170; 2 Wait Pr. 448. In this case, the fact upon which the defense rested did not clearly appear upon the face of the complaint, which stated that, "the said will, having been proved and admitted to probate in the State of Pennsylvania, was duly admitted to probate, and filed in the office of the Probate judge in Fairfield county, in the State of South Carolina; and that the said executors have heretofore qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties." Without explanation, this statement might be construed to mean that the executors had qualified and entered upon their duties in South Carolina. From the context this would seem to be the proper meaning, and a demurrer (which admits the facts as stated) might have failed to make the point intended and defeated the defense, as the proof showed that the plaintiffs never qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties in the State of South Carolina.

The main question in the case is, whether the plaintiffs had legal capacity to sue as executors of Robert Patterson's will, upon which they had qualified and received letters testamentary in the State of Pennsylvania, but not in South Carolina. There is no doubt that the right to make a will gives the right to dispose of testator's personal property wherever it may be situated, but before there is a will at all, there must be conformity to the law of the domicile which, in most of the States, requires that the will must be in writing—free and voluntary—attested by a certain number of witnesses, and proved in an office established for that purpose. Although the power of disposal may be general, the sanction of these local laws, which are necessary to give it effect *as a will, does not extend beyond the limits of the State which enacts them.

So also as to the authority of executors, which is a very different matter from the probate of the will. Even after a will has been probated, it cannot execute itself, and some agency must be created to carry it out. The testator has the right to appoint his own executors, and while undoubtedly their general authority is derived from the will, they cannot enter fully upon the discharge of their trust until they have complied with certain statutory regulations upon the subject, such as taking the prescribed oath, in some of the States giving bond, and receiving letters testamentary; and before these requirements are complied with, an executor named can exercise no power as such further than to pay funeral charges, and perhaps do such other acts as are necessary for the preservation of the estate. These requirements are necessarily local in their nature, and of course their operations are limited to the State which makes them, unless other States, from convenience or comity, adopt them as to wills executed in that State.

The rule and the reasons for it are clearly stated by Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Dixon's Executors v. Ramsay's Executors, 3 Cranch 319 [2 L. Ed. 453], as follows: "The question in this case is, whether the executor of a person who dies in a foreign country, can maintain an action in this, by virtue of letters testamentary granted to him in his own country. It is contended that this case differs from that of an administrator, which was formerly decided in this court, because the administrator derives his power over the estate of his intestate from the grant of administration; but an executor derives it from the will of his testator, which has invested him with his whole personal estate, wherever it may be. This distinction does certainly exist; but the consequences deduced from it do not seem to follow. If an executor derived from the will of his testator a power to maintain a suit and obtain a judgment for a debt due to his testator, it would seem reasonable that he should exercise that power, wherever the authority of the will was acknowledged; but if he maintain the suit by virtue of his letters testamentary, he can only sue in courts to which the power of these letters extends. *It is not and cannot be denied, that he sues by virtue of his letters testamentary; and consequently in this particular he comes within the principle which was decided by this court in the case of an administrator. All rights to personal property are admitted to be regulated by the laws of the country in which the testator lived; but the suits for those rights must be governed by the laws of that country in which the tribunal is placed. No one can sue in the courts of any country, whatever his rights may be, unless in conformity with rules prescribed by the laws of that country," &c. See, also, Murrell v. Dicky, 1 John. Ch. 153; Peterson v. Chemical Bank, 32 N. Y. 40; Noonan v. Bradley, 9 Wall. 400 [19 L. Ed. 757], and Reynolds' Executors v. Torrance, 2 Brev. 59.

It is clear, then, both from principle and authority, that the plaintiffs had no legal capacity to sue in this State by virtue of their letters testamentary granted in the State of Pennsylvania, but it is insisted that the foreign appointment has been confirmed by the law of this State, and therefore they had the right to sue here. This might be possible. As said by Chief Justice Simpson, in the case of Dial v. Gary, 14 S. C. 579 [37 Am. Rep. 737]: "If the decedent has left a will, upon its being established under the lex domicilii, it will usually be confirmed under the jurisdiction where the property is found, and the title of the executor, as well as the disposition of the property therein appointed and directed, will be recognized here. But this confirmation must take place and be had in accordance with the laws of the rei sitæ before even an executor under such testament can intermeddle with the property," &c.

Is there any law in South Carolina which "confirms" the appointment of these executors, and makes them executors in this State? Section 1875 of the general statutes of 1882, relied upon by the plaintiffs and the Circuit judge, provides, that "If a will be regularly proved in any foreign court, an exemplification of such will may be admitted to probate in this State upon the exemplification and certificate of the judge of the Court of Probate, and the exemplification shall also be evidence of the devise of lands in this State when the title of lands comes in question," &c. The object of this provision manifestly was to avoid the *great inconvenience of producing the original will in this State for the purpose of being used in evidence, as appears by the original act of 1759 (4 Stat. 102), which recites, that "said probate or copy so proved and attested as aforesaid, shall be deemed and held to be as good and sufficient evidence in any court of law or equity in this Province as if said original will had been produced," &c. It may be conceded that under this law the will of Robert Patterson has been admitted to probate in Fairfield county of this State, but no mention whatever is made as to the qualification of the executors, and, as we understand it, the probate did not ipso facto involve their appointment or the confirmation of the foreign appointment in this State, so as to enable them to sue here.

The qualification of the executors is a matter entirely separate and distinct from the probate of the will and supplemental thereto. The oath required of executors in Pennsylvania is not identical with that required of them in this State. Section 1882 of the general statutes requires that every executor, at the time of proving the will, shall take the oath there prescribed, "that the writing contains the last will of the deceased so far as he knows or believes, and that he will well and truly execute the same, by paying first the debts and then the legacies contained in the said will, so far as his goods and chattels will thereunto extend and the law charge him; and that he will make a true and perfect inventory of all such goods and chattels," &c. These plaintiffs never took this oath or received letters testamentary in this State, and as was said in Reynolds v. Torrance, supra: "The opinion of the court is, that the authority derived from the probate of a will and letters testamentary in another of the United States, will not extend to this so as to empower the executor to meddle with the effects or credit of the deceased within this State. * * * An authenticated copy of a will and probate coming from another State, may be received in this, as sufficient evidence of such will and probate, but will not authorize the executor, acting by virtue of letters granted in another State, to meddle with property in this State, without first applying for and obtaining letters testamentary in this State, because the ordi-naries [judges of Probate] within their several precincts, are bound to see to the due application of the assets of persons deceased and ought to have a correcting power over those entrusted with the administration of such assets, for the safety and interest of creditors and others within this State."

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

[1. Executors and Administrators ⚡221; Witnesses ⚡144.]

A holder of a note secured by a mortgage of indemnity, with a written assignment to him from the mortgagor endorsed on the mortgage, may not testify to his purchase of the note from the mortgagor, who at the time of trial is deceased, but may testify that he is the owner of the note; and this will be sufficient to sustain the action against the representative of the deceased.

Before Cothran, J., Laurens, June, 1882.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

I agree with the master in his findings of facts; also in his rulings upon section 415 of the code; also, that Dunlap, the endorser, upon taking up the note, was invested with the rights of the bank to enforce payment from Fuller, and that the transfer of the note by Dunlap to the plaintiff, for value, was a re-issue of it, with a revival of his liability as endorser.

"I cannot, however, agree with the master, that it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that he had pursued the maker (James Fuller) to insolvency. R. S. Dunlap was not a guarantor of the note; his liability upon re-issuing the note was certainly as high as that of a surety, if, indeed, it did not become the unqualified liability of the maker of a new note; and in either event, the plaintiff had the right to demand payment of Dunlap alone, if he chose to do so. Dunlap, as has been already said, transferred the note to the plaintiff, after it was due, and for value, and by neglecting to erase his name from it, which he had the unquestionable right to do before parting with it, he gave to the note renewed currency, certainly with revived (and I am inclined to hold with unqualified) liability on his part.

What may have been the real intention of the parties in the matter of the transfer can never be known. Death has sealed the lips of the one, and the rule of evidence those of the other, and in this condition of things the true intention can be gathered only from the law itself which governs the naked and unexplained transaction. Written instruments importing an obligation must be construed most strictly against those who make them. R. S. Dunlap had the right to erase his name from the note. He neglected, it may be purposely declined, to do so. Its remaining there must bind him to the legitimate consequences of his neglect or refusal to erase it, and the most obvious consequence of his act is liability to make good the endorsement.

"It is a well established principle of commercial law, that if the last of several endorsers were to pay the note to his endorser, he could re-issue the note with or without his endorsement remaining upon it, and recovery could be had under this second transfer from all prior parties who remain liable to him, and from him also, if his endorsement were upon the instrument." 2 Dan. Neg. Inst., § 1238. "If an endorser who pays a bill re-issues it, he is bound by his first or second endorsement according to intention; if as one already fixed, he need not have notice." Id., § 1242. "If the acceptor retire a bill, he takes it out of circulation, the bill is paid; but if an endorser retire it, he only withdraws it from circulation so far as he is concerned." Id., § 1243.

"Wherefore it is ordered and adjudged, that the exceptions to the master's report be sustained; that the appeal to this court be dismissed; and that the decree of the trial justice be affirmed. It is further ordered, that the plaintiff have judgment for his costs against the defendant.

Messrs. Ball & Watts, for appellant.
Mr. B. D. Cunningham, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On May 22d, 1875, James Fuller made his promissory note for $125, payable to one R. S. Dunlap, at the bank of Newberry, five months after date. Dunlap endorsed the note in blank, and, upon receiving the note, the bank paid the money to Fuller, the maker, who, in order to secure Dunlap, his endorser, executed and delivered to him a chattel mortgage of a mule valued at $120. When the note fell due, October 25th following, Dunlap, waiving protest in writing over his signature, took up the note and some time afterwards formally assigned the mortgage of the mule to the plaintiff Coleman, and doubtless transferred to him at the same time for value the note, although there is no formal assignment upon it as on the mortgage. The mule was sold by the plaintiff under legal proceedings, and the proceeds applied as a credit on the note, which, with another payment, reduced the note to a small balance, for which he brought this suit before Trial Justice Watts against the administrator of Dunlap, who had died in the meantime.

The trial justice decreed for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed to the Court of Common Pleas, and the matter was there referred to the master "to hear and determine the issues of law and fact involved," and he dismissed the complaint, saying: "There is no evidence that the balance due upon the note can not be made out of the maker and there is no evidence at all of demand upon him and non-payment and notice thereof to the endorser, which was necessary to make him or his estate liable to the plaintiff. It does not appear that this plaintiff has *made any effort whatever to collect the balance due upon the note from the maker. I think, therefore, and recommend that the case should be dismissed with judgment against the plaintiff for all costs of these proceedings." &c.

Exceptions were taken to this report and the Circuit judge reversed it and confirmed the judgment of the trial justice for the plaintiff. From this judgment the defendant appeals to this court upon two grounds:

"1. That his Honor erred in holding that the plaintiff was the owner of the note sued on. 2. That he erred in holding that the defendant's intestate was liable therefor."

The plaintiff had possession of the note as well as the mortgage, which latter had been regularly assigned to him by Dunlap, and which he enforced by having the mule sold, and crediting the proceeds upon the note. Coleman testified that he "was the owner of the note; bought it from R. S. Dunlap and paid him the money for it," &c. As Dunlap was dead at that time, it was not competent for Coleman to testify as to

"transactions" had with him in his life-time, but we see no reason why he could not state that "he was the owner of the note," and that was all that was necessary to sustain the action, especially as he had possession of both the note and mortgage, which itself was prima facie evidence of ownership.

Being the owner of the note, having upon it the blank endorsement of Dunlap, with waiver of protest, is there any reason why Coleman cannot recover upon it against the administrator of Dunlap, the endorser, from whom he received it, without exhausting James Fuller, the maker of the note? When delivered to Coleman, the obligation was either on the old note endorsed by Dunlap with waiver of protest, or on a new bill drawn by him in favor of Coleman, and in either case we think that the holder could recover the balance of the note from the estate of Dunlap, upon the proof made.

In the view that Dunlap still remained endorser after he paid the bank and re-issued the note, he was the endorser of a note past due for value. Notice of protest was expressly waived in writing, on the paper itself, but if that could not refer to the revived liability made after the paper was due, all the notice that *Dunlap could require was reasonable notice of non-payment, and probably even that was rendered unnecessary by his taking a mortgage, for his indemnity from the maker, of property nearly equal in value to the amount of the debt. See Charleston Bank v. Barrett, 2 McM. 194, where Judge Evans, in speaking for the court, says: "It seems to me that Barrett, having taken what he considered ample security against his liability on his endorsement, and in the absence of any proof to the contrary, we must suppose it an ample security, has waived his right to insist on notice of non-payment by the maker," &c.

But if there was no waiver as to the balance of the debt, which remained after the proceeds arising from the sale of the mule was applied, the assignment of that mortgage to the plaintiff, and his suing the maker, Fuller, to foreclose the mortgage, was at least constructive notice of non-payment. "In the case of negotiable notes transferred after due and guaranteed by the endorser, demand of payment from the maker and notice to the endorser, either actual or constructive, within a reasonable time, must be proved. The bringing of suit on the note against the maker, is a sufficient demand, and, if known to the endorser, would be sufficient notice." Benton v. Gibson, 1 Hill 56.

But we incline to the view that the circumstances make this one of the cases in which the endorser is held to be the drawer of a new bill, and that demand upon the maker and notice of non-payment to the endorser were not necessary. The endorser took up the note from the bank and re-issued it for value. He might have stricken out his own name on the back, but he did not do so, and he probably left it there to give the note value. "It is a well established principle of commercial law, that if the last of several endorsers were to pay the note to his endorser, he could re-issue the note with or without his endorsement remaining upon it, and recovery could be had under this second transfer from all prior parties who remain liable to him, and from him also if his endorsement were upon the instrument." 2 Dan. Neg. Inst., § 1238.

It was said by Judge O'Neill, in the case of Gray v. Bell, 3 Rich. 72: "According to our cases of Eccles v. Ballard, 2 McCord 388; Barrett v. May, 2 Bail. 1; Benton v. Gibson, 1

*Hill 56, the endorser of a note after due is to be regarded either as the guarantor of its payment or as the drawer of a new bill. Both stand upon the same principles, and it is hardly necessary to distinguish in what precise character he is to be charged. I am prepared, however, to go much farther and to hold that the endorser of a note negotiable after due, is to be regarded either as a new maker, or as the drawer of a bill on a man without funds (the maker who has failed to pay), in neither of which cases is demand of payment or notice at all necessary."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*No. 1275. AYER v. CHASSEREAU.

[Appeal and Error ⇨93.]

This was a motion to dismiss an appeal from an order of Judge Hudson, refusing leave to defendant to file his answer, because unverified, and giving plaintiff a judgment by default. The motion here was based upon the ground that defendant had no right of appeal. Held, that the order of the Circuit judge involved a legal right and was, therefore, appealable under section 11 of the code of procedure.

[This case is also cited in Cureton v. Stokes, 22 S. C. 584, and distinguished therefrom.]

Motion refused. Order PER CURIAM, October 6th, 1882.

No. 1276. THE STATE, ex relatione COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF ABBEVILLE COUNTY, v. COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF EDGEFIELD COUNTY. April Term, 1882.

This was a petition presented to the court in behalf of the relators to require the respondents to levy a tax upon the property within certain limits of Edgefield county, and to pay the proceeds into the hands of the county treasurer of Edgefield, to be held subject to the order of relators; and for damages and costs. The facts stated in the petition were admitted by the respondents, and legal issues only were raised by the return. This application was based upon the act of 1880 (17 Stat. 412), which authorized the citizens of a designated section of Edgefield county, adjoining the county of Abbeville, to fence in their territory, and which extended to such territory the provisions of the stock law then in force as to Abbeville and other counties. 16 Stat. 689. For the purpose of keeping this fence in repair, the county commissioners of Edgefield were to procure from the county commissioners of Abbeville the per centum annually levied as a tax in Abbeville for keeping fences in repair, and to levy upon the *property within the said territory of Edgefield the same tax, and not to exceed such per centum of Abbeville, and the proceeds of such tax to place in the hands of their county treasurer, subject to the order of the county commissioners of Abbeville. Held—

[1. Counties ⇨133.]

That the necessary inference was that the duty of keeping this fence in repair was charged upon the county commissioners of Abbeville county; that the fence was not for the benefit of Edgefield county, and the tax was not a county tax, but the proportion properly chargeable upon that territory of Edgefield which, at their own request, was included within the benefits enjoyed by the county of Abbeville, and none of the rights or powers given by the constitution to the county commissioners of Edgefield were delegated to the county commissioners of Abbeville.

That this was not a claim against the county of Edgefield, and therefore to be audited, but an application to require the county commissioners of that county to perform a specific duty imposed upon them by an act of the legislature.

[3. Fences ⇨4.]

That the duty to be performed by the county commissioners of Edgefield did not involve the exercise of judgment or discretion, but was purely ministerial, and therefore enforceable by mandamus.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fences, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. ⇨4.]

4. The relators are entitled to neither damages nor costs. State, ex rel. Bull, v. County Treasurer, 10 S. C. 40.

Petition granted, except as to damages and costs, and writ ordered. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, October 7th, 1882. T. P. Cothran, for relators. B. W. Bettis, F. H. Wardlaw, contra.

No. 1277. CHARLES v. JACOBS. April Term, 1882.

Money was, in the hands of the sheriff, realized from the sale of lands of C., under an execution of A., as administrator of B., against the executrix of C. D. held an execution against A., as administrator of B., and, claiming this money, took out a rule against the sheriff, entitled A., as administrator of B., v. Executrix of C., requiring him to show cause why he did not apply this money to D.'s execution. The sheriff made return that the money was claimed by A.,

as administrator of B., as applicable to expenses *of his administration, including counsel fees. Judge Kershaw decided that the money was applicable to expenses of the administration and to such counsel fee as should be allowed by the Probate Court, and discharged the rule. The Probate judge made report of a proper counsel fee, and added that the estate of B. had not been finally settled, and that there were other costs and expenses of administration unpaid. On hearing this report, which was entitled D. v. A., as administrator of B., Judge Fraser, not knowing of Judge Kershaw's order, directed the counsel fee to be paid and the balance paid to D. Held, that Judge Fraser's order was in part inconsistent with Judge Kershaw's, and, therefore, to that extent, erroneous, one Circuit judge having no power to reverse a judgment of another Circuit judge. Held, further, that Judge Kershaw's order was right: money received by a sheriff on an execution in favor of an administrator, not being applicable to an execution in the office upon a judgment obtained against the administrator after the death of intestate, especially where prior claims against the estate remain unpaid. This case, therefore, differs from Haynsworth v. Frier-son, 11 Rich. 476.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1926; Dec. Dig. ⚡454; Judges, Cent. Dig. § 93; Dec. Dig. ⚡24.]

No. 1278. CLEVELAND v. COHRS.

April Term, 1882.

This was an appeal from a decree of foreclosure and sale passed by Judge Kershaw. The case has twice before been heard on appeal in this court, and will be found reported in 10 S. C. 224 and 13 Id. 397. The following points were here decided:

1. A finding by the Circuit judge, from written testimony reported to him, that a bond had not been paid, sustained.

[2. Mortgages ⚡583.]

Where a mortgagee purchases the mortgaged property at a foreclosure sale, for less than the amount due, the mortgage debt is not thereby extinguished; and the mortgagee is the purchaser where she receives titles from the master under a transfer of the highest bidder's bid.

The judgment under which such sale was made having been set aside by this court, on the motion of the mortgagor, he cannot now claim any benefit from a sale made under such annulled judgment. The effect of such reversal upon a stranger *purchaser not considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1468; Dec. Dig. ⚡496.]

No. 1279. CHRISTOPHER v. CHRISTOPHER. April Term, 1882.

This was an action by plaintiff, a freed-woman, against defendant, a freedman, for support and maintenance, the plaintiff alleging that defendant had deserted her. The answer denied the marriage. The cause was heard before Kershaw, J., who referred the issues to a jury, and upon their finding favorable to the plaintiff, gave judgment for the payment of a certain sum of money, annually, by defendant to plaintiff. Defendant appealed. Held—

[1. Marriage ⚡22.]

In charging the jury that if defendant was not married to plaintiff, or any other woman of color, under the terms of the act of 1865 (13 Stat. 290), and was living with plaintiff as husband and wife on March 12th, 1872, and in any way they so recognized each other, that this would make them man and wife under the terms of the act that day approved, the Circuit judge correctly stated the terms and operation of the act of 1872 (15 Stat. 183).

A finding of fact by jury and judge sustained.

[3. Husband and Wife ⚡285½.]

A wife may file a complaint against her husband for support and maintenance, as a distinct, substantive relief.

The form of the verdict was of no consequence, as the judgment was rendered by the court; and where answer is put in, the judgment is not necessarily limited by the prayer for relief, but the court may grant "any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." Code, § 299; Pom. Rem., § 580.

No. 1287. MILLER v. EDWARDS. April Term, 1882.

This case involved the same points as those decided in Miller v. Hall, ante 141, and they were similarly decided, the CHIEF JUSTICE dissenting. The two cases were heard together by referees, Circuit judge and this court. The following points were also decided here:

*1. The condition of the bond differing slightly from the aggregate of the three installments, and both of these differing from the price of the land, as ascertained by multiplying the number of acres by the price per acre, the Circuit judge committed no error in construing the bond and agreement together, and thus ascertaining the true amount of the debt.

The referees erred in receiving parol testimony on the subject of the interest agreed to be paid, but as the Circuit judge did not base his conclusions upon such testimony, this furnishes no ground for remanding the case.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Arnold v. Bailey, 24 S. C. 497.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice FRASER (sitting in the place of Mr. Justice McGOWAN), October 21st, 1882. E. G. Graydon, for appellant. W. H. Parker, contra.

No. 1289. FOOT & SON v. WILLIAMS. April Term, 1882.

This case was commenced in a trial justice's court, and judgment rendered for plaintiff March 25th, 1881. Defendant's attorney at that time gave verbal notice of appeal, and prepared written notice and grounds of appeal and handed them to his clerk to be served on both the attorney for plaintiffs and the trial justice. The clerk served this notice upon plaintiffs' attorney within the five days but failed to serve the trial justice. On December 21st, 1881, a written notice of appeal was served upon the trial justice, who signed a certificate that a verbal notice of such intention had been served upon him by defendant's attorney on or about March 30th. Judge Pressley dismissed the appeal because not perfected within the time required by law. This court sustained the ruling below upon the authority of the code of procedure, sections 370, 371, 353. Cases cited, Davis v. Vaughan, 7 S. C. 343; Scott v. Pratt, 9 S. C. 83; Russell & Co. v. Follin, MS. Dec. No. 799, January 8th, 1880. The act of 1880, 17 Stat. 368, has no application to an appeal from a trial justice, and, even if it did, could not remedy the defect here.

April Term, 1882.

A cestui que trust brought action against her nominated trustee (who declined to serve) and her infant children, who were also beneficiaries under the trust deed, for the purpose of having a trustee appointed, and for a sale of the trust property and a re-investment of the proceeds. Under this proceeding, a new trustee was appointed and directed to sell the land held in trust, which he did. The papers were all entitled the "Court of Common Pleas," and were regular in all respects, except that the case nowhere appeared upon the dockets of the court, the records were not filed in the clerk's office until after this action was brought, and the Circuit decree bore date at a time when the court for that county was not in session. The mother died, and this action was instituted by her children against the purchaser for possession of the land and rents and profits. The complaint was dismissed by Judge Aldrich, and plaintiffs appealed. Held—

[1. Courts ⇨32.]

That the objection to the introduction of the decree in the former action upon the ground that it did not appear upon its face that the court had jurisdiction, was not well taken.

[2. Equity ⇨346.]

*If such decree had been passed at chambers it would have been invalid, but in the absence of all testimony (except as above stated) it must be assumed that the cause was heard in open court. The failure to file the decree did not affect its validity.

November Term, 1882. This was an order dismissing an application for a writ of mandamus to require the State board of canvassers to canvass the votes and declare the election of the relator as clerk of the court for Edgefield county. The case is identical with that of State, ex rel. Anderson, v. Sims, ante 460, and the opinion in this case simply refers to the decision in that. Order PER CURIAM, December 2d, 1882. This was a petition by Julius A. Blake and others for a rehearing of the case of Annelly v. DeSaussure, 17 S. C. 389, based principally upon the ground that the opinion of Chief Justice Willard, in 12 S. C. 488, was the judgment of the court upon all the points therein discussed. The court held that so far as the question of improvements was concerned, there was no concurrence by the associate justices with the views of the then Chief Justice. Petition refused. Order PER CURIAM, January 24th, 1883. Campbell & Whaley, for petitioners.

*No. 1335. SIMONDS v. HAITHCOCK.
November Term, 1882.

Action by plaintiff against defendant, for damages caused by the erection of a dam, and for injunction against its maintenance, tried by Wallace, J. The right of plaintiff and the question of damages were referred to a jury. Defendant offered to prove a parol license from a former tenant at will of the injured land; upon objection, the presiding judge refused to admit the testimony, and there being no evidence of defendant's right to flood the plaintiff's land, he charged the jury that their verdict must be for plaintiff. The jury found for plaintiff.

without damages, and the judge then signed an order enjoining the defendant from longer maintaining the dam. Defendant appealed. Held, that in the refusal of the testimony offered, in the charge to the jury, and in the order of injunction, the Circuit judge committed no error; that as to the order of injunction, the facts of this case brought it within the rule laid down in *Ad. Where parties in possession of land, under claim of title, make improvements upon such land after action brought against them for the possession of the land and denying their right thereto, they have no right to the value of the improvements so erected. The principles discussed upon which tenants in possession are allowed their improvements.

No. 1337. LONG v. SCHMIDT. November Term, 1882.

Action against defendant, a married woman, as acceptor of a bill of exchange. The complaint alleged that defendant, "by her husband, accepted the draft in writing." Defendant demurred, upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This demurrer was overruled by the Circuit Court (Wallace, J.,) and defendant appealed. Held—

No. 1339. STATE v. WILLIAMS. November Term, 1883.

A failure to charge propositions of law which were not requested cannot be assigned as error on the part of the Circuit judge. Moreover, the judge's charge here was in accordance with the law as claimed by appellant in his exceptions. Judgment of the Circuit Court (Kershaw, J.,) affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, February 15th, 1883. G. T. Graham, Meetze & Muller, for appellant. Bonham, solicitor, contra.

No. 1340. ROSS v. LINDER. November Term, 1882.

This was an action on a contract for the payment of board. By consent, the case was referred to a referee to hear and determine all the issues, and report the same to the court with his recommendations. He reported in favor of plaintiff. On defendant's exceptions, the Circuit judge (Fraser) dismissed the complaint, upon the ground that the evidence did not support any contract, or, if any, that it was a joint contract made by defendant and the wife of the plaintiff, and that the action must be brought jointly against those two. On appeal. Held—

That the case being strictly a law case tried by the court, findings of fact by the Circuit judge cannot be disturbed by this court. In this connection the court say: "A question might arise in such case whether a Circuit judge could do more than apply the law to the facts as found by the referee—whether the referee has not been substituted for the jury, his finding being in the nature of a special verdict, with the power on the part of the Circuit judge to hear a motion for a new trial as in ordinary cases of jury trial, or to pronounce judgment as the law might demand. But these questions are not raised. In fact, the consent to the reference may in this case preclude them, as that consent embraced the condition that the referee should report his findings, with his recommendations, to the court, thereby, impliedly at least, agreeing that the court should be the final arbiter below."

quence. The objection of a want of parties could not be taken by demurrer, for the defect of parties did not appear on the face of the complaint, nor was it necessary by answer to do more than meet the case stated in the complaint.

No. 1350. KIBLER v. LUTHER. November Term, 1882.

Plaintiff conveyed a strip of land for valuable consideration to a municipal corporation, with a warranty in words following, to wit: "and I hereby bind myself, &c., to warrant and forever defend all and singular the said premises unto the said in-tenant and wardens, and their successors in office, as public lands, not to be occupied by any building or obstruction of any kind, but to be kept open at all times for the use of the public," &c. Plaintiff brought this action alleging that defendant had built upon and now occupied a portion of said land, and demanded its possession and damages. A demurrer that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that there was a defect of parties defendant, the town council of the corporation, was sustained by the Circuit Court (Pressley, J.) Plaintiff appealed. Held—

That the concluding words of the warranty imposed a duty upon the town, but it was doubtful whether they created a condition, but, if a condition, the grantor could not maintain an action for the land until he had made entry upon it after condition broken, or made claim, if entry was impossible. *Hammond v. under a certain agreement, and testimony was introduced to prove this agreement. This was held error on a previous appeal in this case, reported 13 S. C. 328 [36 Am. Rep. 687]. At the second trial, without any amendment of the pleadings, defendant offered to prove that the account for which the note was given contained overcharges, and that there was nothing due thereon when this note was given. The presiding judge (Aldrich) ruled that this testimony was incompetent. Held, that this ruling was correct, the testimony offered not being pertinent to any issue raised in the pleadings.

*GEDDES v. BOWDEN.

[1. Mechanics' Liens ⇨106.]

A sub-contractor of a sub-contractor is not entitled under chapter CXN., § 7, of the Gen. Stat. of 1872, to a lien for labor performed and materials furnished upon the building erected.

[2. Mechanics' Liens ⇨99.]

The owners of the property cannot be said to have given their "consent," within the meaning of this section, to the furnishing of such labor and material, nor did the contractors, as such, have any authority from, nor were they acting for, the owners, in making their contracts with workmen and others.

[3. Mechanics' Liens ⇨3.]

Sections 8 and 10 of this chapter do not create any right, but relate, simply, to the enforcement of the lien declared in section 7.

[4. Appeal and Error ⇨1178.]

On application, here made, leave was granted to petitioner, on terms, to amend the character of his proceeding against the owners of the premises.

*2

Petition by John Geddes against R. L. Bowden and others, for the enforcement of a lien on the Merchants' Hotel property in Spartanburg city. The Circuit decree, omitting the statement of such facts as are repeated in the opinion, was as follows:

No notice was given by the "owners" to petitioner that they would not be responsible for the work done or material furnished until after the statement was filed. The "owners" never gave any authority to Maxwell, Lyman & Land, or Maxwell & Lyman, to make any contract with petitioner for them; and while their consent may be assumed that the contractors and sub-contractors should employ others, there is no evidence of their consent to be bound by or become a party to any such agreement.

The agreement between petitioner and Maxwell & Lyman was by parol, and it does not appear clearly at what times the petitioner was to be paid, and I incline to the opinion and find that he was entitled to be paid when his work was done. All that part of the building in which the rock work was used has been finished, and the money paid to Maxwell, Lyman & Land by the "owners" pro tanto, leaving still a sufficient balance when the building is completed to pay petitioner's claim.

The contract between the "owners" and "contractors" was a joint contract, and is in writing, and only one or two of the "owners" were present when the contract was made between Maxwell & Lyman and petitioner; and it is not claimed that all of the "owners" ever gave an actual, personal consent to this contract, and there is no evidence of any authority given by the "owners" to either of those who are said to have been present to make any new agreement for them. There was no copartnership between the "owners" in reference to this matter.

In the absence of sufficient proof that there was any contract or agreement on the part of the "owners," or any of them, to pay the petitioner for the rock work, as I understand, his claim relies on the fact that he did this work, or furnished this "labor and materials," under an agreement between himself and Max*well & Lyman, who were themselves sub-contractors under Maxwell, Lyman & Land, and that the "owners" knew of this contract and his compliance with its terms, and never made any objection, but that he was urged by some of them to go on with his work. It is not claimed that this was a good contract to pay the debt of another, because there was no written evidence of it, and we have found above that there was no contract actually made by the "owners," or any of them. Do these facts, therefore, furnish the evidence of the allegation, that in making the agreement with petitioner, Maxwell, Lyman & Land, or, as appears, Maxwell & Lyman "rightfully acted for and by the consent of the 'owners'?"

There being in fact no such contract on the part of the owners, or authority to bind them, did the authority grow out of the relations of the parties, and the consent follow from the facts as above established? Or, in other words, can a sub-contractor, or, as in this case, a sub-contractor under a sub-contractor, have a lien on the property of the owners in the absence of any positive agreement between himself and the owners? If so, then the claims on this building will be at least four-fold: 1. To Maxwell, Lyman & Land; 2. Maxwell & Lyman; 3. John Geddes; 4. The laborers who were employed by John Geddes, and paid by him.

In the absence of the complete texts of the acts of the various States on the subject of mechanics' liens, the text-writers give us very little aid in construing the act, and it has had very little judicial interpretation in this State. Resort must be had, therefore, to the words of our act, Gen. Stat. 550, et seq. The lien is created by section 7, and the subsequent sections only control and limit or provide for its enforcement. They do not profess to create any new right.

If the labor or materials are furnished by virtue of an agreement with the owner, there is no difficulty in the way. What is consent in the sense of the act? There must be a debt by consent of the owner. "Consent is an agreement to something proposed, and differs from assent."—Bouvier's Law Dic. "Consent—We generally use this word in cases where power, rights and claims are concerned. We give consent when we *yield that which we have a right to withhold."—Webster's Dic. It seems to me, therefore, that in this section the word "consent" is used in the sense of agreement or contract, if not express, at least implied. Any other construction of the act would seem to be injurious to the interest of those whom the law was intended to protect, and work great hardships to those who are making improvements on their lands.

Such a construction is intimated by the court in Murray v. Earle, 13 S. C. 87; and the case of Watson v. Columbia Bridge Company, 13 S. C. 433, is not inconsistent with it, because in that case the contract was made with Neagle, who was really the owner of the property. The "owners" of the property in this case, under their written agreement with the contractors, had no right to object to any contract which the contractors saw fit to make. Their consent was unnecessary, and their interference would have been impertinent.

It is true that sections 8 and 10 seem to point to a different construction of the seventh section. Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, under the definition of consent gives us an instance, the "implied consent" in cases of estoppel, and if the word "consent" in section 7 is used in this sense, the above construction is not inconsistent with the provisions of sections 8 and 10. However, this may be, sections 8 and 10 create no right not given in section 7, and if they cannot be reconciled by the court they can be amended by proper authorities to suit future cases.

Whatever opinions I may have entertained on this subject heretofore, I am satisfied that a proper construction of the act does not give any lien for "labor" or "materials" furnished for a building, which is not based on a debt founded on an agreement express or implied, with the owner of the land or some interest therein. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the petition in this case be dismissed with costs.

From this decree the petitioner appealed.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendants, Bowden and others, who are styled, in the title of the case, "owners," entered into a written contract with their co-defendants, Maxwell, Lyman & Land, styled "contractors," for the construction of a building on nine adjoining lots in the city of Spartanburg; the first floor of which was to be divided into nine stores, and an entrance to the hotel, which embraced the second and third floors of the building. The stores are the separate property of the several owners of the lots, while the hotel and the entrance thereto belong to them jointly. The defendants, Maxwell, Lyman & Land, sub-let the contract for the brick and rock work to two of their number, Maxwell & Lyman, and they, in turn, made a sub-contract with the appellant for the rock work. Under the contract between the owners and Maxwell, Lyman & Land, the latter were to furnish all the material necessary and proper for completing the building and erect and finish the same, in consideration whereof the owners agreed to pay them the sum of $22,500, in six installments, as the work progressed. All these installments had been paid before these proceedings were commenced, except the last, which was not then payable, as the building had not then been fully completed.

The appellant having completed his contract with Maxwell & Lyman, for the rock work, commenced these proceedings to enforce a lien upon the building and the lots upon which it is situated, under the provisions of chapter CXX., Gen. Stat., 1872, p. 550. The fundamental question raised by the appeal is, whether the appellant, who is a sub-contractor of a sub-contractor, is entitled to the lien which he is here seeking to enforce, and as we are of opinion that he is not, the other questions suggested cannot arise and need not be considered.

It is difficult to understand how a lien can be created, unless there is some debt to be secured by it, and to create a debt there must be some contract, either express or implied, between the parties. The appellant here is seeking to set up a lien upon the property of persons with whom he has made no contract, either express or implied, but, on the contrary, his claim grows out of a contract made with a third party. He claims, however, that *he is entitled to this lien under the provisions of the statute above referred to. So that the practical question is, whether, under a proper construction of that statute, the appellant, who is a sub-contractor of a sub-contractor, can claim the benefit of its provisions.

Section 7, of chapter CXX., of the Gen. Stat., above referred to, creates the lien claimed, and is in the following words: "Any person to whom a debt is due for labor performed or furnished, or for materials furnished and actually used in the erection, alteration or repair of any building or structure upon any real estate, by virtue of an agreement with, or by consent of, the owner of such building or structure, or any person having authority from, or rightfully acting for, such owners, in procuring or furnishing such labor or materials, shall have a lien upon such building or structure, and upon the interest of the owner thereof in the lot of land upon which the same is situated, to secure the payment of the debt so due to him, and the costs which may arise in enforcing such lien under this chapter, except as is provided in the following sections."

To entitle a person, therefore, to the lien provided for in this statute, two things must concur. 1st. There must be a debt due to the person claiming the lien "for labor performed" or furnished, or for materials furnished and actually used in the construction of the building upon which the lien is claimed. 2d. Such labor must be performed or materials furnished "by virtue of an agreement with, or by consent of, the owner of such building or structure, or any person having authority from, or rightfully acting for, such owner in procuring or furnishing such labor or materials." In this case there seems to be no doubt that there is a debt due to the appellant for labor performed and materials furnished and actually used in the construction of the building, and the only question is whether such labor was performed and materials furnished "by virtue of an agreement with, or by consent of," the owners, or by virtue of an agreement with, or by consent of, "any person having authority from, or rightfully acting for, such owners." It is not pretended that there was any express agreement between the owners and the appellant, but, on the contrary, the agreement under which the labor and *materials were furnished by the appellant was made with a third party, Maxwell & Lyman.

It is, however, contended that the labor and materials were furnished by appellant with the "consent of" the owners, and it is necessary, therefore, to determine the meaning of the term "consent" as used in this statute. The word "consent" ordinarily implies choice, and one can scarcely be regarded as giving his consent to that which he has no right to object to. In the experience of life a man is oftentimes compelled to accept results, in the sense that he makes no opposition or objection thereto, for the reason that he has no right or power so to do, but he cannot, in any proper sense of the term, be regarded as consenting to them unless he has the right and the power to exercise a choice, to consent or object thereto. As is well said by Mr. Chief Justice Simpson, in Gray v. Walker, 16 S. C. 147, in construing this statute: "Consent here, we think, implies something more than a mere acquiescence in a state of things already in existence. It implies an agreement to that which, but for the consent, could not exist, and which the party consenting has a right to forbid." Now in this case the owners of the property, having made a contract with Maxwell, Lyman & Land to construct the building and furnish all the materials necessary and proper for the purpose, had parted with all power or right of control, and any interference on their part with those who were employed by the contractors would have been, as the Circuit judge says, impertinent. They cannot, therefore, in any proper sense of the term, be said to have given their "consent" to that which they had no right to forbid.

Nor can it be said with any propriety that Maxwell & Lyman, in making the contract with the appellant for the rock work, had any authority from, or were rightfully acting for, the owners. The object which the owners had in view, in letting the entire contract to Maxwell, Lyman & Land, unquestionably was to relieve themselves from the trouble and responsibility of making contracts with the laborers, mechanics and materialmen for the labor and material necessary to be employed in the construction of the building; and if Maxwell & Lyman, or even Maxwell, Lyman & Land, could be regarded as their agents, in *making all the contracts for such labor and materials, this object would not only be entirely defeated, but they would be placed in a much worse position than if they had made no contract at all.

It is true that some of the terms used in sections 8 and 10 of the statute do seem to point to a construction different from that which we have adopted; but, as the Circuit judge very properly remarks, these sections are not designed to create any right, but simply to control and limit, or provide for the enforcement of the right created by section 7. The terms used in these subsequent sections must, therefore, be so construed as to conform to the proper construction of the language used in section 7, where the right is created.

The authorities elsewhere do not seem to be in full accord upon the question which we have been considering, and we deem it unnecessary to enter upon a consideration of them, as the construction which we have adopted has received the sanction of this court in two cases, Murray v. Earle, 13 S. C. 89, where the matter was incidentally mentioned, and Gray v. Walker, supra, where the point was distinctly decided.

There is also another view which supports our construction, derived from the internal evidence furnished by the statute. In section 47 of the same chapter of the Gen. Stat., p. 555, providing for a lien on ships and vessels, sub-contractors are specifically mentioned, while in the section which we are called upon to construe, they are not mentioned at all. This affords a strong indication that while the legislature intended that class of persons to be protected by the lien provided for in the one case, they had no such intention in the other case.

Finally, the appellant contends that even if this court shall agree with the Circuit judge that the lien which he claims cannot be sustained, yet, under the liberal provisions of the code, his case should be retained and judgment rendered against those who contracted with him for the balance due on such contract, and that he be subrogated to such rights as they may be able to establish against the owners. This view of the case was not presented in the Circuit Court, and, therefore, this court, which exercises appellate jurisdiction only in cases of this kind, cannot undertake to consider the case in this aspect, and is not *to be understood as intimating any opinion as to the merits of appellant's claim when it is thus presented. But, under the liberal provisions of the code, we see no reason why the appellant should not be permitted to litigate his claim in the new form suggested, and, for this purpose, the case will be remanded to the Circuit Court with leave to the appellant to amend his proceedings in such way as he may be advised is necessary to present his claim in the form suggested, with leave, also, to the defendants to answer or demur to such amended proceedings, and to litigate the claim in its new form, as they may be advised.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, in so far as it adjudges that the appellant has no lien upon the building mentioned, and the lots upon which it is situated, be affirmed; but in so far as it adjudges that the petition be dismissed, that it be reversed. It is further adjudged that the appellant pay all the costs which have accrued up to this time, including the costs of this appeal; that the costs which may hereafter accrue shall be provided for in the judgment hereafter to be rendered, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

Before Fraser, J., Spartanburg, June, 1881.

Action for partition commenced in May, 1879, by James A. Wingo and his children against M. Parker and W. F., her husband, and Elizabeth Davis. The case turns principally upon the construction of the following papers, purporting to be renunciations of inheritance, to wit:

I. State of Florida, Madison county—I, John W. Anderson, do hereby certify unto all whom it may concern, that Elizabeth Davis, the wife of the within named Noah Davis, did this day appear before me, and upon being privately and separately examined by me did declare that she did at least seven days before the examination actually join her husband in executing such release, and did then and still freely and voluntarily and without any manner of compulsion dread, or fear of any person or persons whomsoever renounce, release and forever relinquish unto the within named James Vernon his heirs and assigns all her interest and estate of in or to all and singular the premises within mentioned and released, and further, said Elizabeth Davis did declare that the within deed or conveyance was positively and bona fide executed at least seven days before her present examination.

Elizabeth Davis.

Justice of the Peace.

II. The State of South Carolina, Spartanburg county—I, Simpson Bobo, do hereby certify unto all whom it may concern, that Rachel Wingo, the wife of the within named James A. Wingo, did this day appear before me, and upon being privately and separately examined by me, did declare that she did on the fifth instant join her husband in executing the within deed, and that she did then and still does freely, voluntarily and without any compulsion dread or fear of any per-

Not. Pub.

Other facts of the case and the Circuit decree are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for appellants.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson and S. T. McCravy, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. This proceeding was commenced for partition of certain real estate in the possession of appellants, and thereupon a controversy arose as to the title, growing out of the following facts:

The land in question was devised by Samuel Brice to his wife, Nancy, for life, and at her death to his two children, Rachel and Elizabeth. Rachel intermarried with the plaintiff, James A. Wingo, and died intestate in 1864, leaving as her heirs-at-law her husband and her three children, who are the plaintiffs in this action. Elizabeth intermarried with Noah Davis, who died since the commencement of this action, to which he was a party defendant, but an order has been taken, by consent, that "the name of Noah Davis as defendant herein be struck out, and that the action do proceed as though he had never been a party thereto." Nancy Brice, the life-tenant, died in 1877 and this action was commenced in 1879.

The appellants, Parker and wife, while not being able to show title in themselves, have undertaken to show that the title passed out of Rachel Wingo in her life-time, and hence that the plaintiffs, as her heirs, have no right to claim partition, and also that the title has passed out of the defendant,

Elizabeth Davis, who *joins in the prayer for partition, and hence that the complaint should be dismissed. For this purpose appellants rely upon two deeds, one from Noah Davis and wife, Elizabeth, to J. J. Vernon, dated June 15th, 1858, upon which is endorsed a certificate which is claimed to be a renunciation of her inheritance, taken by a justice of the peace in the State of Florida, where Mrs. Davis then resided, and the other a deed from Nancy Brice, James A. Wingo and wife, Rachel, to O. E. Edwards, dated November 5th, 1859, upon which is endorsed a certificate which is claimed to be a renunciation of Mrs. Wingo's inheritance, taken by a notary public in this State on November 12th, 1859. The evidence tended strongly to show that this last-mentioned deed, which contained the usual clause of warranty, was executed simply for the purpose of enabling Edwards to collect the rents and sell the property when an opportunity offered, the grantors being about to remove to the West, and that it was really intended to be a power of attorney rather than an absolute conveyance.

The Circuit judge held: First. That the deed to Vernon was insufficient to pass the title of Mrs. Davis, on account of two defects in the renunciation of inheritance: (1). That it was not taken by any officer authorized so to do; (2). That it did not comply with the requisitions of the statute, inasmuch as it did not purport to release "the inheritance" of Mrs. Davis, but only "all her interest and estate," and, therefore, that Mrs. Davis, her husband having died, was entitled to her share of the land. Second. He held that the deed from Nancy Brice, James A. Wingo and wife to Edwards, was not sufficient to pass the title of Mrs. Wingo on account of several defects in the renunciation of inheritance endorsed upon it: (1). Because it was taken by a notary public, who had not then any authority so to do; (2). That full seven days had not elapsed after the execution of the deed, before the renunciation of inheritance was taken, the deed having been executed on the fifth, and the renunciation taken on the 12th day of November, 1859; (3). The deed, with the renunciation of inheritance endorsed upon it, was never recorded until after the commencement of this action, and after the death of Mrs. Wingo, and of the grantee Ed-

plaintiffs as are the children *of Mrs. Wingo are entitled to share in the land. Third. That if James A. Wingo can make it appear that the deed to Edwards was intended only as a power of attorney, he is also entitled to his share, as heir of his wife; but if it shall be made to appear that said deed was intended as an absolute conveyance, then his warranty will bar his right to a share in the land, and the heirs or devisees of Edwards should be made parties for the purpose of determining this question.

From the decree Parker and wife appeal on the following grounds: That the Circuit judge erred, 1st. In holding that the deed of Noah Davis and wife to J. J. Vernon, executed in the State of Florida, and the renunciation of the wife "of all her interest and estate" before a justice of the peace in said State, was not sufficient to convey all the interest of the husband and wife in the premises. 2d. In holding that the deed of James A. Wingo and wife to O. E. Edwards, and the renunciation of inheritance by the wife, before a notary public, was not sufficient to convey all the interest of the husband and wife in the premises. 3d. In not holding that whatever interest James A. Wingo may have had in the premises was conveyed out of him by his warranty clause contained in the deed.

At the time the conveyances which are here brought into question were executed, a married woman could not convey her estate of inheritance unless she followed with scrupulous exactness the provisions of the statute conferring that power upon her. This will be seen by reference to the cases of Brown v. Spand, 2 Mill. Con. R. 12; Hays v. Hays, 5 Rich. 38; McCreary v. McCreary, 9 Rich. Eq. 34; McLaurin v. Wilson, 16 S. C. 402. As is said in Pitts v. Wicker, 3 Hill 199: "The right of inheritance of a married woman is protected with jealous vigilance by the law. She cannot be deprived of it but by a scrupulous adherence to the statute providing the mode in which a married woman may part with her inheritance in land."

The act of 1795, 5 Stat. 257, which was the law in force at the date of these renunciations, declared, in the most specific terms, the requisites necessary to a valid renunciation of inheritance by a married woman, and the question for us to determine *is, whether the renunciations relied on in this case are in accordance with the provisions of that act.

First, as to the renunciation on the deed to Vernon. We are not aware of any statute which confers upon a justice of the peace of another State the power to take renunciations of inheritance of land in this State, and in the absence of any such statute, a renunciation taken by a justice of the peace in Florida, has no more force and effect here than if taken by any other officer, or even by a private citizen of that State. The only officers competent to take such renunciations are those named in the act of 1795, and as a justice of the peace of another State is not there named, his act in taking such a renunciation is a mere nullity.

Another defect in this certificate is that it does not purport to release Mrs. Davis' "inheritance," but only "all her interest and estate," which may be something less than an estate of inheritance. The act of 1795 contains two distinct provisions—one by which a wife may renounce her dower, which is but a life-estate, and the other by which she may renounce and release her inheritance, the fee-simple. In the former, the words used are, "all her interest and estate, and also all her right and claim of dower," while in the latter the provision is for the release of "all her estate, interest and inheritance." We think it plain, from what is said by Nott, J., in Brown v. Spand, supra, and by O'Neill, J., in Hays v. Hays, supra, that the word "inheritance," like the word "heirs" in a deed, is a material word, necessary to be used in order to carry the fee. We agree, therefore, with the Circuit judge, that Mrs. Davis, since the death of her husband, is entitled to her share of the land.

Next, as to the alleged renunciation of inheritance by Mrs. Wingo. The first objection urged against this renunciation—that it was taken by a notary public who was not one of the officers before whom the statute provided that renunciation of inheritance could be taken—we do not think well founded. It is true that a notary public is not one of the officers mentioned in section 2 of the act of 1795, but a justice of the quorum is there mentioned, and by the third section of the act of 1804, 5 State. 479, a notary public is declared to be, ex officio, a justice of *the quorum, and, therefore, as such, he could take a renunciation of inheritance.

The next objection, however, is more formidable, and, in fact, is, in our judgment, fatal. It appears in this case, that the renunciation was taken within seven days, after the execution of the deed, and not "after the expiration of seven days," as the statute expressly requires—the deed bearing date on the fifth, and the renunciation on the twelfth of the same month; and we are unable to see by what authority we can dispense with this positive statutory requirement, by any forced construction. The deed having been executed on the fifth, and the law taking no account of fractions of a day, the renunciation could not legally be taken until after the expiration of seven days, and this could not be until after the expiration of the last moment of the twelfth, and hence if taken at any time during that day, it would be before, and not after, the expiration of seven days. Bruce v. Perry, 11 Rich. 121.

But there is still another fatal defect in this renunciation of inheritance. The statute requires that an addition to the certificate, shall "invariably" be made, to the following effect, to wit: "That the woman did declare that the release was positively and bona fide executed at least seven days before such her examination." No such addition was made to the certificate here in question, and, indeed, could not have been truthfully made, as the seven days had not expired, and certainly no court would undertake to dispense with that which a statute declares shall "invariably" be done.

As to the other objection, based upon a failure to record the renunciation of inheritance during the life-time of the married woman, we do not think it can be sustained. It is true that the language used in the statute—"Such renunciation shall not be considered as being complete or legal until the same shall be recorded"—is very strong, but not stronger than the language used in the marriage settlement act, under which it has been held that such a deed is good without being recorded, not only between the parties but also as to all persons having notice of it. Fowke v. Woodward, Speers Eq. 233; Gibbes v. Cobb, 7 Rich. Eq. 54.

*Hence, whatever may have been our view if the question was res integra, yet since the case of Kottman v. Ayer, 1 Strobb. 552, overruling Hillegas v. Hartley, 1 Hill Ch. 106, expressly recognized in the recent case of Campbell v. Moon, 16 S. C. 107, we think it has been conclusively settled that the object of recording is notice, and where persons have notice, as the parties to an instrument always have, a failure to record it does not invalidate the instrument. As to absolute conveyances under the act of 1785, see Tart v. Crawford, 1 McCord 265; McFall v. Sherrard, Harp. 296; Knotts v. Geiger, 4 Rich. 34; Ingre v. Phillips, 3 Strobb. 565. As to a mortgage of real estate under the act of 1785, see Martin v. Sale, Bailey Eq. 4. As to mortgage of personalty under act of 1698, see Bank v. Gourdin, Speers Eq. 439. As to renunciation of inheritance, see Kottman v. Ayer, supra; Campbell v. Moon, supra. As to a lease under the act of 1817, see Anderson v. Harris, 1 Bailey 315. As to marriage settlements under the act of 1785 and 1792, see Givens v. Branford, 2 McCord 152 [13 Am. Dec. 702]; White v. Palmer, McMull. Eq. 115. As to marriage settlements under act of 1823, see Fowke v. Woodward, supra; Gibbes v. Cobb, supra. As to agricultural liens under the act of 1866, see Loyns v. Tedder, 7 S. C. 69. These cases have so conclusively settled the rule in this State as to the object of recording, that in the face of them we do not feel at liberty to say that a failure to record a renunciation of inheritance renders it invalid as to persons having actual notice of it.

The only remaining question is that raised by the third ground of appeal. We agree with the Circuit judge that, if the deed to Edwards was intended to be a simple power of attorney, the clause of warranty contained in it would not operate as a bar to the right of James A. Wingo to recover his share of the land as one of the heirs of his deceased wife; but that, if the deed was intended as an absolute conveyance, then such conveyance, by virtue of this warranty, would operate, by way of estoppel, as a transfer of the title subsequently acquired by him, upon the principles established by the cases of Reeder ads. Craig, 3 McCord 411; Harvin v. Dodge, Dudley 25, recognized in Starke v. Harrison, 5 Rich. 7.

If, therefore, the deed was intended as an absolute conveyance, *although Wingo, at the time it was executed, only had an estate during coverture, yet, by virtue of the principles and authorities above stated, the estate which he subsequently acquired as an heir of his wife would pass. But if the deed was only intended as a power of attorney, it is difficult to conceive how any estate could pass under it, either the estate which he had at the time or that which he subsequently acquired as heir of his wife. We concur also with the Circuit judge that until the heirs or devisees of Edwards were made parties or released any interest they might have, it was not proper to determine the question as to the character of the deed.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

OLIVER v. SALE.

[1. Sheriffs and Constables ¶67.]

The sheriff's commissions for moneys collected on execution are part of the costs of the case, and, therefore, payable by the defendant.

[2. Execution ¶328.]

Where a sheriff is ruled to show cause why he has failed to pay over money collected by him on execution, and he returns that such money is the costs of plaintiff's attorney, and that such attorney is indebted to the respondent to that amount for services rendered, the rule should be discharged and the parties left to their action at law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 987; Dec. Dig. ¶328.]

Before Aldrich, J., Charleston, July, 1882.
The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. W. M. Thomas, for appellant.
Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff had two executions in the office of Hugh Ferguson, sheriff of Charleston county, against the defendant, upon which the money had been *collected, but not paid over as alleged, and the proceeding below, from which this appeal comes, was a rule upon the sheriff to show cause why he should not be attached for failing to pay over $60.50, the amount of the second judgment, and $13.50, the amount of the first, in his hands.

The sheriff returned for answer to this rule that he held the $60.50 because the same were the costs coming to William M. Thomas, Esq., the plaintiff's attorney, who was indebted to the respondent for certain fees and charges, as sheriff of the county, for service of papers and other work in the sheriff's office, done at the special instance and request of said Thomas; and that he retained the $13.50 because he was entitled to receive that much commissions on the moneys he had collected for the plaintiff.

On hearing the return, the judge ordered the rule to be discharged. The plaintiff gave notice of appeal on the following exceptions: 1. That the sheriff could not retain the $60.50 for costs due him in his office on proceedings between other parties. 2. That he could do so only by a levy upon the fund, and he had no execution. 3. That the $13.50 should have been collected by the sheriff out of the defendant.

In the act fixing the costs and fees of attorneys and other officers, it is provided that in civil cases these shall become entitled to their fees and costs as of course, accordingly as the action may be terminated, and to be inserted in the judgment against the losing party. This act is now found in section 2425 of the General Statutes. Commissions on moneys collected on executions are fixed as part of the sheriff's fees, as an officer of the court, and, under the above act, are thrown on the losing party. As we understand, it has been the uniform custom throughout the State, since the act of 1839, for the sheriff to collect his commissions from the defendant in the execution in accordance with this law. We think, therefore, it was error on the part of the judge to discharge the rule, so far as the commissions, $13.50, were involved. The plaintiff was entitled to this money as a part of his original debt, and the sheriff should have been ordered to pay it over to him.

As to the $60.50, there was a preliminary question of fact involved. The sheriff claimed that the money in his hands did *not belong to the plaintiff, but to Mr. Thomas, his attorney, which he was entitled to absorb by virtue of a counter-claim held by him against Mr. Thomas. Where a question of fact arises upon a rule against the sheriff raising doubt as to the ownership of the money in his hands, the usual course is to discharge the rule and leave the parties to litigate their rights by suit.

As was said by O'Neill, J., in the case of Dawkins v. Pearson, 2 Bailey 620: "The proceeding by rule against the sheriff supposes that he is willfully in default, and the judgment of the court is that he is in contempt; anything, therefore, which shows that he is not in contempt ought to discharge the rule. * * * Where there is any doubt as to whom the money should be rightfully paid, the correct course is to discharge the rule and leave the parties to litigate and determine their rights by a suit. A rule will always go where the legal rights of the parties can be made to appear from a conceded statement of facts. But where the facts are disputed, and the law depends on their development, the parties should be left to their action at law, or an issue will be directed at law to try them." Cooper v. Scott, 2 McM. 150. See, also, the case of Dawson v. Dewan, 12 Rich. 499.

Under these authorities, we think the judge was authorized to discharge the rule as to this money. The sheriff had collected the amount; he was, therefore, not in contempt in neglecting or refusing to enforce the execution; and if the amount in his hands really belonged to Mr. Thomas, which does not seem to have been denied, and if, at the same time, he had a valid and legal counter-claim against Thomas, why should he not be allowed an opportunity to set it off?

It is the judgment of this court that the order below be modified so as to reverse so much thereof as discharged the rule with reference to the $13.50 commissions (which should be made absolute), and to affirm so much as discharged it with reference to the $60.50.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff's intestate, while walking on the track of defendant's railroad, picked up a small torpedo which he saw lying on the track.

While he was examining this instrument (the character of which it seems was wholly unknown to him) it exploded, causing his death almost instantly. This action was brought by the plaintiff, his administrator, to recover damages, for the benefit of himself and of his wife, the father and mother of the deceased. The basis of the action is negligence on the part of the defendant, and this is charged in the complaint as follows, to wit: "That defendant wrongfully, negligently and carelessly placed on their track an explosive and dangerous instrument, commonly called a torpedo, and wrongfully, negligently and defaultingly left the torpedo on the track," &c.

The testimony of the plaintiff showed that the torpedo had been placed on the track on the morning of November 5th, 1881, the day on which the accident occurred, as a danger signal *to guard against collisions, and in accordance with the rules of the company prescribing and regulating such matters; that the deceased, with another person, who were on their way to Columbia from some point above, in order to save distance had left the highway, and was on the track at a point where, for years, all persons who desired to do so had been accustomed to walk the track or along a path on its margin; that at this point he discovered this torpedo, when he picked it up, saying to his companion, "We had better keep this, it might have money in it;" that the deceased had two axes upon his shoulder, and while his companion was looking the other way an explosion took place, the deceased falling with his head outside of the rail, and one of the axes just in front of him. The companion was unable to say whether the deceased was kneeling down examining the torpedo with his axe, or how or why the explosion took place.

Upon the close of this testimony the defendant moved for a non-suit on the ground of want of evidence to sustain plaintiff's alleged case, because, first, there was no testimony to support the charge of negligence; and, second, even if there was, yet plaintiff's testimony showed contributory negligence by the deceased; and, therefore, the alleged cause of action was wholly without foundation in evidence. This motion was refused, and the trial proceeded to a conclusion, the jury rendering a verdict for the plaintiff.

The defendant requested the presiding judge to charge certain legal propositions found below, which he declined, and the defendant has appealed, assigning error because the judge refused the motion for non-suit, and also declined to charge the propositions requested. These propositions were as follows:

1. "That the use of a railroad track is for its owners, and those acting under them, its employés; and, except at crossings where the public have a right of way, the man who walks upon a railroad track does so at his peril. If deceased was upon the track of the defendant without lawful authority and using it simply for his own convenience, he was a trespasser, and the company was under no obligation to take precautions against possible injuries to trespassers.

2. "That to entitle the plaintiff to recover

he must prove *negligence in the defendant, and no want of ordinary care on the part of the deceased; and even when there is negligence on the part of the defendant, if the deceased, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided injury, and did not, he is the author of his own wrong and cannot recover.

3. "That if the jury believe that the accident was caused by the effort of the deceased to open the torpedo, then he was the author of his own injury and cannot recover, and the verdict must be for the defendant."

The defendant also excepted "because his Honor did instruct the jury that 'want of due care upon the one side does not relieve the other;' and also 'if plaintiff exercised due care, and defendant did not, he is entitled to recover; if defendant exercised due care, and plaintiff did not, he is not entitled to recover,' and failed to instruct the jury that if there was mutual negligence the plaintiff could not recover.

2. "Because his Honor, in the final clause of his charge, in effect limited the jury to the two issues only, of negligence on the part of the defendant and no negligence on the part of the deceased on the one hand, and of no negligence upon the part of the defendant on the other, and did not instruct the jury that there was a third issue, and that if there was negligence by the defendant, but that, nevertheless, the deceased, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the injury, then that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover."

We will consider first the exceptions founded upon the refusal of his Honor to grant the motion of non-suit. A non-suit is not only proper but it is the legal right of the defendant where there is a total failure of evidence to sustain the plaintiff's case, as alleged in the complaint. If the plaintiff has introduced any testimony, the force and effect of which has to be considered, then the case must go to the jury, because under our system of judicature the jury is the only constitutional tribunal authorized to weigh testimony. But in every case there may be a preliminary question, which is addressed to the judge, to wit: Has any testimony been introduced bearing upon the points at issue? If so, there is nothing left for the judge but the legal points involved, and the facts must be submitted to the jury; if not, however, a *non-suit is proper. Holley v. Walker, 7 S. C. 144; Miller v. Bolt, 16 S. C. 636; Boykin v. Watts, 6 S. C. 83.

Now the gist of this action is negligence on the part of the defendant. This was alleged in the complaint, and to entitle the plaintiff to go to the jury on that question it was necessary before the defense was put to proof, for the plaintiff to make out at least a prima facie showing. The defendant denies, first, that such showing was made; and, second, that if made it was overthrown by the additional testimony of the plaintiff proving contributory negligence by the deceased.

We do not think that this second ground could have been considered by the judge. That involved a question of fact, the truth of which depended upon the force and effect of the evidence touching that question, and before the judge could have reached the conclusion that contributory negligence by the deceased appeared, he would have been compelled not to consider simply whether any testimony had been offered upon that subject, but whether the fact had been made out that the testimony was sufficient in its force and effect to establish it. This would have been invading the province of the jury, and therefore unwarranted in this State under our constitution. Elsewhere the cases are conflicting.

This exception then must stand or fall upon the first ground. Was there a total failure by plaintiff to make out a prima facie case of negligence by defendant? It may be said in general terms that negligence, legally understood, is the "absence of due care." The presiding judge thus defined it below, and the doctrine is so familiar that this definition may be adopted without citing authorities. In a special case it is the absence of such care as the business or matter producing the injury may demand, and the party in charge bound to bestow, out of due regard to the rights of others. This being a material fact, indeed, the essential fact in all actions like the present, it must be proved affirmatively by the plaintiff.

Now let us examine the evidence introduced by the plaintiff in this case, under the right of these principles, with the view to determine whether there was any testimony bearing upon this point. The testimony offerred by the plaintiff has been briefly *stated above, and there is no controversy as to the points to which it was directed. It was intended to show, and did show, that the torpedo was placed on the railroad track by the defendant; it showed that this railroad track was the exclusive property of the defendant; that this torpedo was placed at the point where the deceased discovered it, as a danger signal, under established regulations, made deliberately by the company; that the deceased, while traveling through the country, made use of the track as a road upon which to walk, not by any express permission of defendant, but by its sufferance, arising from the fact that others had for years been in the habit of thus using it; that he found this torpedo, of the nature of which he was entirely ignorant, loose upon the track; that he picked it up and examined it, saying that "there might be money in it." His mode of examination is unknown, whether by striking it with an axe or otherwise, but it exploded and caused his death.

This is the testimony as admitted by both sides. Is any portion of it pertinent to the issue of negligence? or do the facts thus proved evolve, as a legal conclusion, this negligence? There is certainly no affirmative testimony that there was an absence of due care by the defendant in placing this torpedo upon its own track. There was none directed to the point, that due care required the company to place it at one point more than another, or that it should be left at the one side more than another, or loose upon the track, so far as outsiders were concerned. The defendant did nothing but place a torpedo upon its track, and, as it appears, for a commendable purpose. We do not find a particle of affirmative testimony reported in the "Case" tending to show that this was done without due care. The remaining testimony was intended to show what part the unfortunate deceased took, and it has no direct reference to the negligence of the defendant.

Now take the facts as a whole on the plaintiff's showing, and should negligence by defendant follow prima facie as a legal conclusion therefrom, independent of any direct testimony upon this question? We think not. The railroad track belonged to the defendant; it certainly had the right to take every reasonable precaution to prevent collisions. There was no evidence that

*26

*the torpedo was extraordinarily explosive; no evidence that an accident had ever occurred before in the use of such instruments; no evidence that the company might have anticipated a fatal result like this; no evidence that the torpedo was so explosive and so dangerous as reasonably to require of the defendant a notice to the public that it was being used; no evidence that the deceased had been authorized by the company to make use of its track as a highway, or that they positively knew that it was being so used. In fine, no evidence except the naked facts that the defendant had placed the torpedo upon its track for a good purpose, and that the deceased, by intermeddling with it for a bad purpose, had brought upon himself the terrible calamity which resulted from its explosion.

We think, that at the close of plaintiff's case below, there was a total want of testimony as to the defendant's negligence, the gist of the action, and, therefore, the non-suit should have been granted; and, in such case, under the ruling of Sampson & Wyatt v. Singer Manufacturing Co., 5 S. C. 465, and Willis v. Knox, 5 S. C. 476, a new trial is proper.

As to the two last exceptions in which error is assigned, because the presiding judge failed to charge that there was a third class, in addition to the two presented by him to the jury, to wit, a class where there is mutual negligence. We do not feel at liberty to consider these exceptions, because the proposition insisted upon, though perhaps sound as a legal principle, was not brought to the attention of the judge. A proposition charged by the judge may be made the ground of exception, but a failure to charge can only be made so when a request is made, and it is refused by the judge. Abrahams v. Kelly & Barrett, 2 S. C. 238.

The last matter to be considered is, the refusal of his Honor to charge the three propositions requested by the defendant, and found above. We do not think that the refusal of the judge to charge these propositions as stated, was such error as to constitute substantial ground for exception. No doubt that the use of a railroad track is for its owners, and those acting under them, except at crossings, where the public have a right of way, as stated in the first part of the first request. Mulherrin v. Delaware, &c., R. R. Co., 81 Pa. 366; Philadelphia & Reading R. Co. v. Hummel, 44 Pa. St. 375; 1 Thomp. Negl. 457. But it does not follow universally, and in every case, that a man who walks upon a railroad track, does so at his peril, as to all dangers which he may encounter and under all circumstances.

As an illustration: Suppose in this instance, the defendant, knowing that its track was being trespassed upon by parties unauthorizedly appropriating it as a track or road to walk upon, and to break up this use, had placed a dangerous explosive instrument thereon, likely to explode from mere contact, which was concealed from view, with no notice or advertisement to the public of the facts, and a traveler, though technically a trespasser, had been injured thereby, could it be claimed as a legal proposition that, under such circumstances, the company would be exempt from liability? We think not.

So, too, although the second part of the request may have been good technical law, to wit: "That if the deceased was upon the track of the defendant without lawful authority, and using it for his own convenience, he was a trespasser, and the company were under no obligation to take precautions against possible injuries to trespassers;" yet this principle could not have shielded the defendant from such injury as may have been produced by its negligence, if any, in every case without exception. It would, no doubt, require a much stronger case to make out negligence as to a trespasser than is required in ordinary cases, but we have found no case which goes to the extent of declaring that a trespasser has no protection. 2 Thomp. Negl. 1162, in notis.

The general rule is, perhaps, as defendant requested, but it is subject to several modifications. It does not exempt from liability the owners of lands who permit pitfalls and obstructions to remain on them so near the highway that, when combined with the ordinary accidents of travel, they result in injury to travelers. There is a class, too, of cases, where such proprietors are held liable for injuries to children, although trespassing at the time, because, from the peculiar nature and open and exposed position of the dangerous defect or agent, the owners should reasonably anticipate such an injury. And there are other similar cases *where the general doctrine above does not apply in full. 1 Thomp. Negl. 304, and the cases cited in the notes. In such cases the question of negligence is still open, and it is for the jury. We think, therefore, it would have been error in the judge to have charged broadly, and without the proper qualification, the proposition requested.

Nor do we think the second request could have been charged in full. The latter portion is, no doubt, sound law, to wit: "That even where there is negligence on the part of the defendant, if the deceased, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the injury, and did not, he is the author of his own injury, and cannot recover." This is nothing more than the well-established principle, that where there is contributory negligence on the part of the injured party to the extent of its being one of the proximate causes of the injury, then the courts will not undertake to graduate or apportion the damages according to the contribution from either side, but will leave the matter as they find it. Gunter v. Graniteville Manufacturing Co., 15 S. C. 443, and the cases there cited.

If this had been a distinct request, made by itself, it would have been error to refuse it. In fact, as we read the charge in one portion, it was distinctly laid down, though, to some extent, subsequently modified, or rather left out. But the objection to the request is, that it incorporated several propositions, all of which could not be charged, and the rule is that the judge is not called upon to disintegrate the request and take it up in its several parts, charging such as are sound, and rejecting the unsound. On the contrary, he takes it as a whole, and considers it as a whole. Here, this request embraced, in addition to the one just discussed, the following also, to wit: That to entitle the plaintiff to recover, he must prove negligence in the defendants, and no want of ordinary care on the part of the deceased. In other words, that the plaintiff's cause of action rested in the first instance, not simply upon the negligence of the defendant, but also upon the exercise of due care upon the part of the deceased, and that the burden of proof, as, to both of these elements, was upon the plaintiff.

It is a general rule that the burden of proof is upon the *party who maintains the affirmative of the issue. In other words, he who asserts a fact necessary to sustain an action must prove it; and he who asserts one which is to bar the action must also prove it. Mr. Thompson, on Negligence, states that in applying this rule to actions where it is sought to recover for an injury on the ground of negligence, the authorities are not in accord. Generally, contributory negligence, on the part of the plaintiff, will bar a recovery, and it would seem, therefore, to be a matter of defense, and that it would devolve upon the defendant to prove it. 2 Thomp. Negl. 1175. While, as Mr. Thompson says, the decisions in the different States are not uniform upon this question, nor, indeed, upon many of the questions involved in this interesting subject, to wit, the liability of railroads and other companies for injuries, a subject that is daily growing more and more important, yet the current of the decisions is strongest in favor of the proposition that contributory negligence is a matter of defense, and the burden of proving it is with the defendant. 2 Thomp. Negl. 1176-77, in notis.

The defendant excepts, lastly, because the judge declined to charge that, if the jury believed the accident was caused by the effort of the deceased to open the torpedo, then the verdict should be for the defendant. As we have already stated, where the plaintiff has contributed to the accident to the extent of furnishing a proximate cause thereof, the defendant is exempt from liability as matter of law, and the judge could so charge; but whether a particular fact, if proved, shall amount to such contribution is a matter for the jury and not for the court. What is negligence is defined in the books, and is a question of law, and it is the same whether it comes from the defendant or the plaintiff; but whether it is proved to be present in a special case is a question of fact for the jury.

The law holds that the want of due care is negligence. This much the judge can legitimately charge, but whether a particular fact, if proved, shows the want of due care, is for the jury acting upon all the evidence introduced. The objection to the exception is that it requested the judge to decide the effect of a certain fact assumed to be proved upon the issue which was before the jury, and which issue under the law they alone could *determine. Under this view we think the judge was not in error in declining to charge the proposition as stated.

For the reasons given, we think the non-suit should have been granted, and its refusal below, under the cases of Sampson & Wyatt v. Singer Manufacturing Co., 5 S. C. 465, and Willis v. Knox, 5 S. C. 476, supra, now rendering a new trial proper; to this end it is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Before Pressley, J., Greenville, July, 1882.

This was an action by Carrier & Harris against John M. Dorrance. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Julius H. Hayward, for appellant.

Messrs. M. F. Ansel and Edward Craft, contra, on the question of non-suit, cited 3 S. C. 9, 411; 6 Id. 83; 7 Id. 144, 170; also, 2 Kent 763; 1 Add. Torts 498, note 657; 3 Wait Ac. & Def. 615; 31 Geo. 348; 3 McC. 547; 1 Bailey 358; 2 Spears 495; 5 E. C. L. 437.

March 10th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiffs, respondents, keeping a livery stable in Greenville, in May, 1881, hired to the defendant a coach and team of four horses, for a pleasure trip to Piedmont, a distance of twelve miles, and to return the same day. The party left the city in the morning and returned in the afternoon, having left one of the horses behind, about seven miles, sick. During the night of the same day this horse was brought to the stable quite sick, and died early the next morning. This action was brought to recover her value. The other three horses returned in good condition.

After plaintiffs' testimony the defendant moved for a non-suit, which was refused. The defendant requested the judge to charge: "That if the plaintiffs, by their conduct, contributed at all to the accident, or if, by proper care and attention on the part of the plaintiffs, the death of the horse might have been prevented, and the plaintiffs failed to bestow this care and attention upon it, the defendant is not liable."

The judge declined to charge this in the language requested, but did charge as follows: "If the jury believed that the death of the mare was caused by her being driven hard after defendant knew that she was sick, and, further, if they believed it was not proper care to drive her while in that condition, then defendant was responsible for her full value. In that case no question of contributory negligence by the plaintiff would be submitted to them because he was not present, and they need not consider the question of whether the driver was employed by Harris or by defendant; as the latter had taken the mare from the care of the driver and placed her in the hands of his own servant, he alone was responsible for the consequences of that act if it was negligence. Further, if the jury believed that plaintiff, by proper care, could have saved the life of the mare after she was delivered to him, then defendant was not responsible for her full value, but he would still be responsible for such injury as was inflicted upon her by driving her whilst sick, if the jury believed it involved loss of service and impaired constitution, which proper care by the plaintiff could not have averted."

The jury found for the plaintiffs $100. The defendant appealed: 1. "Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge as requested. 2. Because his Honor charged in respect to matter of fact. 3. Because it is submitted the non-suit should have been granted upon the ground that the proof of negligence on the part of the defendant was not sufficient."

*This case, and the questions raised, involve the law of bailments. It will not be necessary, however, to discuss that doctrine generally. We need only examine the law of the class to which the case belongs. This class is what is known in the books as locatio rei, bailment for hire. Mr. Chitty says that such a bailee is bound to use only an ordinary degree of care. 1 Chit. Cont. (11th ed.) 679. He is responsible for injuries arising from that degree of negligence which occurs in the absence of ordinary care, such care as is ordinarily bestowed by parties in the preservation of property.

As a contract for hire is supposed to be a mutual benefit both to the bailor and bailee, the bailee in such case is not held too that strict accountability which appertains to a mere borrower who obtains possession for his own benefit, and without reward to the lender. The burden of proving the absence of this ordinary care, and the presence of that negligence, which is the result, and which makes the bailee liable, is ordinarily upon the bailor or plaintiff. 1 Chit. Cont. 680, note; Story Bail., § 410; Runyan v. Caldwell, 7 Humph. 134; Schmidt v. Blood, 9 Wend. 268; Platt v. Hibbard, 7 Cow. 500; Foote v. Storrs, 2 Barb. 326; Clark v. Spence, 10 Watts 335. This is the general doctrine in reference to this species of bailment.

Next, as to non-suits. It is well settled that a non-suit is proper only where there is a total failure of testimony by the plaintiff, either as to his whole case, or to some material and essential part thereof. It is also well understood that non-suits are not favored, and the practice of ordering a non-suit in invitum should be pursued with caution. Redding v. Railroad Co., 3 S. C. 9 16 Am. Rep. 681; Boykin v. Watts, 6 S. C. 83; Holley v. Walker, 7 S. C. 144; but it is also settled that where there is a total failure of evidence, the defendant has the legal right to stop further proceedings, by motion for non-suit.

Now, let the motion for non-suit below be subjected to the test of the principles announced above, and what is the result? The plaintiffs, in order to get the jury, were bound to offer some proof as to the negligence of the defendant, or as to the absence of that ordinary care which would amount to negligence in a case like this. Did they do this? Upon a careful examination *of the testimony found reported in the brief, we think it will be apparent that they did not. The facts brought out by their testimony were simply that the coach and team were hired to the defendant, for a trip of pleasure to Piedmont; that this trip was to be made during the day; that it was made; that three of the horses were returned in the afternoon, sound and in good condition; that the fourth was left behind sick after reaching within some seven miles of the city of Greenville; that when the horse was found sick, the defendant took her from the coach and turned her over to one Earle, to be driven forward, hitched to a basket wagon, with instructions to drive her slowly and carefully on to the city, but if she got no better, or it became necessary, to leave her on the way at the house of Judge Cleveland, a gentleman who lived on the roadside; that she reached Greenville that night about twelve o'clock, and died next morning; one witness stating that he would not drive a sick horse eight or ten miles if it could possibly be avoided, but had seen horses get well after being thus driven; another stating that he did not think it safe to drive a sick horse, but that he would prefer to get him home if he could, because he could be better treated; that there were no drug stores along the road, although one at Piedmont.

This was the whole testimony of the plaintiffs, upon the close of which the motion for non-suit was made. We do not see anything in all this bearing directly upon the question of negligence, the burden of proving which was upon the plaintiffs. There was not a particle of testimony tending to show that the sickness of the mare was caused by any act of the defendant, such as hard driving, inattention to watering, imprudent feeding, or anything on his part which might have caused this sickness. There was no evidence directed to the point that there was the want of ordinary care by the defendant in directing the mare to be driven slowly and carefully to Greenville after he found that she had taken sick within seven or eight miles of the city, or that he failed to bestow such care himself before leaving her. True, two of the witnesses, said, generally, that it was unsafe to drive a sick horse eight or ten miles, but, yet, it was better to get such horse home. These were general opinions, and seemed *to have no special reference to the case before the court and the conduct of defendant.

The question was as to his negligence under the circumstances surrounding him; whether ordinary care required him to do more than he did do. The horse took sick on his hands within a few miles of the stable from which he had hired it. He was not a farrier, had no medicine, and, perhaps, would not have known how to use it if he had been thus provided. The sun was about an hour high; he concluded that it was best to get her to the stable and subject her to the treatment of those who knew best what to do, and he adopted that course.

These were the facts, but whether this was negligent or prudent conduct there was no testimony; and, in the absence of such testimony, there was nothing to submit to the jury upon the main and important question, to wit, the question of negligence and ordinary care. We think, therefore, that the non-suit should have been granted, and now, under the authority of Sampson & Wyatt v. Singer Manufacturing Co., 5 S. C. 465, and Willis v. Knox, 5 S. C. 476, a new trial should be had. It will be unnecessary to discuss the charge of the judge.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, to the end that a new trial be had.

HARRIS v. YOUNG.

[Executors and Administrators  $\hookrightarrow$  508.]

Upon an accounting had in the Probate Court, a balance was ascertained to be in the hands of the executor, whereupon he gave a mortgage in the nature of a declaration of trust, to hold such balance under the provisions of the will; afterwards, he paid a larger amount to a valid outstanding claim against the estate. Held, that the decree and mortgage were thereby satisfied, and that he was entitled to have the mortgage discharged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2191; Dec. Dig.  $\hookrightarrow$  508.]

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, March, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

*35

*Messrs. Duncan & Cleveland, for appellants.

Mr. Justice McIVER. John L. Young, having first duly made and executed his last will and testament, of which he appointed the plaintiff and the defendant, Mary T. Young, executors, died in 1862. The will was duly admitted to probate, and both of the persons named as such, qualified as executors, though the plaintiff seems to have assumed the active management of the estate.

The testator, at the time of his death, was indebted to one Shields, who died intestate, in 1864, and there being then no administration upon his estate, the plaintiff paid the said debt to the widow of Shields in Confederate money, some time in the year 1864, but did not take up the notes evidencing said debt, the widow not having possession of them. Subsequently, one Daniels took out letters of administration upon the estate of Shields, and refusing to recognize the payment made by the plaintiff to the widow, brought suit on said debt in 1867 against the plaintiff and the defendant, Mary T. Young, as executors of John L. Young, and recovered judgment thereon.

In April, 1877, under proceedings for that purpose in the Court of Probate, there was a settlement of the estate of the testator, John L. Young, in which plaintiff was allowed credit for $41.83, the value of the Confederate money paid to the widow of Shields, and by which it was ascertained that there was a balance in the hands of the plaintiff, as executor, of the sum of $541.05, due to the estate of his testator, for which a decree was entered against him on June 30th, 1877; that he holds the same "subject to the provisions and terms of the will of John L. Young, deceased," and that the said Thomas Harris do "execute, within thirty days from the date of this order, a mortgage on his real estate, in the nature of a declaration of trust, to secure the amount of said trust and interest thereon." In pursuance of this decree, the plaintiff, on August 14th, 1877, executed the mortgage as required, and on the same day was *required to pay and did pay the amount then due on the Shields judgment, to wit: the sum of $659.56. The plaintiff subsequently made two payments of interest to the defendant, Mary T. Young.

In 1879 this action was commenced, in which the plaintiff, by his complaint, alleges that there was a mistake in the accounting, which resulted in the decree aforesaid, by reason of the omission to take any account of the amount of the Shields judgment, which had been forgotten by the parties at the time the accounting was taken in the Probate Court, and prays: (1). "That the mistake in the aforesaid accounting and decree be corrected; (2). That the deed of trust be ordered to be canceled; (3). That plaintiff have judgment against the defendants for the amount overpaid by him, and for the costs of this action; (4). And for such other and further relief herein as the circumstances may demand, and as to the court shall seem just." The defendants resisted the action, mainly upon the ground that the decree rendered by the Court of Probate was conclusive, and that the Circuit Court has no jurisdiction to review it, except by appeal; and also contended that there was no mistake in the accounting which resulted in said decree, and which was, in effect, a compromise decree, all parties being then aware of the Shields judgment, which was duly considered in making up the decree.

The issues of law and fact were referred to a referee, who found as matter of fact: (1). "That the decree of the Probate Court was not a compromise; (2). That the failure on the part of the plaintiff, in the accounting on final settlement to put in the judgment, was a mistake; (3). That the payments to Mary T. Young, as interest on the decree, was not a mistake." Upon these findings of fact the referee found as matter of law: (1). "That this court has jurisdiction; (2). That the mortgage or deed of trust should be canceled; (3). That the defendant, Mary T. Young, should be restrained from proceeding under the decree of the Probate Court; (4). That plaintiff is not entitled to recover the amounts paid as interest on the decree; (5). That the plaintiff is responsible for the amount wrongfully paid to the widow of Shields; (6). That the plaintiff is entitled to recover from defendants the difference between the amount of the decree, $541.05, rendered *June 30th,

1877, and the amount paid on the judgment, $659.56, on August 14th, 1877, less the amount erroneously allowed in 1864, $41.83, with interest on last-mentioned amount to this date."

To this report the defendants filed the following exceptions: 1. "In that the referee erred in second conclusion of fact. 2. In that the referee erred in his 1st, 2d, 3d and 4th conclusions of law." The Circuit judge who heard the case upon this report and these exceptions, together with the testimony accompanying the report, held that it was not necessary for him to consider whether there had been any mistake in the accounting, and, if so, whether the Court of Common Pleas had jurisdiction, except by appeal, to open the decree of the Court of Probate for the purpose of rectifying the mistake, because he found, as matter of fact, that the plaintiff had, since the decree was rendered, fully paid and satisfied it by payment of a valid judgment against the estate, and he therefore held that the plaintiff was entitled to have satisfaction entered upon the mortgage which was given to secure the amount of said decree, and accordingly ordered the clerk to enter satisfaction on the mortgage.

From this judgment the defendants appeal upon the following grounds: 1. "Because his Honor erred in not holding that the Circuit Court was without jurisdiction. 2. Because his Honor erred in not sustaining the defendants' exceptions to the report of the referee. 3. Because his Honor erred in not holding that the plaintiff was estopped from setting up the payment by him of the judgment subsequent to the decree of the Probate Court. 4. Because his Honor erred in holding that the decree of the Probate Court was satisfied by payment. 5. Because his Honor erred in holding that the payment by plaintiff of the judgment was a satisfaction of the decree of the Probate Court without re-opening the entire settlement. 6. Because his Honor erred in refusing to dismiss the complaint herein."

If the Circuit judge took a proper view of the case, as we think he unquestionably did, we do not see how many of the questions raised by the grounds of appeal can properly arise, and, therefore, we do not propose to consider them in detail. It might be conceded for the purposes of this case (though we are *not to be regarded as expressing any opinion upon that point), that the Circuit Court would have no jurisdiction, except by appeal, to correct a mistake in an accounting before the Court of Probate, which had resulted in a decree of that court, and yet the view which the Circuit judge has taken might be fully sustained. If the Shields judgment constituted a valid claim against the estate of the testator, as we are bound to assume, in the absence of any testimony, or even allegation to the contrary, then, clearly, it was entitled to be paid out of the assets of the estate, in preference to any claim which the devisees or legatees may have had, whether those assets consisted of the property in specie left by the testator, or of a debt due to the estate by the executor on account of assets converted.

The plaintiff in that judgment could, therefore, by proper proceedings, have subjected the amount in the hands of the executor belonging to the estate, as ascertained by the decree of the Court of Probate, to the payment of the judgment; and if he had done so, it surely could not have been contended that the executor would still be liable to the legatees for the amount which he had thus been compelled to pay to a creditor who had a right superior to that of the legatees. And if the executor could have thus been compelled to make this application of the amount in his hands, then, certainly, if he did that voluntarily which the law afforded the means of compelling him to do, the same result would follow. Even if the executor had turned over all the assets belonging to the estate to the legatees, the creditor could still pursue those assets in the hands of the legatees, and the fact that those assets consisted of a debt due by the executor to the estate, cannot have the effect of altering the legal principles applicable.

The decree of the Court of Probate had ascertained that there was a certain amount in the hands of the plaintiff, as executor, belonging to the estate of his testator, which he was required to hold "subject to the provisions and terms of the will," and the mortgage in question was given to secure the performance of the requirements of the decree. The will is not set out in full in the record, and, therefore, we are not distinctly informed whether there was any specific direction therein as to the payment of debts, but we are certainly at liberty to infer that there was, for, even if there was not, the law would supply such omission. When, therefore, the executor shows, as he has done in this case, that he has applied the whole of the balance ascertained to be in his hands belonging to the estate, to the payment of a valid claim against said estate, he has shown full performance of the requirements of the decree, and he is therefore entitled to have satisfaction entered upon the mortgage given for the sole purpose of securing compliance with the terms of that decree.

We do not deem it necessary to consider the question whether the settlement in the Court of Probate should be re-opened, and leave the parties to take such course as they may be advised in reference to that matter.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

BROWN v. ATLANTA & CHARLOTTE A.

[1. Railroads ⚡484.]

Whether the facts of a case constitute negligence, as defined by the court, is a question for the jury.

[2. Railroads ⚡453.]

A railroad company is not liable as a common carrier for cotton, placed by its owner near the track, where it was burned by a spark from a passing engine.

[3. Railroads ⚡453.]

As to cotton placed near the line of a railroad, the company is not liable for consequences resulting from its lawful use of locomotives on its track, if proper care and diligence was used.

The burning of such cotton by a spark from the engine being proved, the onus was upon the company to disprove negligence, and this might be done by showing that they had the most approved mechanical contrivances to prevent the escape of fire, and that the engine was managed with due care and skill on that occasion.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hutto v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 81 S. C. 573, 62 S. E. 835.

[5. Railroads ⚡453.]

The erection by a town council of a platform near to a railroad siding for the storage of cotton, imposed upon the company no other responsibility than such as existed as to their use of the main track.

And the use of such platform in part by the railroad company for holding cotton in their custody did not so impose upon them the duty of providing a watchman for the platform, as to render them liable for cotton not receipted for, and there burned without their negligence.

*40

*The Circuit judge committed no error in charging the jury that "defendant cannot be made liable on a mere probability that the fire was caused by its engines, but only on the preponderance of proof that it was so caused, and on proof of negligence on the part of defendant or its servants—that the probability must amount to proof."

Before Hudson, J., Spartanburg, March, 1881.

pany, commenced in January, 1880. The facts of the case are stated in the opinion. See case of Wilson & Co. v. Railroad Company, 16 S. C. 587. The charge of the presiding judge was as follows:

What is the plaintiff's action? He has brought an action here to recover from the railroad company $750 for cotton which he lost, as he alleges, at the hands of the company. The company is charged in the complaint as a common carrier, and also for damages by reason of negligence, causing the destruction of the property in question, which was not in their charge. So far as their liability as common carriers is concerned, it has not been contended in the argument that the plaintiff has made out his case in that respect; it has not been claimed in the argument that this cotton was in the possession of the railroad company and under its control; that it had been delivered to the company and receipted for. So that the question of their liability as common carriers does not arise in this case. But the burden of the case is that the company negligently destroyed these twelve bales of cotton on the 2d day of November, 1879.

The first question—that which lies at the very foundation of the matter—is whether the company destroyed that cotton or not? Was that cotton destroyed by a spark or sparks from the passing engines? It devolves upon the plaintiff in this action, just as in any other case in the Court of Common Pleas, to make out his case. He cannot ask for a verdict from your hands unless his case is made out, and made out by proof—satisfactory proof and lawful proof.

tion, is: Was that *cotton burned on that Sunday by sparks from the engines of the company? For, I believe no other probable method of destroying it, so far as the company is concerned, has been noticed in the testimony. It devolves upon the plaintiff to prove that fact—not to raise in your minds a suspicion of the fact; not to lay before you facts and circumstances which raise a mere suspicion—but to prove it by evidence sufficient to convince your minds. If the evidence raises as high a degree of probability that the fire occurred from a cause other than a spark from the engine, then, of course, you could not refer it to the spark from the engine. The fact of the destruction by the company must be proved, and until that is proved you need not go any further. If the evidence on that point is not sufficient to satisfy your minds you can stop there, and the verdict must be for the defendant. That is purely a question of fact, and you are the exclusive judges of the testimony.

Testimony has been introduced by the plaintiff tending to show that the sparks from the engine fired that cotton. I cannot remember the names of all the witnesses, and it would be of no service for you to hear from my notes of the testimony what the witnesses have said. The counsel on both sides have fully commented upon the testimony. The plaintiff's testimony is, in effect, that on November 2d, 1879, at Gaffney City, the trains drawn by engines No. 2 and No. 3, going east and west, passed each other, as they had been doing for a long time; they had been doing so before the platform was erected by the town council, and, I believe, since June previous, the same year; the platform having been erected in July. So that there was nothing unusual in the trains meeting and passing there that day; that was according to the company's regular schedule, and according to the regular course of business.

But, it is said that the engine No. 2, having arrived with its train, from which the passengers were put off as usual, went in on the siding and came nearer that cotton than usual; that it came in dangerous proximity to the cotton without sufficient cause for so doing; and that whilst in such dangerous proximity to the cotton, the spark or sparks from the engine set the cotton on fire, which fire was not discovered until after trains had departed, but was *discovered a very short time thereafter. That, gentlemen, is the circumstantial evidence as to the fact, on the part of the plaintiff. You have heard the different witnesses for the plaintiff state the different lengths of time after the trains passed when the fire was discovered—some putting it five or six minutes—the interval varying with the different witnesses; but all the witnesses for the plaintiff making it a short time afterwards that the fire was discovered.

If that testimony stood alone you would be left to inference as to whether the sparks from the engine fired the cotton or not, and that inference is for you to draw, and not for me. But the testimony for the defendant puts a very different phase upon the matter, so far as the time is concerned when the fire was discovered. You have heard the very substantial testimony of that witness who was in the buggy (Mr. Latham, I believe,) and other witnesses; and, according to their testimony, the fire was not discovered until after twenty-five or thirty minutes after the train had gone. It is in proof that it was a clear day, in a very dry time; that the cotton was very dry; and the position is taken by the plaintiff, that whatever fired the cotton, very soon after it was fired it must have been discovered; in other words, that the fire must have originated but a very short time before discovery, on account of the dry and windy state of the weather. You, gentlemen, have a knowledge of the nature of cotton, and the manner in which it is packed away. Sparks will slumber a long time, or a short time; but the position taken by the plaintiff is that it must have been quite a short time before discovery that the fire was set.

In addition to the testimony for the defendant as to the difference in time, you have the further testimony, that upon this very cotton, whilst the train was there, and as the train came up, the platform was occupied by a number of persons, mostly colored, and that some of them were on the cotton itself, and were smoking. Such is the testimony of the conductor who brought up this train; such, also, I believe, is the testimony of the engineer. And then you have the testimony of other persons, who, after the train had passed and the crowd had dispersed and gone to their respective homes and places for dinner, were coming from *church, and when crossing the railroad at that point observed these negro lads upon the cotton, some of whom were then smoking. No fire was seen, and they passed on to their homes. The credibility of these witnesses is altogether for you.

You see that there is a conflict of testimony, and you must ask yourselves, gentlemen, whether it is not perfectly natural that there should be a conflict of testimony, so far as time is concerned, and so far as different individuals might notice different things. Perhaps some of you have been about railroad depots when trains arrive; perhaps you know something about the habit of communities on such occasions. The evidence here shows that many people had congregated about the depot upon the arrival and departure of trains. What is that for, and to what is the attention of those people usually directed? Did they gather to notice bales of cotton on a platform, or to see who comes and who goes, who get off the trains and who get on? Is their attention more likely to be attracted to the crowd in and about the cars, or to persons on a cotton platform some distance off? When the crowd has dispersed and people come along by such a place, would they be likely to observe parties upon a platform and upon cotton, who were, perhaps, the only persons about there? Could they be mistaken as to the fact? What would attract their attention when the trains had gone, and the crowd had dispersed? If any persons were on the cotton bales, would they not have seen them? These are questions you must put to yourselves in trying to reconcile the testimony of different parties. On such occasions and around such a place, are not persons liable to have their attention directed one to one thing, and one to another? Are all liable to notice the same thing? And when afterwards called upon to speak about what they saw there, is it not like human nature that each one should speak about that to which his attention was attracted? So that, taking into consideration the surrounding circumstances, it may be that we can reconcile all these witnesses, and that each spoke conscientiously, and told the truth so far as he knew and was able.

Then, after the departure of trains at such a place, and the bystanders have dispersed to their dinners, what capability have *they of judging correctly as to time? Does time fly rapidly, or slowly? Are they observing closely, with minds clear? Is lapse of time likely to appear very short, or very long, on such an occasion? Is a person, who leaves a crowd at a train, goes to dinner, and an alarming or exciting event occurs afterward, likely to think the time elapsed shorter, or longer than it has been? All these matters you must ask yourselves.

When you take all that testimony into consideration, it is for you to say, from the whole of it, whether the facts proved satisfy your minds. There may be a preponderance of evidence, and yet that preponderance might not amount to satisfaction. But you are to judge of this by the preponderance of testimony. Does the great preponderance of testimony satisfy your minds that sparks from the engine fired that cotton, or that it was fired by a spark or coal, or a bit of burning tobacco from a pipe? To which, now, as twelve men in honest search of truth, from the testimony in this case—not from conjecture, not from probability—to which cause will you refer it? That is for you.

Well, gentlemen, if the case is so doubtful to your minds that you cannot satisfactorily refer it to either cause, the plaintiff must fail, because he must prove what he alleges: That the company burned that cotton; and if he adduces evidence, which, in connection with the counter-testimony of the defendant, leaves your minds in such a condition that you cannot say, as honest men in search of the truth, to which cause to refer it—whether to that which the plaintiff alleges, or that which the defendant has brought to your attention by its testimony—then you cannot say, as honest men, that the company burned the cotton in consequence of the emission of sparks from its engine, and you will find for the defendant.

Of course, you are not obliged to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, as counsel on both sides have told you. The rule in this court does not go to the same extent as in criminal cases, owing to the great tenderness of the law for the liberty and life of the accused. But yet the rule in this court is that evidence must amount to proof, whether it be circumstantial or positive; and if it does not amount to proof, the plaintiff must fail. If a man sues upon a note, and he cannot prove it, but can only *adduce testimony that raises a probability, he cannot recover. So, if he sues upon an open account and cannot prove it, but can only adduce circumstantial evidence that raises a probability that that account was contracted, he cannot recover. He must adduce satisfactory proof, so that the jury can say that the note was given, that the account was contracted, or, as in this case, that the cotton was burned in the manner alleged.

Suppose you come to the conclusion, from all the testimony, that that cotton was burned by a spark from the engine on that occasion, then you are but half through with the trouble; because then comes the question whether the spark from the engine that fired that cotton got there through the negligence of the employés of the company or not.

But just here, if you conclude that the spark burnt the cotton, then I hold that it devolves upon the defendant, the railroad company, to show that it was not occasioned by negligence. It throws upon the company the burden of proof that it did not occur through negligence. And when the company have introduced testimony to show that the privileges granted to them by the legislature were being exercised in a prudent and careful manner, that their engines were in good fix, with proper appliances for the suppression of sparks, so far as sparks can be suppressed, that they were running their trains in the usual way, and that the engines thus properly constructed in point of mechanism were managed with ordinary care and ordinary prudence, then it devolves upon the plaintiff to show that, notwithstanding that fact, there was some circumstance or some act of negligence on the part of the defendant which would render it liable.

What is the evidence of neglect? You have maps before you, one produced by each party, and I suppose there is not a great deal of difference between them, though I have not examined them with a great deal of scrutiny, because I have not thought it necessary, so far as I am concerned. But you will observe that the platform is close to the side track, so that a train can run up by the side of the platform and take in cotton. Now, gentlemen, that platform was erected by the town council, or at the special instance and request of the town council of *Gaffney City. That town council had determined that all cotton sold there should be weighed by a public weigher, and the platform was erected for the convenience of the town in having cotton weighed there so that they could get the revenue, and to have a convenient point from which it could then be shipped. But it was erected there by permission of the railroad company; and when it was put there, each one who left his cotton there understood, or should have understood, and is presumed by the law to have understood, exactly what his risk was. Here was cotton placed by various individuals upon a platform next to a railroad track upon which railroad trains were running, or engines passing, almost against that cotton many times a day; and the cotton was placed there with a full knowledge of the danger to that cotton from sparks from an engine.

In other words, those persons, whether compelled by the town council or not, have taken the risk upon themselves; the cotton is there exposed to sparks from engines of freight trains which pass near to it on that track, and from the engines of passenger trains which pass upon the main track, and the two tracks are very close together—those engines coming and going in both directions many times a day. Now, gentlemen, you must take that into consideration in this case. What, then, would prudence dictate on the part of these individuals? If that town council compelled persons who brought cotton to that platform to be weighed, and after being placed there it was burned by a spark from an engine without fault of its manager, but in the usual course of business—burned unavoidably, accidentally, from a spark—then common sense, common fairness and common justice would say to you that it would be an act of injustice to throw the loss upon the railroad company. I say that if it was burned there from a spark from an engine well constructed and prudently managed, and was burned simply because of its proximity to the railroad and without fault from the company, then it would be contrary to all sense of justice to make that company pay for it, and if fault is anywhere to be laid, it would be against those—whether the individuals themselves or the town council—who so arranged matters as to place the cotton in that position.

*Prudence would have dictated that they should have had a watchman there, that they should have had the place properly policed. The evidence is that the town council did have the place policed; that they took charge of it, had cotton weighed there, and that parties who had it weighed there, left it there, and that notice was put up forbidding smoking, and all that; and prudence would have dictated that a watchman should be kept there also. Because, gentlemen, there is no evidence that that platform was under the charge of the railroad company, and not being under the charge of the company, they were not bound to put a watchman there over it, and they were not bound to exercise special police care over it; that devolved upon the owners, or the town council as the representative of the owners.

But if this prudence was not exercised by the parties who put the cotton there, if they were negligent, it nevertheless did not excuse the railroad company for negligence, because it was by the permission of the railroad company that the platform was erected and that cotton was put upon it. And whilst the railroad company was not bound to exercise any care or control over that cotton, except that which it had received for, yet it was not excused from exercising the proper care and prudence in the management of its road; and if by any defect in the construction of the company's engines, or any negligence or imprudence in the management of those engines, the cotton was burned, the company would be responsible, notwithstanding the absence of a watchman.

Now, the question is, Was there negligence? The company owned its franchise and property, and it was authorized to operate a railroad, with all its incidents; and having the responsibilities as well as the rights of a railroad company, it had a right to run its trains there as often as its business required. It had a right to run its engines along the side track as well as along the main track. Both tracks belonged to the company and they were built for its use, and the right to control those tracks could not be affected by putting that platform there. But they must be controlled as railroad tracks, the engines run as railroad engines; it is necessary that the engines should be well constructed and have their proper appliances for the suppression of sparks, and that *they should be run in the general course of business and carefully managed.

Now, where is the neglect? You will notice the distance between that platform and the main track on which the passenger trains run. The side track is up against the platform. How far the main track is from the side track I believe the testimony does not exactly show, except that they were close. On that main track the passenger engines were many of them running daily, and they had a right to run. How near were they to that cotton in thus running along that main track? It is said that this engine upon the side track went too near the cotton. Was there anything in the contract between the parties which inhibited a passenger train from running through that siding, close by that cotton, and coming out of the siding at the other end upon the main track? If there is nothing against it in the contract between the parties, the right to do so existed.

Then, was it prudent? Was it an act of negligence when the train took the side track, if it went a little beyond the clearing post? Was there anything in the charter of the railroad company, or in its usages, or was it an act of prudence that they should only go so far on the side track? Did the spark of fire, if it touched that cotton at all, come from the engine while it was on the side track, or when it was on the main track? If it was running along the main track, either coming in or going out, in doing so how far was it from the platform? and did the spark fall upon the cotton when it was starting or when it was in motion?

Now, gentlemen of the jury, if you can find from the testimony that in this particular case there was anything out of order in the engine, or that the engine was pushed up so close to the cotton that it was negligence thus to do, and that while thus negligently there, the cotton was fired—if those facts and circumstances are sufficiently proved, you might then refer the fire to negligence on the part of the company. But, gentlemen, if the spark set fire to the cotton in the usual and prudent management of those engines, in a way that could not be anticipated and could not be guarded against, the plaintiff cannot recover against the defendant.

*You have heard the testimony of witnesses as to the position the engine on the side track took. Whether it went nearer to the cotton than it was on the main track I do not know. Some say it went nearer; others say that it did not go so near, and that it took its usual position on the side track and run in far enough for the other train to pass safely. If that is the case, and everything was in usual good order, the ordinary precautions used in the construction of the engine and in its use on that occasion, why, though much cotton was lost, the railroad company is not responsible, and it can only be responsible if on that day its conduct satisfies you that it was negligent. And that, gentlemen, is a question of fact, under the explanation I have given you.

From the fact that there was a heavy loss to private individuals, you must not take it for granted that the defendant caused it, or that, if they caused it, it was the result of negligence, but you must act upon proof in this matter. If the proof satisfies you first, that it was caused by sparks, and that the sparks came not in an ordinary and natural way, but from negligent conduct of the engineer on that day, then you should find for the plaintiff, and not till then.

On behalf of the defendant I am requested to charge you:

I. "That the defendant is not liable unless the evidence shows negligence on the part of itself or its servants, and that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show such negligence." Not in that shape can I charge. I charge you as follows: It devolves on the plaintiff to prove that the fire was caused by the defendant. Having proved this fact, the burden is then cast on the defendant to prove the absence of negligence and the use of due care. The fact that the fire occurred from a spark from the engine is not proof of negligence, if the engines were well constructed, having improved safeguards, and were prudently managed. But this the defendant must prove.

II. "That the measure of the defendant's duty is the ordinary care of a prudent man in the management of his own personal property." I would not say that, because negligence and prudence and care are relative terms, and what might be prudence in the management of private property might not be in the case of a *railroad company. I say this is correct: That the measure of duty is the use of ordinary care by a well regulated railroad company in the conduct of its business.

III. "If it is probable that the fire originated from any cause other than the defendant's engines, the defendant is not liable." That is correct, with the insertion of the word "equally," so that it will read "If it is equally probable," &c.

IV. "That the defendant cannot be made liable on a mere probability that the fire was caused by its engine, but only on the preponderance of proof that it was so caused, and then only upon proof of negligence on the part of the defendant or its servants." That is correct; the probability must amount to proof.

V. "That if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant corporation was provided with the most approved machinery for protection against fire, and that the said machinery was worked by careful and competent employes, they must find for the defendant." That is correct, provided the evidence is that the machinery was worked with reasonable care on that day.

VI. "That if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendant's engines were of the same construction and operated in the same manner on November 2d, 1879, the day of the fire, as at and prior to the time the cotton was placed on the platform, then the owners of the cotton took the general risk, and it was such contributory negligence on their part as defeats the plaintiff's right to recover." I do not charge in that shape. I say that: The owner of cotton on the platform took the risk arising from the usual and prudent running of the trains. Sparks are liable to be emitted from engines, and the risk of this liability from well-constructed and well-managed engines the plaintiff took.

VIII. "If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the town council of Gaffney City erected and controlled the cotton platform, and allowed persons to place cotton thereon, knowing its liability to destruction by fire, and did not take the necessary precaution to prevent it, this constitutes the intervention of an independent responsible agent, and the defendant is not liable." I would add to that, "except for negligent destruction of the cotton." The proposition would then be correct.

ton placed it on the town platform, in known proximity to passing trains, the duty was incumbent upon him to use due care for its protection, and the failure to do so would be negligence."

X. "That if the jury find that due care required a watchman for the protection of the cotton, it was incumbent upon the owners to provide one, and failure to do so was such negligence on their part as defeats the plaintiff's right to recover."

I shall charge this: The plaintiff should have taken steps of ordinary care to protect his cotton from ordinary danger. A watchman would have been a source of protection, but the want of a watchman over the cotton did not excuse the defendant for negligence. Sufficient proof of a negligent burning by defendant renders defendant liable, notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff had no watchman.

First, you are to look to the fact: Did the defendant's engine burn that cotton? and before you can find for the plaintiff you must be satisfied, from the testimony on that point, that the engine did it. The evidence must not be merely enough to raise a suspicion, but it must produce satisfaction in your minds; and if you can account for the burning, under the testimony, upon any other hypothesis as well as the spark from the engine, then you cannot find for the plaintiff, because you must be satisfied that the allegation of the plaintiff, that it was burned by the spark, is true.

If you find that it was burned by a spark on that occasion, you still cannot find for the plaintiff unless it appears, from the testimony, that the defendant was negligent; and the first thing the defendant has to do, when the burning is proved to have come from its engine, is to prove the exercise of due care—that is, that the trains were running as the law allows, on a road chartered by the law; that they were running in the usual way; that the engines were in good fix, and used on that occasion with ordinary care and prudence. And, if that be the proof, then that negatives the idea of negligence, and the plaintiff must then resort to proof of positive facts and circumstances showing negligence. The plaintiff must show you, notwithstanding the engines were in good fix, and were running as the law allows, yet that the defendant did something on that particular occasion which amounts to actual negligence, and caused the destruction of that cotton; and, without proof of that kind, the plaintiff cannot recover if the defendant has negated the idea of negligence by proving that it had good engines, operated in the usual way.

You will then ask yourselves the question: If no cotton had been burned on that occasion would there have been any proof of any unusual conduct of the defendant at that time? You will also ask yourselves the question, whether or not the fact of the cotton being burned has not given rise to the efforts to prove a departure from the usual rule on that day? When the trains had come and gone that day, was there anything that had occurred which amounted, in the mind of anybody there, to an act of negligence? Were the acts of negligence the results of after-thought, or did they actually take place on that day? And, if the evidence shows that the usual mode of the coming and departure of trains occurred on that day, that everything was in good fix, and managed in the usual prudent way on that day, then, gentlemen of the jury, the plaintiff cannot recover.

But, if the evidence satisfies you of the defendant's negligence, and that the engine burned the cotton, you will find for the plaintiff, and you must find the value of the cotton and interest up to this day. If, however, you are not satisfied from the testimony that the defendant burned the cotton, or that it was done negligently, in either event you must find for the defendant; and let your verdict, gentlemen of the jury, be according to your honest convictions from the testimony. We may feel that these people ought to be paid for their cotton, yet, if it was burned through their own fault, or the fault of the town council, or, if it resulted from unavoidable or actual accident, it would not be right for the company to pay for it. But, if the company burned it through improper management of their business on that day, they ought to pay for it.

The jury found for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson, Bobo & Carlisle, for appellant.

Messrs. D. R. Duncan, W. E. Earle, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This action was brought to recover damages for twelve bales of cotton burned at Gaffney City on November 2d, 1879. The allegation was that the fire was produced by a spark from an engine of the defendant corporation, and the cotton consumed by their "careless, negligent and unskillful management." The cotton had not been received by the company, nor had there been any order to ship it. The owner had placed it on a platform, which, with the consent of the company, had been built adjacent to the side track of the railroad by the municipal authorities of the town of Gaffney, who retained control of it and established there public scales, which weighed all the cotton purchased at that point; but on the day of the fire there was no guard or watchman on duty to look after the cotton placed there.

At Gaffney, there is a side track of the defendant corporation near the main track, both running an easterly course from the direction of Spartanburg, the side track being north of the main track. The platform was west of the depot, a few feet from the side track. A street of the town crossed the railroad, and there was ample room for a train to stand on side track west of said street, the distance from clearing post to street being two hundred and eighty feet. About three hundred and fifty bales of cotton were burned, part of it on the platform and part on the ground. Some of this cotton had been received for by the company, and that they have paid for.

On the day the cotton was burned, the depot employes of the company were absent. On that day two passenger trains stopped at Gaffney, as they were in the habit of doing. The eastward bound train first came on the track, put out passengers, backed out and switched off on the side track. The westward bound train then stopped for a few minutes and passed on. The other train then backed, switched on to the main track, took on board the passengers and left for Charlotte. For a month previous the weather had been very dry, and on the day of the fire there was a brisk wind blowing from the southwest to northeast. There was conflict of testimony as to the precise point to which the engine went on the side track, and as to the time which elapsed after the train left, before the fire was discovered; and also as to the allegation that persons were on the cotton platform smoking cigars at the time the cars arrived. The defendant's witnesses testified that the engines were in good order and supplied with the most improved spark-arresters; and that the employes were careful and competent men, and acted with care and prudence that day.

After a full charge by the presiding judge, in which he carefully considered requests to charge by both parties, the jury found for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals to this court, alleging that there was error in charging:

1. "That the fact that the fire occurred from a spark from the engine is not proof of negligence if the engines were well constructed—having improved safeguards, and were prudently managed.

2. "That the measure of defendant's duty is the ordinary care of a prudent man in the management of his own property.

3. "That if it is equally probable that the fire originated from any cause other than defendant's engine, the defendant is not liable.

4. "That defendant cannot be made liable on a mere probability that the fire was caused by its engines, but only on the preponderance of the proof that it was so caused, and then only upon proof of negligence on the part of defendant or its servants; and that the probability must amount to proof.

5. "That if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendant corporation was provided with the most approved machinery for protection against fire, and that said machinery was worked by careful and competent employes, they must find for the defendant.

6. "That the owner of cotton on the platform took the risk arising from usual and prudent running of the trains: Sparks are liable to be emitted from engines, and the risk of this liability, from well-constructed and well-managed engines, the plaintiff took.

7. "That if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the town council of Gaffney City erected and controlled the platform, and allowed persons to place cotton thereon, knowing the liability to destruction by fire, and did not take the necessary precaution to prevent it, this constitutes the intervention of an independent responsible agent, and the defendant is not liable, except for negligent destruction of the cotton.

8. "That the liability of defendants, as common carriers, did not arise in this case.

9. "That prudence would dictate that the town council of Gaffney should have a watchman in charge of the cotton placed at or near platform.

10. "In charging that the defendant had the right to run its engines along the side track as well as along the main track; that both tracks belonged to the company, and were built for its use; and the right to control these tracks could not be affected by putting that platform there.

11. "In charging that if there was nothing against it in the contract of the parties which inhibited it, the defendant had the right to run the passenger train through the side track close by the cotton, and come out on the main track at the other end of the siding.

12. "In charging that it required a great preponderance of testimony to establish the fact of burning the cotton by sparks from the engines."

There were, really, only two questions in this case: First. Whether the fire which consumed the cotton was caused by a spark from an engine of the company; and, if so, second, Whether that was an act of negligence for which the company should be held liable. The former was a pure question of fact for the jury; and the latter also, except in so far as it involved the necessity of defining what constitutes negligence. This was for the judge, and if he defined it correctly, as applying to the circumstances, then the whole case was for the jury. They found for the defendants, which must have been upon the ground, either that the fire did not proceed from the engine, or that there was no negligence; and in either case the verdict is conclusive upon us, unless there was some error of law in submitting the case to the jury.

We will consider together exceptions 1, 2, 5, 6, 8, 10 and 11, as to the rights, duties and liabilities of the railroad company in *relation to the cotton of the plaintiff. We cannot say that it was error in the judge to charge that the company was not liable for the cotton as a common carrier, and, therefore, bound to account for its value, if it was set on fire by a spark from one of the engines, whether that was done negligently or not. The plaintiff himself placed the cotton in proximity to the track without any agency of the company, and on a platform which did not belong to it. The company may not have known of the existence of this particular lot of cotton. They certainly had not, directly or indirectly, received it or come under any obligation to exercise special police care over it, or even to transport it. They stood to this cotton as to any other property placed by the owner near the track, and which did not belong to them. That is to say, they could not injure it willfully, wantonly or negligently; but, having the right, by charter of the State, to run upon their track locomotives propelled by steam, they were not responsible for the consequences which might result as an incident from such use of locomotives as would be inevitable accident, provided it appeared that such consequences had resulted notwithstanding the exercise of proper care and diligence; and the fact of the injury being proved, the onus was upon the company to disprove negligence, which they might do by showing that they had the most approved mechanical contrivances to prevent the escape of fire, and that on that day such engines were managed with due care and skill.

We think the charge of the judge was in accordance with the principles laid down by Mr. Pierce: "A railroad company, being authorized by law to work its engines in the usual and proper way, and, when necessary in the exercise of this right, to send forth particles of fire from them, is not liable for injuries caused thereby to private property, provided it exercises its rights in a lawful manner, and with reasonable care and skill.

* * * The plaintiff must show that the fire originated from the company's engines. It is not sufficient to show a possibility that the injury was caused by the company. The proof that the company caused the fire may be circumstantial as well as direct. As negligence is the gist of the action against the company for injuries received from it while exercising its lawful right to conduct its trains, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to prove the negligence. The fact of injury suffered by the plaintiff in consequence of the exercise of a right by the defendant, does not raise the presumption of negligence, except in some particular cases, as in actions against innkeepers and common carriers, which are made exceptions to the general rule on grounds of public policy. Hence, the setting on fire of grass, fences or buildings, on the railroad, by particles of fire, which are proved to have issued from the company's engines, does not, of itself, justify the inference of negligence. There are, however, authorities which hold that the fact that the company caused the injury by fire, raises the presumption of its negligence, and that, upon this fact appearing, the burden of proof is on the company to disprove negligence by showing that it used the best mechanical contrivances in known practical use to prevent the escape of fire from its engines, and that it managed such engines with due care and skill." Pierce Railr. L. 431, 437 and 438, and many authorities there cited; McCready v. S. C. R. R. Co., 2 Strobl. 356.

We can see no difference in this respect between the use of the side track and that of the main road, subject, of course, to the same rule of proof as to negligence. Both belonged to the company, and both, built in the same right, had their proper uses connected with the running of the road. The platform, placed near the side track by the town authorities, did not impose on the company a measure of responsibility as to the use of that siding, other than that which existed as to the use of the main track. The plaintiff chose to put his cotton on the platform close to the side track, and, as the judge states, "When he placed it there he took the risk arising from the usual and prudent running of the trains."

Exceptions 7 and 9 complain that the judge charged: "That if the jury believe from the evidence that the town council of Gaffney City erected and controlled the cotton platform, and allowed persons to place cotton thereon, knowing its liability to destruction by fire, and did not take the necessary precautions to prevent it, this constitutes the intervention of an *independent responsible agent, and the defendant is not liable, except for negligent destruction of the cotton."

We do not see how this could prejudice the plaintiff. The defendants were liable for the cotton burned which they had receipted for, not on the ground of negligence, but as common carriers, and it was a matter for them to decide, with reference only to their own security, whether they would keep a guard there or not. They were not bound to do so, in order that, as an incident, the cotton of the plaintiff might also be protected. In the same connection in which he referred to the want of prudence on the part of others in having this cotton guarded, the judge said: "But, if this prudence was not exercised by the parties who put the cotton there, if they were negligent, it, nevertheless did not excuse the railroad company from negligence, because it was by their permission that the platform was erected and the cotton put on it. And, whilst the railroad company was not bound to exercise any care or control over that cotton, except what it had receipted for, yet it was not excused from exercising the proper care and prudence in the management of its road; and if, by any defect in the construction of the company's engines, or any negligence or imprudence in the management of their engines on that day, the cotton was burned, the company would be responsible, notwithstanding the absence of a watchman," &c.

Exceptions 3, 4 and 12, in different form, make the point that the judge erred in charging "that defendant cannot be made liable on a mere probability that the fire was caused by its engines, but only on the preponderance of proof that it was so caused, and then only upon proof of negligence on the part of the defendant or its servants, and that the probability must amount to proof." We have already disposed of the question of proof as to negligence. This part of the charge, in terms, had reference to the primary issue, whether the fire was caused by the engine of the company. That was purely a question of fact, as to which the onus was on the plaintiff. Was it error for the judge to say to the jury, in submitting that issue, that the allegation should be made out by "the preponderance of proof—that it was not sufficient if there was an equal probability that *the fire originated from some other cause; that the probability must amount to proof?"

It is contended that, in reference to the findings of facts by a jury, there is really no distinction between probability and proof, and that the charge led the jury to infer that positive, as distinguished from circumstantial, evidence was necessary. The whole charge shows, unmistakably, that such was not the meaning of the judge. He says: "The evidence must not be merely enough to raise a suspicion, but it must produce satisfaction in your minds, and, if you can, under the testimony, account for the burning upon any other hypothesis, as well as the spark from the engine, then you cannot find for the plaintiff, because you must be satisfied that the allegation of the plaintiff is true." And at another place he says: "Does the great preponderance of testimony satisfy your mind that sparks from the engine fired that cotton, or that it was fired by a spark, or coal, or a bit of burning tobacco from a pipe? Now, to which, as twelve men in honest search of truth, from the testimony in this case—not from conjecture, not from probability—to which cause will you refer it? That is for you."

It seems to us that there is a difference between probability and proof. The object of both words is to express a particular effect of evidence, but "proof" is the stronger expression. All the dictionaries give different definitions of "probability." One of Worcester is, "Likelihood of the occurrence of an event in the doctrine of chances, or the quotient obtained by dividing the number of favorable chances by the whole number of chances;" and one of Webster is, "Likelihood; appearance of truth; that state of a case or question of fact which results from superior evidence or preponderation of argument on one side, inclining the mind to receive it as the truth, but leaving some room to doubt. It therefore falls short of moral certainty, but produces what is called opinion. Demonstration produces certain knowledge, proof produces belief, and probability opinion." We think the case was fully, fairly and clearly submitted to the jury.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, April, 1882.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. E. F. Stokes, for himself, appellant.
Mr. D. P. Verner, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. As settled by the judge, the facts were as follows: On January 10th, 1881, J. G. Hawthorne, Esq., a trial justice for the county of Greenville, issued a summons against the defendant, Edward F. Stokes, requiring him to answer the complaint of W. B. McDaniel, plaintiff, claiming judgment for $58.20 for printing a brief. The defendant was served on January 17th, but he failed to appear on the day named for trial, February 26th; and on that day the trial justice gave judgment for the plaintiff, and issued a transcript of said judgment, which was filed in the clerk's office, and execution issued thereon. On April 1st, 1882, the sheriff returned the execution "wholly unsatisfied."

On April 4th, 1882, D. P. Verner, attorney for the plaintiff, made affidavit that the judgment had been duly rendered in the action by a trial justice against the defendant for $58.20 and costs, a transcript of which had been duly docketed in the office of the clerk of the court, and execution issued thereon; that the said execution had been returned by the sheriff wholly unsatisfied, and was still unsatisfied; and that Samuel J.

Douthit, *Esq., master of the court for said county, had money of the defendant in his hands exceeding the amount of ten dollars. Upon the filing of this affidavit, Judge Aldrich, presiding judge at Greenville, passed an order requiring the defendant, Stokes, to show cause, on April 8th, 1882, why the master should not be required to pay the said judgment and costs out of funds in his hands belonging to the defendant, and directed the order, with a copy of the above affidavit, to be served upon the defendant, which was done.

On April 11th, 1882, the defendant was not in court, and had filed no return to the rule to show cause. He declined to come into court on account of indisposition, and having given him notice that he could not continue the case, the judge, on reaching the case, granted an order requiring the master to pay the judgment, $58.20, and the costs of the proceedings out of money in his hands belonging to the defendant. From this order the defendant appeals to this court, upon the ground "That the defendant excepts to the whole proceeding, and submits that the order is unauthorized by any statute or law in South Carolina."

This general objection to the order of the judge is really no exception at all. "The points of law wherein error is charged should be specifically stated in exceptions, otherwise the court has no guide as to the matters contested. It is not a compliance with the first section of the act of 1878 to except in general terms. This court is excluded from considering the sufficiency or insufficiency of evidence or any other question except errors of law, and it is indispensable to the discharge of that duty that the questions submitted for consideration should be separately and distinctly stated." Norton v. Livingston, 14 S. C. 178.

But we may say that we see no error in the order to which objection is made. It was entirely within the discretion of the Circuit judge to decide whether the defendant was entitled to a continuance as to the rule served upon him.

In regard to "proceedings supplementary to the execution," section 312 of the revised code provides that "When an execution against property of the judgment debtor, issued to the sheriff of the county where he resides, or has a place of business, or if he does not reside in the State, to the sheriff of the county *where a judgment-roll, or a transcript of a justice's judgment for twenty-five dollars or upwards, exclusive of costs, is filed, is returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, the judgment creditor, at any time after such return made, is entitled to an order from a judge of the Circuit Court, requiring such judgment debtor to appear and answer concerning his property before such judge, at a time and place specified in the order, in the county to which the execution was issued." And section 317 provides that "the judge may order any property of the judgment debtor, not exempt from execution, in the hands either of himself, or of any other person, or due to the judgment debtor, to be applied towards the satisfaction of the judgment, except." &c., &c. Earle v. Stokes, 5 S. C. 340; Voorhies' Code, 471 (10th ed.)

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Pressley, J., Abbeville, June, 1882.

This was an action in the name of the State, ex relatione Sallie R. Slay, in behalf of herself and other creditors, under the official bond of L. P. Guffin, late sheriff, against Roger L. Williams, commenced in March, 1882. The opinion states the case.

*Mr. L. W. Perrin, for appellant.
Messrs. Noble & Noble, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This was an action on the official bond of the late sheriff of Abbeville county, one Lawrence P. Guffin, on which the defendant, appellant, was bound as one of the sureties of the said Guffin. The bond was in the usual form of such bonds, and obligated the parties jointly and severally.

The respondent brought the action in behalf of herself and all other creditors of the said sheriff who might come in and contribute to the expenses, alleging, as breaches of the bond, that Guffin had collected and received large sums of money on executions and orders of court, all of which should have been paid over to the parties entitled thereto, and especially, that he had collected for the relator on July 4th, 1876, the sum of one hundred and twenty-nine dollars in a certain case in which she was interested, and had failed to pay it over to her, or deposit the same according to law, and that the defendant surety, although demanded of him since the death of Guffin, had refused to pay the same, and she demanded judgment for the sum of $10,000, the penalty of the bond.

The defendant filed a formal demurrer because it appeared on the face of the complaint: First. "That the personal representative of the deceased sheriff was not joined in the said action as a party defendant." Second. "That the co-sureties upon the official bond sued on were not joined in the said action as parties defendant." And, at the hearing, the defendant further demurred: "That the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in this, that a judgment against the sheriff is necessary before a surety can be sued upon an alleged breach of the bond; no judgment having been alleged in complaint it is defective."

The Circuit judge, Judge Pressley, pronounced the following decree: "This is a suit against a surety to sheriff's bond, and defendant demurs specially on the ground that the representative of the deceased sheriff is not joined in the suit. And, further, *really on the ground that the complaint, in failing to allege a judgment against the sheriff, does not state a sufficient cause of action. In Treasurers v. Gibson, 3 Hill 339, the sheriff was not joined; there was no judgment against him, and no demand on him for the money. The court, by Judge Richardson, held that the action could be maintained on proof that the sheriff was absent from the State. In Taylor v. Easterling, 1 Rich. 314, a similar case, the court, by Judge O'Neill, held that the action could be maintained on proof that the sheriff was dead. The demurrer is, therefore, overruled, with costs to follow the result of the suit, and defendant is granted leave to answer the complaint within twenty days after notice of this decision."

The defendant has appealed from this decree upon exceptions: 1. "For defect of parties, in this, that the sheriff or his personal representative should have been joined. 2. Because the insolvency of the sheriff is not alleged, nor that judgment had been obtained against the sheriff or his representatives. 3. Because no demand is alleged to have been made upon the sheriff or his personal representatives. And 4. Because the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

The questions involved are: First. Can a surety on sheriff's bond be sued without joining the sheriff, or his representatives, if he be dead? Second. Before suit against the surety, is it necessary that judgment should be obtained against the sheriff, or his representatives, if he be dead? Third. To constitute a cause of action against the surety in such case, is it necessary to allege and prove demand and refusal as to the sheriff, or his representatives, or judgment obtained against the sheriff?

In the face of the two cases, referred to by Judge Pressley, and found in our own reports, the questions raised do not need much discussion at our hands. Where the court of last resort in this State has once decided a question, until overruled, it is controlling, and where the question arises again it is wholly unnecessary to do more than to cite the previous decisions.

As was said by Judge Pressley, in the Treasurers v. Gibson, supra, the sheriff was not joined; there was no judgment against him, and no demand for the money—the court holding that, as *the sheriff was absent from the State, no demand was necessary. In the case of Taylor v. Easterling, the sheriff was dead; no demand was required, nor was there joinder of the representatives of the sheriff. These cases, in their facts, run parallel to the case now before us in many respects, and yet the actions in these cases were maintained, without joinder and without demand in the last case, and without judgment, joinder or demand in the first.

If this be so, the failure to allege these facts did not leave the declaration or complaint so defective as not to contain a cause of action, or, otherwise, these cases would have been dismissed. For a complaint to be thus defective, something must be omitted which the plaintiff is required to prove, in order to maintain his suit. In the cases above referred to, it was held that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove the facts relied on by the appellant to sustain his demurrer. If they were not necessary facts in the evidence, it would have been surplusage to allege them in the complaint.

It is true it was held in State, ex relatione Coleman, v. Cason, 11 S. C. 392, that an allegation in a complaint of an unsatisfied judgment against the sheriff alone, for moneys received by him in his official capacity, and converted, states a cause of action against him and his sureties on his official bond, and is prima facie evidence against the sureties of a breach of the bond; but it is not stated that there can be no cause of action against the sureties without this allegation. In fact, inasmuch as such judgment is only prima facie evidence, the sureties being allowed to reject it if they see proper, and can do so, it would seem that the existence of such judgment is not an essential averment, any other allegation of default and breach of the bond being sufficient.

Whatever may be the law as to other quasi-official bonds requiring the performance of duties, we think this case must be governed by Treasurers v. Gibson and Taylor v. East-erling, supra.

It is, therefore, the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. D. R. Duncan, in reply.

March 17th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action to recover damages for a breach of promise of marriage. The contract and the breach thereof were fully established, not only by the admission in the pleadings, but also by testimony adduced at the trial, and the only question for the jury was as to the amount of the damages.

The plaintiff, after adducing testimony as to the contract and its breach, offered evidence tending to show the damages which she had sustained. Amongst other witnesses offered for this purpose, Dr. E. G. Simpson was examined, who testified "that he had known the plaintiff from her infancy, having been the family physician; that the social standing of the family was as good as any in the county; that the plaintiff was particularly bright and attractive, and that she was well educated; that her engagement to Fuller was well known in the community, and also the treatment which she had received from Fuller; that he thought she had been seriously damaged."

This witness was then asked the following question: "From what you know of all the facts and circumstances, how much was the plaintiff damaged?" To this question the defendant objected, and his objection being overruled, the witness answered as follows: "That he thought the plaintiff had been seriously—somewhere from $5,000 to $10,000." The next witness offered was Col. John G. Williams, who, after testifying substantially as Dr. Simpson had done, was asked the same question, as to what he thought was the amount of the damages sustained by plaintiff, to which, after objection, which was overruled, he replied: "Her damages are incalculable in dollars and cents—certainly not less than $10,000."

No testimony was offered on the part of the defense, and the Circuit judge, after instructing the jury that the only question for them to determine was the amount of the damages, the contract and its breach having been admitted by the pleadings, proceeded to charge the jury in these words: "In considering the damages, it would be their duty to consider all the facts as brought out in the evidence, and that they were not bound to take the amounts stated by the witnesses, but could find their verdict regardless of any sum mentioned or named by any witness. That the amount of the damages belonged exclusively to them, and must be reached from the facts; that they could *find from the smallest coin to $10,000," that being the amount demanded in the complaint.

The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $9,000; and a motion for a new trial, on the minutes, having been refused, the defendant appealed from the judgment entered on the verdict on the following ground: "Because his Honor erred in allowing the witnesses, Dr. E. G. Simpson and Col. John G. Williams, to state to the jury their opinions as to the damages inflicted upon plaintiff by breach of contract of marriage by the defendant."

While much has been written by elementary writers, and in the opinions of the courts, as to the admissibility of the opinions of witnesses as evidence, we are not aware of any case in which the precise question raised by this appeal, has been determined. We must, therefore, resort to the general principles of evidence, and from them deduce the rule applicable to this particular case.

There can be no doubt that, as a general rule, a witness is not at liberty to express an opinion, but must confine himself to the statement of facts; but there is as little doubt that this rule is subject to many exceptions. This will be seen by reference to the case of Commonwealth v. Sturtivant, 117 Mass. 122, and the note to that case as reported in 19 Am. Rep. 410, as well as to the case of State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, reported also in 6 Am. Rep. 533; especially the dissenting opinion of Doe, J., which afterwards received the sanction of the same court in Hardy v. Merrill, 56 N. H. 227 (22 Am. Rep. 441), where the case of the State v. Pike was overruled. In these cases will be found elaborate discussion of the subject and very full collections of the authorities.

In 1 Whart. Ev., § 511, the writer, in discussing this subject, after mentioning many instances in which exceptions to the general rule have been allowed, lays down the following principle: "Whenever a condition of things is such that it cannot be reproduced and made palpable in the concrete to the jury, or when language is not adequate to such realization, then a witness may describe it by its effect on his mind, even though such effect be opinion." Again, in section 450, the same author, in showing that the exception to the general rule is not confined to the *case of the testimony of an expert, speaks of the admissibility of opinions as to the amount of the damages caused by another's act, in these words: "When the thing damaged is one of everyday use, whose depreciation an ordinary observer can estimate, then such an observer may be called to express his opinion of the extent of the damage sustained. If the facts which form the basis of such an opinion can be specified, then they must be stated; if the conclusion is one which the jury can draw, then to the jury must be left the drawing the conclusion. But when, as is often the case, these facts can be best expressed by the damage they cause, then this damage and its extent may be testified to by the witness."

In Commonwealth v. Sturtivant, supra, it is said: "The exception to the general rule, that witnesses cannot give opinions, is not confined to the evidence of experts, testifying on subjects requiring special knowledge, skill or learning, but includes the evidence of common observers, testifying to the results of their observation made at the time, in regard to common appearances or facts, and a condition of things which cannot be reproduced and made palpable to a jury. Such evidence has been said to be competent from necessity, on the same ground as the testimony of experts, as the only method of proving certain facts essential to the proper administration of justice."

In Hardy v. Merrill, it is said: "Opinions of witnesses, derived from observation, are admissible in evidence when, from the nature of the subject under investigation, no better evidence can be obtained."

The case of Seibles v. Blackwell, 1 McMull. 56, referred to in the argument, is not in conflict with these authorities. There the question was, whether non-professional witnesses could express an opinion as to the existence of disease in a slave; and the point really decided was, that they could do so, inasmuch as it appeared that they had first stated the facts upon which they based their opinions. It is true, O'Neill, J., did say, that if they had merely expressed their opinions without stating the facts, their testimony ought to have been rejected; but that was said in reference to a case where the facts could have been reproduced before the jury.

*From these authorities we deduce the following conclusions: First. That the exception to the general rule, that the opinions of witnesses are not competent evidence, is not confined to the case of expert testimony. Second. That while it is necessary that the witness should first state the facts upon which he bases his opinion, where the facts are such as are capable of being reproduced in language, it is not necessary to do so where the facts are not capable of reproduction in such a way as to bring before the minds of the jury the condition of things upon which the witness bases his opinion. Third. That such evidence is competent from the necessity of the case.

Now, to apply these principles to the case under consideration: The only question for the jury was as to the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff, and this question was to be determined by the evidence adduced. The witnesses whose testimony was objected to, were not strangers who were called upon to express an abstract opinion as to the amount of damages which a lady would sustain by the breach of promise of marriage, but they were intimate acquaintances, who knew well the social position of the plaintiff, her temperament and disposition, and all her surroundings, and from the knowledge thus acquired they formed their estimate of the damages which she had sustained. It is difficult to conceive how it would have been possible for these witnesses to state all the various facts, or reproduce in language the condition of things, upon which they based their estimates, so as to make the same palpable to the minds of the jury. How could they express in language the degree of sensibility of the lady, or the numerous other impalpable things which went to make up their estimate of the amount of damages which she had sustained? We think it was just one of those cases where, in the language of that eminent author,

Wharton, the "facts can be best expressed by the damage they cause."

In our judgment, therefore, there was no error in admitting the testimony of these witnesses, especially where, as in this case, the jury were carefully instructed that they were not bound to adopt the estimates made by the witnesses, but they were to be considered along with all the other testimony in the case, from which the jury were to make their own estimate as to the amount of damages.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

PINCKNEY BROS. v. W. U. TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

[1. Telegraphs and Telephones ¶39.]

A telegraph company, having received and transmitted a message, but with a mistake in its terms, resulting in loss to the sender, proof of due care by the company, or of the absence of negligence and carelessness on their part, is a good defense to an action brought to recover for such loss.

[2. Telegraphs and Telephones ¶36.]

Telegraph companies are not liable for all mistakes made in the transmission of messages, except such as they may show to have occurred from an act of God, or irresistible force.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 26, 31, 32; Dec. Dig. ¶36.]

[3. Telegraphs and Telephones ¶36.]

Telegraph companies are not held to the liability imposed by law upon common carriers, but are to be governed by the law applicable to that class of bailments styled locatio operis faciendi.

[5. Telegraphs and Telephones ¶70.]

Under action brought against a telegraph company for damages to the extent of a loss caused by an error in the transmission of a telegram, plaintiff, failing to sustain his elected cause of action, is not entitled to recover an amount stipulated in his contract as the measure of the company's liability in case of error.

[This case is also cited in Hill v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 42 S. C. 368, 20 S. E. 135, 46 Am. St. Rep. 734, without specific application.]

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, December, 1881.

This was an action commenced by the plaintiffs, October 25th, 1880, to recover from the defendant $271.50, upon the statement in the complaint that, on the evening of May 22d, 1880, plaintiffs had delivered to the defendant's agent, in Charleston, S. C., to be sent as a night message, the cipher dispatch, which will be found in full in the opinion of this court; that such dispatch, when translated, had the following meaning: "If market firm, with hardening tendency, buy on best terms for the month of August, one hundred bales of cotton; if market has downward tendency, sell on best terms for the month of August, two hundred bales of cotton;" that the telegram was duly delivered in New York to F. Warley on the next morning, written as sent, except that the word "humor," meaning one hundred bales

It will be observed that the error complained of was caused by a change of the letters "or" into the letter "p." The testimony showed that the message was legibly written by the plaintiffs, was sent by a skillful operator in Charleston, and received by the ear of an experienced operator in New York; that the letter "o" was indicated by a dot, a space and a dot, and the letter "r" by a dot, a space and two dots, and the letter "p" by five dots, or represented on paper "or" would be . . . . . and the letter "p" . . . . .; that their instruments were the most approved, and then in good order; that mistakes occurred in telegraphing which could not be accounted for, resulting, principally, from crossing of wires, atmospheric disturbances and improper adjustment of instruments; that no other mistakes occurred on that night between Charleston and New York.

Two of the jurors were sworn on their voir dire, one of whom stated that he had formed an opinion as a jurymen in a similar case, tried a few days before; that he was not conscious of any bias, but had formed an opinion as to the sending of telegraphic messages, but, if sworn as a juror, would decide the matters of fact according to the testimony; nor would the opinion formed sway him outside of the testimony; that if the company failed to show cause for mistakes he had formed an opinion. The other juror was asked if he had formed any opinion as to the liability of telegraph companies, which would cause him to decide other than upon the testimony in this case.

To this he replied: "No; but I think that in the transmission of telegraphic messages accidents will occur, and influences will operate, which cannot be explained in testimony. In cases of that kind I have made up my mind as to where the liability rests." Both jurors were sworn, the plaintiffs excepting.

The judge charged the jury as follows:

*This is an action to recover damages because of a mistake made in the transmission of a telegram by the Western Union Telegraph Company, which, it is alleged, caused an immediate and direct loss to Pinckney Bros. The charge is a breach of contract on the part of the company. The contract by which these parties are to be governed is printed here on the telegraph blank; and this and no other contract is to bind them. When Pinckney Bros. signed this contract they became parties to it; and when the company accepted the telegram it became the contract of the two parties. This is the contract: * * *

Now, the telegraph company has entered into the contract to send this message as a night message, under the conditions stated above, and Pinckney Bros. assented to those conditions. The contract is to be expounded by myself. Is there in this contract anything which renders it void? The telegraph company has a right to make rules of a reasonable character for the conduct of its business. And it has a right to limit its liability by means of its written contracts. But, being an institution of a public character, to which the public are free to resort, it is against public policy for the company to exempt itself from all liability, from whatever cause. It cannot exempt itself from the errors occurring through the acts of its agents, of a negligent and careless kind. It cannot obtain exemption from the gross negligence of its agents.

This contract bound this company to deal with this message as a night message, subject to all the usual risks of a night message—freeing itself from all liability except the fraud, malpractice and gross negligence of its agents. When Pinckney Bros. selected a night message instead of a day message, they selected a message which was without many of the advantages of a day message, chiefly among which was that which would have insured absolute safety, viz.: the repeating of it. They subjected themselves to the risks incidental to a night message, and, in doing so, they then had a right, in case of a breach of this contract, to hold the company to that degree of diligence which they were bound to use in transmitting a night message, and not the amount of diligence required in the transmission of a day message, or one ordered to be repeated.

*This is a cipher message; a message which evidence is introduced to show that the officers of the company did not understand. To them it was a blank, so far as the meaning was concerned, and it is contended, therefore, that they could not have had in contemplation the loss which would flow from the erroneous transmission of the telegram; and that, under these circumstances, only nominal damages can be recovered. They have undertaken to transmit that message according to the terms of this contract, upon their usual night message blanks; and whatever loss flowed directly and immediately from the failure to transmit that message correctly, is the subject for a claim for damages against the company, and must be recovered unless the mistake made in the transmission of the message is not attributable to the negligence of the company or its officers. Undertaking to transmit the cipher message without demanding an interpretation of it, they undertook to transmit just as they would have transmitted any other message, written on their day or night blanks, under their contracts.

This brings us then to the question of negligence—to the testimony in this case. That is a matter for you and not for me. I would say to you, that the facts must be investigated by you with utmost fairness and impartiality, and with strict reference to this contract, with the modifications I have given you. The plaintiff in this case has proved the contract; he has established the receipt of the message, with the error existing, and that certain loss accrued to him. Having established that, I have been holding throughout this case, and so instruct you now, that the plaintiff could there rest; and that the burden of proof would be on the defendants to explain to you, that the error occurred through no fault of theirs—to rebut this prima facie case of the plaintiff, to show due diligence and care in the transmission of this telegram, as a night message, and under all the attendant disadvantages of a night message. You must not allow the fact that it is a night message, and a cheap message, to pass out of your mind. The company has come forward and has endeavored to make this explanation.

In the other case, which some of you had under consideration, a question put by your foreman showed that a portion of my *charge was misunderstood. The company is not called upon to explain how the mistake did occur, because that might be an impossibility. The mistake might have occurred in a way so subtle and mysterious that no one could find it out. But it is the duty of the company to prove that they had an expert and skillful operator here; that the machinery of the company was in good working condition; that so far as they knew the wires were not deranged; that in New York there was a skillful and careful operator, and that by these two operators due care in transmitting and receiving that message was exercised. If they prove due care and diligence on their part by affirmative testimony, and that testimony is such as to convince you of its truth, by its preponderance, then the company has made out a prima facie case of rebuttal, and would be entitled to be excused, unless it appear by other testimony that they were not exercising that due care and diligence. They have explained to you the little characters that represent the letters "or" and the little characters that represent the letter "p." They have explained that these little dots were exactly the same in number, the only difference being the difference in time between the clicking of the instrument; and that electrical influences existing between here and New York might cause the intervals of the clicking of the instrument to so differ as to make the letter "p" to be received in New York, while the letters "or" were really sent from Charleston. The evidence is such as to show that this mistake might occur with skillful operators, if there was an atmospheric disturbance between the two points. In looking at those little marks you must remember that those signs were received by the ear. These matters the company bring forward to rebut the charge of negligence.

And now, bearing in mind the further testimony, that the transmission of these messages, notwithstanding care and diligence, are subject to errors and mistakes, bearing in mind that this was a night message, that it was voluntarily selected by the plaintiff as the means for the transmission of an important communication with New York; taking the testimony in regard to the condition of the office here and the office in New York, it is for you to say, as impartial men, whether the error in this case is to be attributable to negligence, carelessness, malpractice or fraud *on the part of the company's agents or officers. If, from the preponderance of the whole testimony, you believe that it is attributable to this negligence, why, then, the company is liable. But, if from the whole testimony, you are satisfied that it was one of those little mistakes which might occur, and do occur in the best regulated companies, and against which they cannot guard unless it was sent as a day message, and ordered to be repeated, then the company ought not to be mulcted in damages for that which, with the due exercise of care and diligence, it could not avoid. It can only be held liable when it is shown to have been in fault. If you come to the conclusion that this company, under all the circumstances, has not broken or violated its contract, then your verdict will be for the defendant. If you come to the conclusion that they have been negligent, then you will determine the damages to be awarded to the plaintiff.

Now, as I have said, this was a cipher message. My instruction to you is that, if the company is liable on the ground of negligence, fraud or malpractice, the actual damages caused by the mistake is the measure of the recovery. When a mistake of this sort has been detected, then it was the duty of the plaintiffs, Pinckney Bros., and their correspondent in New York, to exercise due diligence in making the loss as small as possible. It was an order, as received in New York, for the purchase of four hundred bales of cotton; and the party in New York bought the four hundred bales of cotton for the month of August. Now, gentlemen, having bought the four hundred bales of cotton, then if the company was liable for the mistake, then this person might have held on to that contract to its maturity, and then the loss occasioned by it at its maturity would have been the measure of damages. But if he saved loss by selling it out before the contract reached maturity, then it was a prudent sale. If the premature sale occasioned a loss, then that might have operated to prevent the plaintiffs from recovering.

It is contended that the operator could not have had in contemplation the danger of a mistake, or the probable importance of the message. Suppose that message had not been delivered, and the contracts in New York had not been entered into, then the company could not have been held responsible for the possible profits which the party might have made. But when the mistake has been committed, and the contract has been entered into, and produces an actual loss, then if the mistake is due to the negligence of the company, they are responsible for the actual damage, and that alone.

I am requested by the plaintiff to charge you as follows:

1. "That upon the acceptance by a telegraph company of a message of any kind for transmission, the company is bound to transmit the same correctly and without error, unless prevented from so doing by some uncontrollable cause." I will not put it in that shape. The company is bound to use due diligence, care and skill in transmitting the same correctly.

3. "That a telegraph company is liable for actual and proximate damage and loss, caused by an error or mistake in a telegram of any kind, unless such error or mistake be produced by some uncontrollable cause." I can't use that language exactly. I will charge that a telegraph company is liable for actual and proximate damage and loss, caused by an error or mistake in a telegram of any kind, if such error be produced by carelessness or negligence.

4. "That proof of the contract, the consideration and the breach, in an action by the sender of a message against a telegraph company for damages caused by an error or mistake in the message, is prima facie evidence of carelessness or negligence, for which the company is liable. And that thereupon the burden of proof is on the company to disprove the presumption of carelessness or negligence, by showing that some uncontrollable cause produced the mistake—or at least that some one or more uncontrollable cause or causes were in existence, to which the error might be attributable. And it is not enough to prove that the company has used the utmost care and diligence." That proposition I will not charge. But I will charge you as hitherto, that the burden of proof is upon the company, when a prima facie case is made out against it, to show not how the error occurred, but to show that the error did not occur by the fraud, malpractice or negligence of the company. The error might have been caused by something so mysterious that it could not be proved. It is only necessary, therefore, to show the exercise of due care and diligence, and thus negative the presumption of negligence.

I am requested by the defendant to charge the jury as follows: * * *

5. "That the company, having shown the observance of due care in the selection of its agents and in the instruments used for the business it undertakes, and having shown the exercise of care by its operators, is not bound to go farther in rebutting the allegation of negligence." I would add to that: It is only bound to prove due care, and is not called upon to reveal the precise cause of the mistake.

6. "That the defendant company is not bound to show that errors in the message did occur from some cause other than the negligence of its officers or servants, if it show, as far as such proof is possible, reasonable care, and thereby exclude the conclusion of negligence." That is correct.

These constitute the instructions which I have been requested to give you—and which I now charge you, with the explanations and modifications which you have heard. You have seen the contract, its nature and character; you have heard the testimony as to the incidents that naturally attend a night message; the increased risk which the party sending a night message takes. Having thus explained to you the law applicable to this contract, you will take the case; and if, from the preponderance of the testimony, you come to the conclusion that this was an error attributable to the neglect, fraud or malpractice of the defendant, then the plaintiff can recover the amount of the actual loss; but if, on the contrary, you come to the conclusion that the mistake has been accounted for in a manner which shows that it cannot be charged to the negligence of this company, or that it may be referred to some unknown cause, your verdict must be for the defendant. If they have carelessly or negligently wronged the plaintiff, then you will give the plaintiff the actual loss sustained. But if they have not done this, and the error is not attributable to the negligence of the company's officers, you will release the company from liability. The small amount involved in this case must not influence your verdict in any degree.

*79

*The plaintiffs appealed to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because W. J. Miller and W. J. McCormack (two of the jurors who were sworn and examined on their voir dire, and who tried the cause,) were incompetent and should have been excluded from the jury.

2. "Because his Honor erred in charging that 'the company is not called upon to explain how the mistake did occur.'

3. "Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge as requested by the plaintiffs' counsel in their first request.

4. "Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge as requested by plaintiffs' counsel in their third request.

5. "Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge as requested by the plaintiffs' counsel in their fourth request.

6. "Because his Honor erred in charging as requested by defendant's counsel in their fifth request; and in charging, in addition, that 'it is only bound to prove due care, and is not called upon to reveal the precise cause of the mistake.'

7. "Because his Honor erred in charging as requested by defendant's counsel in their sixth request.

8. "Because the evidence before the jury was insufficient to support the verdict found; and because the verdict should certainly have been for the plaintiffs for a 'sum equal to ten times the amount paid for transmission,' to wit, in this case, the sum of $5, if not for the actual loss which they had sustained."

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

Mr. E. McCrady, Jr., in reply.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiffs, citizens of Charleston, sent a night message from that city over defendant's wires to their agent in New York, directing him to purchase a certain number of bales of cotton. The message was in cipher, and a mistake was made in its transmission, on account of which several hundred more bales were bought than plaintiffs ordered. Cotton fell in price, and the plaintiffs incurred a considerable loss. This action was brought to recover damages because of said loss. The message being a night message, and under the rules of the company not required to be repeated or to be sent as promptly as day messages, was transmitted at much lower rates, and also upon different conditions than those attending the latter, all of which was specified in a special contract, printed as a heading upon the paper, on which the message was written, of which the following is a copy:

"Blank No. 45.

"The Western Union Telegraph Co.

"Half Rate Message.

"The business of telegraphing is liable to errors and delays, arising from causes which cannot at all times be guarded against, including, sometimes, negligence of servants and agents whom it is necessary to employ. Most errors and delays may be prevented by repetition, for which during the day half price extra is charged in addition to full tariff rates. The Western Union Telegraph Company will receive messages, to be sent without repetition during the night, for delivery not earlier than the morning of the next ensuing business day, at one-half the usual day rates, but in no case for less than twenty-five cents tolls for a single message, and upon the express condition that the sender will agree that he will not claim damages for errors or delays, or for non-delivery of such messages happening from any cause,

*81

*beyond a sum equal to ten times the amount paid for transmission; and that no claim for damages shall be valid unless presented in writing within thirty days after sending the message.

"Messages will be delivered free within the established free delivery limits of the terminal office. For delivery at a greater distance a special charge will be made to cover the cost of such delivery, the sender hereby guaranteeing payment thereof.

"The company will be responsible to the limit of its lines only, for messages destined beyond, but will act as the sender's agent to deliver the message to connecting companies or carriers, if desired, without charge and without liability.

"A. R. Brewer, Secretary.

"Norvin Green, President.

"Send the following half rate message, subject to the above terms which are agreed to:

"☞ Read notice and agreement at the top."

The judge charged the jury that the stipulations in this contract in reference to absolute and unconditional exemption for errors and mistakes, were void as against public policy, and that notwithstanding these stipulations, the company was still liable if the mistake occurred from either the fraud, malpractice or negligence of its agents, employés or servants.

We may say at this point that no exception in the "Case" questions the correctness of this ruling, and therefore it is not involved in the appeal, and, not being involved, we have not considered it. The questions before us come up from another portion of the charge, and upon these the appeal depends. In the portion of the charge alluded to, the judge instructed the jury that upon a prima facie case being made by the plaintiffs, (which would be so upon proof of the contract to send, of the consideration and of the breach,) that then to rebut this the burden was upon the defendants to show that the mistake did not occur through any carelessness or negligence on their part, or of their agents. He further instructed that the company was not bound to prove either how the mistake occurred, or that it *did occur from some other cause than the negligence of its officers or servants. In substance, he charged that the company was not bound to explain how the mistake occurred, but was only required to show that it did not occur through the carelessness or negligence of its servants or officers, and that the onus of showing this was upon the defendants, as matter of defense.

The verdict was for the defendants. The plaintiffs have appealed upon several exceptions, assigning error. These exceptions, however, when analyzed and reduced, really raise but a single question, or rather, upon examination, it appears that the whole appeal turns but upon one question, which is this: A prima facie case having been made for the plaintiff by proof that the message had been received and transmitted by the company with a mistake in its terms, which resulted in loss to plaintiff, whether the company could be relieved from liability except by showing that the mistake occurred from some uncontrollable cause or causes, to which it could be attributed, the difference between the appellant and the presiding judge being that the judge charged that proof of due care, or the absence of negligence and carelessness on the part of the company, was good defense, while appellant contends that nothing short of an uncontrollable cause could relieve or exempt, the onus of showing this being upon the defendant.

We do not know that there can be any cause which, in the language of the exception, may be termed "uncontrollable," except it be an act of God or irresistible force, and the question to be considered, therefore, is, whether telegraph companies are liable for all mistakes made in the transmission of messages, except such as occur from an act of God or irresistible force, the onus of showing which is upon them.

There are three classes of cases in which the law has settled the principle, independent of the stipulations in the contract, which is to govern where alleged injuries have been received by one at the hands of another. These are: first, bailments; second, duties undertaken by one claiming to be skilled in the matter which he undertakes, such as medical treatment and other professional employment; and, thirdly, common carriers. As to the two first, the principle is that reasonable and due care and *skill, according to the nature and character of the work done or service rendered, is guaranteed, and, in case of injury, to be exempt, the defendant must show the presence of this care and skill, or, which is the same thing, the absence of negligence and inexcusable carelessness. As to the latter, to wit, common carriers, the more stringent principle is that nothing but an act of God or irresistible force (expressed in the books as the public enemies) will exempt.

Now, into which of these classes shall telegraph companies be placed, or to which have they been regarded as belonging? It is true, the business in which these companies are engaged is quasi-public, but there is a wide difference between them and that of common carriers, and the foundation upon which the very stringent doctrine of non-exemption, except for an uncontrollable cause, is imposed by the law upon common carriers is altogether wanting as to a telegraph company. There is no motive or opportunity for a telegraph company to make mistakes or commit errors. There is no inducement or possibility for such companies to appropriate anything which may be entrusted to them, to their own benefit, at the sacrifice of their employer's interests. Their business is simply to transmit messages by the medium of that mysterious agent, electricity, which, with increasing progress, is now being made to contribute so wonderfully and so usefully to our wants.

In the discharge of their duties, the principal qualifications required are experience, practice, skill and good faith on the part of their agents and servants, but even with the best qualified employés, much depends upon electric, atmospheric and other subtle influences beyond the reach of experience and of the utmost skill: while, therefore, there is reason for holding them responsible for the qualifications necessary for the proper performance of the work which they propose to do, as the first classes mentioned above are held, to wit, professional employés and bailees, yet there is no reason for holding them as insurers like common carriers. Common carriers transport goods, merchandise and other corporeal materials, which are constantly in their possession from the commencement of their trip until the destination is reached, and it is entirely reasonable that they *should guard and protect these goods against all dangers which can be warded off by human power. But telegraph companies transmit ideas—intangible and fleeting things—which, when placed upon the wire, instantly escape from the hands of the operator, and in a moment—yea, in the twinkling of an eye—are hundreds and thousands miles away, far beyond the reach and control of him who started them upon their distant mission, passing through different parallels of latitude or degrees of longitude, as the case may be, with the rapidity of thought, but encountering for themselves all the dangers or obstacles that may be met by the way. To apply the rule of common carriers to these companies, would, it seems to us, be extremely unjust, and to hold them absolutely liable as insurers would greatly impair this mode of correspondence, crippling, if not destroying, a most important and growing department of business.

Such we do not understand to be the law as settled in England, or in a majority of the American States. It is true there is a lack of uniformity in the decisions, and in many cases where the point has not been distinctly adjudged, will be found many loose and somewhat ill-defined expressions tending to the application of the stringent doctrine of common carriers, but the current of authority is decidedly opposed to this. 2 Thomp. Negl. 836, and the numerous cases cited in the note at that page. Cases from New York, Pennsylvania, Missouri, Maryland, Michigan, Kentucky and other States. We concur in the doctrine indicated in these cases, and therefore think there was no error in the Circuit judge declining to rule as requested by the appellant.

In many of the cases which have been before the courts, the principal question has been whether these companies could exempt or limit their liability by special contract, either as to day or night messages. In this, the same want of uniformity exists. But this question is not before us, and we have not felt called upon, therefore, to consider it.

We do not think that these companies are bound to explain how mistakes, like this complained of here, occurred. This, from the very nature of the subtle agent made use of, would in many cases be utterly impossible, at least at the present stage of *information upon that subject, and the law does not require impossibilities.

Our opinion is that telegraph companies, as to the work which they engage to do, belong to that department known as bailment, especially to that class styled locatio operis facendi, and that they are governed by the principles of law which have been long since established in reference to this department. We think the charge of the judge was in accordance with these principles, and therefore this appeal cannot be sustained.

The exception as to the competency of one of the jurors cannot avail. If it had clearly appeared that the juror had formed a fixed and decided opinion, then he should have been excluded, but this was a matter about which the judge was peculiarly qualified to determine, and we cannot say that he erred in his judgment. As it appears to us, if the juror had any bias it was decidedly in favor of the plaintiffs, but he distinctly stated that no opinion formed by him in a previous case would have the least influence upon him in this. In a case like this we would not feel warranted in overruling the decision of the presiding judge, whether his decision was the one way or the other. It is our province to correct errors of law and not of fact, and this seems to be more a question of fact than of law.

The plaintiff's cause of action, as appearing in the complaint, being outside of and independent of the contract between the parties, he cannot fall back upon that contract in this action. The complaint presents the only issue between the parties, and the case must stand or fall on that.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, April, 1882. The opinion states the case.

Mr. E. F. Stokes, for appellant.

Messrs. T. Q. Donaldson and M. F. Ansel, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. Were it not for the fact that we have had some previous acquaintance with the nature and object of these actions, inasmuch as they have, in different forms, been before this court on previous occasions, it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to understand from the meagre "Case" now presented what were the questions involved. It seems that under a decree of Judge Kershaw, of April 19th, 1881, the master was directed in both of these cases to restate the account between Edward F. Stokes, the present appellant, and the estate of John Westfield, deceased, and that accordingly the master submitted reports, in which he ascertained the balance due the appellant, after deducting all credits on two notes presented by him, against the estate of John Westfield, to be the sum of $1,588.54. To these reports the appellant filed sundry exceptions, couched in such general terms that, without a previous knowledge of the fact, it would be impossible to ascertain the nature of the errors complained of. The exceptions are as follows:

"Because the report is premature, the master having reported on certain matters which are pending before the Supreme Court, and which remain unsettled.

"The defendant excepts to so much of the master's report as *allows discounts on said notes to the amount of $4,992.49, and to the allowance of interest on the amount claimed as discounts on said notes.

"The defendant excepts to so much of the master's report as fixes the amount due on the notes mentioned in said report, to defendant, at $25,425, only, the amount due on said notes exceeding this.

"Because the amount still due, after deducting the discounts allowed by the master, exceeds $20,432.51.

"Because the amount still unpaid after deducting credits on notes, exceeds $1,588.54.

The cases came before Judge Aldrich for a hearing upon the reports of the master, which are set out in full in the case, and the exceptions thereto, above set out. When the cases were first called for hearing, on the evening of April 10th, 1882, they were postponed, "at the request of the appellant, until the next morning, with the understanding that they were to be taken up at 10 o'clock, appellant stating that his papers were not in court. At the call of the causes at the time appointed, the appellant was absent, and sent a message that he was unwell and could not attend." The Circuit judge then directed that a notice be served on the appellant that, unless sufficient cause be shown, at 3 o'clock p. m. of that day, orders would be presented to the court overruling the exceptions and confirming the reports. The sheriff, upon going to the house of appellant to serve this notice, was refused admittance, whereupon he left a copy of the notice with the sister of the appellant. At the hour appointed, no sufficient cause being shown, and the judge being satisfied that the plea of sickness was not well founded, and it being the last day of the term of the court, orders were granted overruling the exceptions and confirming the reports of the master. From these orders this appeal was taken in the following words:

"The defendant excepts to the orders of the presiding judge, and submits that the orders were premature, and that they should not have been passed without allowing defendant a hearing upon the exceptions, and he submits that there is still due on the notes, after deducting all legal credits, the amount of $11,143.56.

From the foregoing statements derived from the "Case" as *prepared for argument here, it appears that the only ground of appeal which we could properly be called upon to consider, is whether there was any error on the part of the Circuit judge in proceeding to hear the cases in the absence of the appellant, who seems to have been acting as his own counsel. It has so often been adjudged that questions of continuances of cases are addressed exclusively to the discretion of the Circuit judge and are not reviewable by this court, that it seems wholly unnecessary to cite the authorities. But even were we at liberty to consider such questions, we do not see how we could say that there was any error in proceeding with the hearing of these cases, notwithstanding the absence of the appellant. He was in court when the cases were first called for hearing, and on his motion and for his convenience they were postponed to a designated hour on the next day, with the understanding that they were then to be heard. When the hour thus appointed arrived, the appellant was absent, and his absence was accounted for by a simple message that he was unwell and unable to attend. No certificate from a physician was produced—not even an affidavit from appellant or any friend or member of his family, showing his inability to attend the court, and yet the judge extended him still further indulgence, giving him explicit notice that if no sufficient cause should be shown, the court would proceed with the hearing of the causes at a designated hour, which was very near the close of the term. And when that hour arrived, no sufficient cause being shown, we do not see what else the judge could do, in justice to the other parties litigant, but proceed with the hearing of the causes.

We are entirely satisfied that there was not only no error upon the part of the Circuit judge, but that he extended every indulgence to the appellant which he could reasonably demand or expect. If he had done as other parties litigant are expected and required to do—furnish the court with satisfactory legal evidence of his inability to attend the court, we do not doubt that the Circuit judge would have pursued a different course. But when the appellant persistently refused to pay any attention to the summons from the court, and even denied admittance to the officer sent to notify him, he certainly could not expect that *indulgence which the court is always disposed to extend to a party litigant who, by some accident or from some cause beyond his control, has been found in default.

While this would be sufficient to dispose of this appeal, we have been induced, by what seems to be the earnest conviction of appellant that great injustice has been done him, to look into what we understand to be his real grounds of complaint, not because we think the appellant has any legal right to demand it, but simply ex gratia. His first exception to the reports of the master has nothing whatever in the "Case" as presented here to sustain it, and from our previous knowledge of these cases we are satisfied that there is nothing upon which it could be sustained. The other grounds of appeal really involve but two questions: 1st. Whether both or only one of the notes presented by appellant against the estate of Westfield, bore annual interest after maturity. 2d. Whether the estate of Westfield was entitled to credit on the notes for the amounts which the trustees had been required to pay on judgments obtained against appellant by various of his creditors under proceedings supplementary to an execution.

While we think that both of these questions have been already adjudged in the previous course of this litigation, we may take this occasion to say that, in our opinion, they were correctly adjudged by Judge Kershaw, adversely to the views contended for by appellant. He seems to think that because the two notes are very nearly identical in form, the decree of Judge Kershaw, adjudging that one bears annual interest after maturity, while the other does not, is manifestly inconsistent, and, therefore, must be erroneous. The fact is, however, that, so far from these notes being practically identical in form, there is a material and fundamental difference between them—one being payable within twelve months after its date, while the other is payable more than twelve months after its date; and the law is well settled, that when the maker of a note promises to pay the sum mentioned in it, at twelve or within twelve months after its date, "with interest from date payable annually," it is necessary, in order to give the words italicized any force and effect, to construe the promise as a promise to pay the interest annually until *the note is fully paid. Hence, on a note so drawn the interest will continue to be payable annually after, as well as before, maturity. But where the promise is to pay more than twelve months after date, "with interest from date payable annually," no such necessity arises, and therefore the interest does not continue to be payable annually after maturity. This doctrine is so well settled in this State that it is not necessary to do more than refer to the cases. Singleton v. Lewis, 2 Hill 408; O'Neill v. Sims, 1 Strobh. 115; O'Neill v. Bookman, 9 Rich. 80; Wright v. Eaves, 10 Rich. Eq. 582; Sharpe v. Lee, 14 S. C. 341.

In regard to the other question, as to allowing the estate of Westfield credit on the notes for the amounts which the trustees had been required to pay out of the property placed in their hands to meet these notes, on judgments against appellant, under supplementary proceedings, we do not think there can be any doubt. If any wrong was done to appellant in the recovery of those judgments, or in the orders under the supplementary proceedings, such wrong should have been corrected by appeal from such judgments or order, or by some proceeding to set them aside. But surely after the trustees had been compelled to apply a portion of the proceeds of Westfield's property to the payment of debts of the appellant, which were in judgment against him, it was nothing but the plainest equity that the estate of Westfield should have credit for the amounts so paid.

We are satisfied, therefore, that in no view of the case has the appellant any legal ground to complain of the judgments rendered in these cases. The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court in both of the cases above stated be affirmed.

*91

*Before Aldrich, J., Orangeburg, May, 1882. The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Lathrop & Webster, for appellant.
Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an indictment for riot, assault with intent to kill, and aggravated assault and battery. Each of the three counts charged that the offense was committed on April 7th, 1882, in the county of Orangeburg.

Henry Galluchet, the prosecutor, testified that on the night stated he and two others were sleeping in a new school-house near where he had been working that day. There was a large camp of workers at Holcomb's mill, about half a mile off; during the night he was aroused by the talking of Henry Glover and Cyrus Jones, who wanted him to go with them to the mill. He refused, and they carried him by force three or four hundred yards to a place near the swamp, where there was a great crowd of people, who tied him to a tree, and, coming up in squads, whipped him for an hour with clubs and switches, marking him severely from his shoulders to his feet. During the time, while they were tying him, he heard some one in the crowd say "Kill him." He said he recognized all of the defendants as being among those who whipped him.

Ned Robinson, one of the men who were sleeping with Galluchet in the school-house, testified that when he was awakened from sleep Galluchet was going out of the door "grumbling" with some persons; afterwards heard "hallooing down to the branch;" went down where they were; heard "a parcel of men talking easy," and when they came towards him he ran off.

Dr. W. S. Barton testified that he saw

Galluchet the Sunday following. Did not examine his condition further than his face, which was badly banged up and mutilated; his face was badly beaten up.

A. M. Sally, sheriff, testified that he was the sheriff of Orange*burg county; knows what is called Holcomb's mill, near the Colleton line; did not see the school-house, but the place where it was, in a clump of pines, was pointed out to him by his deputy, who had been to it; has executed warrants in the neighborhood; treated as a part of his bailwick; does not know, but is satisfied where the Colleton line runs; so satisfied that he executed the warrants; could only get information upon the subject by inquiring; received his information from mill hands, and also from Mr. Westbury in particular; was so satisfied that he executed the warrants without having them endorsed.

*92

Adam Wannamaker testified, that he used to live in the section near Holcomb's mill; knew of two school-houses down there, about two miles apart; one built some seven or eight years ago, and the other last July; knew where the county line runs; between Dick Summers' and Holcomb's mill, about half a mile from the mill; runs from east to south; it is blazed on the trees something like the line surveyors make; leaves the old school-house on the Colleton side; "this school-house" (the new one) "is in an old field with pine woods round it, right north of the mill and about half a mile from it; if you were at Holcomb's mill and looking towards the sunrise, you would look across a little bit of the Orangeburg road" (line).

The defense was an alibi, and, to sustain it, two witnesses, Isaac Berry and Shedrick Carn, testified that on the night in question they were in the same camp with defendants here on trial, about a mile from the mill in a direction of right angles from the school-house. Both witnesses testified that they were awake that night until after the moon had risen, and were positive that neither of the defendants left the camp before that time. In reply Mr. John S. Rowe testified that he was acquainted with Isaac Berry, witness for the defense, that his reputation was bad and that he would not believe him on his oath from that reputation.

No requests to charge were made. The judge charged the jury, they returned a verdict of "guilty," and the defendants appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "Because the judge charged the jury that there is no proof whatever that there was any private enmity existing between the

*93

*prosecutor and the defendants, not a particle of proof on that score. He comes here and gives you a full and detailed account of what happened on that occasion.

2. "Because the court further charged the jury that he (the prosecutor) was beaten, is established beyond a doubt.

3. "Because the court further charged the jury that he (the prosecutor) says that he identified those (the defendants), and he had an opportunity of identifying them, not only from their countenances, but from their voices.

4. "Because the court charged the jury that 'the defense set up is an alibi. It is a favorite defense—I think it is called, in the books, "the rogues' defense." It is always a complete defense if established, but it is a very dangerous one, because when a person is accused of committing a crime and he sets up a false defense which cannot be established, and the jury do not believe it, then it raises a presumption of guilt from the fact that he sets up that which is not true.'

5. "Because the court further charged the jury: 'Now you are to take all these facts into consideration, and if, as fair, honorable and just-minded men, you come to the conclusion that there is a reasonable doubt upon your minds that this man, Galluchet, has been mistaken in his identification of the parties, you must give them the benefit of that doubt. But if you have no such doubt, you will weigh the testimony, as honorable men, and say what conclusion you have arrived at.'

6. "Because the court further charged the jury: 'So far as the county is concerned, you will take into consideration the evidence which has been introduced. The sheriff says it is his bailiwick, and that he served papers there. Mr. Wannamaker says that the school-house is in the county, and he says that the line of the county was marked and blazed out beyond where the school-house is. If you have no doubt on the subject, why you need not let that consideration weigh with you a single iota.'

7. "Because the court further charged the jury: 'The only question for you to decide is, Has Galluchet told the truth? If he has, he has brought this offense home to these defendants. If he has not, or has been entirely mistaken and your minds hesitate, you will give the defendants the benefit of the doubt.'

*8. "Because the jury having rendered a verdict of guilty as to the defendants, Mordecai Summers, Pat Summers, Sr., Ben Glover, Asbury Davis, Asbury Baxter and Clay Johnson, the court then sentenced the said defendants to be confined in the State penitentiary, at hard labor, for the period of five years."

The eighth exception, as to the punishment imposed, was not pressed. The case involved only questions of fact, on which the jury have passed, and it is, therefore, taken from the consideration of this court, unless the judge committed error of law in submitting it to the jury.

Exceptions one, two, three, four, five and seven complain that the judge, in regard to the matters stated in them respectively, transcended his authority under section 26, article IV., of the constitution, which declares that "Judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." There is no more difficult duty imposed upon this court than that of deciding questions which arise under this clause of the constitution. This difficulty arises from the vague, undefined nature of the subject. What is embraced in the right to "state the testimony"? Who can fix with certainty the exact limit, and apply it satisfactorily to the infinite combination of circumstances which arise in the administration of justice? If there is no testimony, the judge undoubtedly has the right to say so; and it is as clearly his right and duty to classify and arrange the evidence under proper heads, that the jury may be the better enabled to apply the law to the facts.

In the case of the State v. White, 15 S. C. 392, this court stated the rule, as follows: "While the judge is not expected to confine himself to a mere statement or repetition of the testimony as it was delivered, but may place it before the jury in the order in which it relates to the propositions which it is adduced to support or contradict, by pointing out the questions of fact which arise, and calling the attention of the jury to the evidence applicable to such questions, yet he should carefully avoid expressing any opinion which he may have formed from the facts, leaving it for the jury to draw their own conclusions, unbiased by any impression which the testimony may have made upon the mind of the judge."

*Taking this as the test, we cannot say that the particular expressions complained of in the judge's charge, when considered in connection with the whole, did more than place the evidence before the jury in the order in which it related to the issues made. The point in the case, was whether the defendants were the persons who did the whipping; and we do not see that the judge indicated any opinion on that subject, when he said, "That the prosecutor comes here and gives you a full and detailed account of what happened on that occasion;" or when he said, "That the prosecutor was beaten is established beyond a reasonable doubt;" or, "Has the prosecutor sufficiently identified the accused to enable you to come to a conclusion that they are the same who perpetrated the outrage on that occasion? If you are not satisfied that he has identified them, you must give them the benefit of any reasonable doubt that arises in your minds. * * *

He says that he identified them, and he had an opportunity to identify them, not only from their countenances but from their voices. * * *

is, Has Galluchet told the truth? If he has, he has brought this offense home to these defendants. If he has not, or has been entirely mistaken, and your minds hesitate, you will give the defendants the benefit of the doubt. * * * Now you are to take all these facts into consideration, and if, as fair, honorable and just-minded men, you come to the conclusion that there is reasonable doubt upon your minds that this man, Galluchet, has been mistaken in his identification of the parties, you must give them the benefit of that doubt. But, if you have no such doubt, you will weigh the testimony as honorable men, and say what conclusion you have arrived at."

Nor do we think that the observations of the judge, as to the general character of the defense of alibi, stated in the fourth exception, was such an expression of opinion upon the facts of this particular case as should set aside the verdict. Particularly, as the judge added: "If these men were not present, of course they could not have committed the offense. They may account for themselves in the way it has been described to you by the solicitor. So far as the question of evidence is concerned, you *are to decide that without the assistance of the court, and you are to decide it upon the comparison of the testimony."

Exception six charges that the judge erred in his statement of the evidence in relation to the venue, saying that "so far as the county is concerned, you will take into consideration the evidence which has been introduced. The sheriff says it is his bailiwick and that he served papers there. Mr. Wannamaker says that the school-house is in the county; and says that the line of the county was marked and blazed out beyond where the school-house is. If you have no doubt on that subject, why you need not let that consideration weigh with you a single iota."

The indictment charged that the offense was committed in the county of Orangeburg, and it was necessary that the State should prove it. In order to do so, the sheriff of the county, A. M. Sally, and Adam Wannamaker were sworn as witnesses. No evidence was offered on the other side. Neither of them stated in express terms, as reported in the case, that the school-house where it was alleged the whipping had taken place, was in the county of Orangeburg, but they both said substantially that. What they did say could not be understood to mean anything else. Sally said that he knew where the school-house stood in a clump of pines; that he had served writs in that neighborhood; that he had made inquiries and received that information, and that he was so satisfied that he executed the writs without having them endorsed. This alone was prima facie evidence of the fact, sufficient until the contrary was shown, and properly for the consideration of the jury.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

IRWIN v. BROOKS.

[1. Dower ⇨98.]

Five commissioners in dower met, examined the land and failed to agree; the Probate judge ruled them and required a return to be made, but only three were served, and these three thereupon met without notice to the others, and made a return. Held, that the return was sufficient.

[2. Dower ⇨99.]

The parties in interest are not allowed as matter of right to assail a return of commissioners in dower, where it has been fairly made and is unaffected *by fraud, or error of law or fact; but the court may withhold confirmation from a return which, in its judgment, from any cause, does injustice.

[3. Dower ⇨99.]

A decree of a Probate judge not approving, but, nevertheless, confirming a return of such commissioners, reversed upon the ground that the Probate judge erred in supposing that he was without power to set the return aside.

[4. Costs ⇨3; Dower ⇨111; Statutes ⇨267.]

The law now of force regulating costs governs an action commenced in 1872, but not determined prior to the act of 1880. 17 Stat. 296. Therefore, the demandant of dower in lands of her husband aliened during coverture is entitled to her costs, although the dower was not demanded before the institution of her suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⇨3; Dower, Cent. Dig. § 359; Dec. Dig. ⇨111; Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 357; Dec. Dig. ⇨267.]

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, November, 1880.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

This was an appeal from decree of the Probate Court confirming the return of commissioners appointed in that court, for the admeasurement of petitioner's dower in certain lands which are in the possession of the defendant. Reference will be had for the facts to the records in the case, and they need not here be repeated.

The Probate judge says in his decree: "It does seem to me to be the intention of the law that the doweress must, if possible, be provided with a present means of enjoyment of her dower, and I intended to send this case back to the commissioners, coupled with such instructions as would change their return, so that at least some more cultivatable land would be set out to her; but after more mature reflection and consideration of the testimony, I am reluctantly forced to another conclusion: reluctantly, because, while I feel assured that the return here confirmed, does not give the doweress the full measure of her right, still the case made is not sufficient to set aside the return of commissioners where no fraud nor error of principle is shown."

The position taken is that the return of commissioners is conclusive and beyond the control of the court, unless they have been guilty of fraud, or proceeded upon erroneous principles. That though manifest injustice may have been done by the commissioners, and this is clearly seen by the court, yet the return may not be interfered with, except in cases of fraud or erroneous principles. This appears to me to be an error in the *Probate judge. The return is under his control, and he may set it aside and direct an assignment de novo to be made by the commissioners, whenever manifest injustice appears to him to have been done.

In directing such new assignment, he may and should indicate to the commissioners the objections he finds to exist in the former return. Care should be taken to have each commissioner duly notified to be present at all meetings and conferences of the commissioners, and proper efforts should be made to procure their attendance. The judge of Probate has ample authority to compel such attendance, and the performance of other duties required by the writ, by attachment, and other punishment for contempt, if necessary. The unexplained absence from their deliberations of any of the commissioners might of itself constitute a valid objection to a return, especially when they had not all been properly notified to be present as in this case.

The Probate judge has the same powers which the judge of the Court of Common Pleas had under the act of 1876, of which chapter 113 of the General Statutes is almost a literal transcript, only substituting the Probate Court for the Court of Common Pleas. That court had full control of the return of the commissioners in dower, and could correct any mistakes therein of fact or law, just as the chancellor could in the Courts of Equity. Beaty v. Hearst, 1 McM. 31; Gibson v. Marshall, 5 Rich. Eq. 261. The latter case is especially instructive in this; for the court says there: "It is not necessary that there should be corruption or misfeasance on the part of the commissioner; it is enough to set aside their return, that they have mistaken the extent and value of the interest or shares of the parties concerned." The Probate judge is right in supposing that the doweress should "be provided with a present means of enjoying her dower." It is intended as a provision for her support and maintenance, and when land is specifically set apart for that purpose, it should always, if practicable, include a proper portion of arable or other productive lands. So stoutly has this principle been insisted on in some instances, that the widow has been held not dowerable of wild and unimproved lands; but the law here is more favorable to the widow.

*It is claimed by the respondent that the petitioner should not be allowed costs, according to what is said in section 333 of the code of procedure. That section was repealed by the act of 1873, 15 Stat. 500, § 17. The general rule is, that the demandant in dower is entitled to her costs.

It is adjudged, that the appeal be sustained, and the order of the judge of Probate confirming the return of the commissioners in dower be reversed; that the case be remanded to the Probate Court for such further and other proceedings as may be proper to complete the assignment of dower to the petitioners, in accordance with the principles herein declared; also, that the defendant pay the costs of this appeal.

Mr. T. S. Moorman, contra, cited Dudley 127; 1 Bay 495; 2 Id. 449; 1 McM. 31; 5 Rich. Eq. 259; 3 Wait Pr. 456.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Susan C. Irwin, then Smith, on October 28th, 1871, filed a petition in the Probate Court for Newberry county, claiming dower in a certain tract of land, containing 475 acres, then in the possession of defendant. A. M. Smith, the husband of the petitioner, then lately dead, had been seized in fee of the land during the coverture of the petitioner, but it seems that it had been sold by the sheriff in his lifetime. The right to dower was not seriously contested, and the only questions in the case arise in relation to the mode of procedure in laying it off to her. On February 24th, 1872, a writ was issued for the admeasurement of the dower, and the commissioners made return, laying off as dower a part of the said land, but the return was set aside on the ground that the commissioners had included in the land laid off their estimate of the petitioner's share of the rents and profits.

On January 17th, 1878, the petitioner filed a supplemental petition and a new writ for the admeasurement of dower was issued to five commissioners, viz.: W. W. Wallace, D. C. Crow, M. B. Lipscomb, J. W. Williams and J. T. Kelly, who made return that they "could not agree." On May 3d, 1878, the Probate judge made an order that "the commissioners make a formal and legal return within ten days from the date of the order." All the commissioners (except Lipscomb, who lived in another county,) had notice of this order, but no return was made as directed. On July 26th, the Probate judge made another order, requiring the four commissioners who had been served with the previous order, "to show cause why they should not be attached for contempt in refusing to obey said order." This last rule was served on only three of the commissioners, viz.: W. W. Wallace, D. C. Crow and J. T. Kelly, and these alone made return on August 1st, "laying off by metes and bounds 156¼ acres of land to the petitioner for dower," and the rule against them was discharged.

To this return the petitioner filed exceptions: "First, that all of the commissioners were not notified of the time and place of meeting when the dower was assessed; and second, that the 156¼ acres set off as dower is not one-third of the whole land, nor a just, fair and impartial division thereof—the remaining two-thirds being worth at least three times the value of the said one-third." Testimony was introduced before the Probate judge by the petitioner to set aside the return, and by the defendant to sustain it. The Probate judge with much hesitation confirmed the return. Upon appeal to the Court of Common Pleas, the Circuit judge reversed this ruling, and from his order the defendant appeals to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his Honor erred in reversing the decree of the Probate Court, confirming the return of the commissioners, which was made after several examinations of the land, and after mature consideration of their duty in the premises, and was sustained by the evidence of many witnesses taken before the Probate Court at the instance of the petitioner.

2. "Because his Honor erred in reversing the decree of the Probate Court, confirming the return of the commissioners, when it did not appear in any way that they were guilty of any fraud or proceeded upon erroneous principles.

*101

*3. "Because his Honor erred in deciding that the defendant should pay the costs of this appeal, upon the ground that the seventeenth section of the act of 1873, page 500, repealed section 333 of the code, which declares that the dowress shall not recover costs when she applies, as in this case, for dower in the lands aliened in the husband's life-time, 'unless it appears (as it does not in this case) that the dower was demanded before the commencement of the action and was refused.' This suit was commenced in 1871, and the repeal of said section 333 after that time, cannot affect this case, and his Honor therefore had no power to order the defendant to pay the costs right in the face of the positive injunction of the statute."

If there was nothing else in the case but the fact that the return was signed by only three of the five commissioners, we do not think that of itself would be sufficient to set it aside. The power is given to the commissioners, "or a majority of them." All the commissioners seem to have gone upon the land and to have had conferences upon the subject prior to the making of the return, but at the time final action was taken and the return made, two of them were not present for the reason that they had not been notified of the time and place of meeting. It does not appear that they were intentionally excluded. The other three commissioners were obliged to make return promptly, on pain of being attached for contempt, and knowing the views of the absent commissioners, they proceeded to purge the contempt by making the return. We suppose the absence of the signatures of two of the commissioners might, under these circumstances, be regarded by the Probate judge as not more significant than if the two had made written protest against the return. It has been held by this court "that a return of the majority of the commissioners in dower must stand, unless fraud or error of law or fact be shown, and this although the minority dissent in writing." Stewart v. Blease, 5 S. C. 433.

When, at the instance of the parties, commissioners are appointed by the court to lay off dower, they become a part of the machinery provided by law for that purpose. They are selected, and their judgment invoked on account of their supposed fitness. They take a solemn oath to discharge the duty, *and when they have exercised their best judgment fairly, honestly and impartially, and embodied that judgment in a return in proper form, we think that return is something more than a mere estimate of a certain number of persons, which may be overthrown by the opinions of the same number of other persons examined as witnesses. It is a record. The commissioners are in one sense the agents of the parties, who are not allowed as matter of right to assail the return, if it has been fairly made and is the judgment of the commissioners, unaffected by fraud or error of law or fact. If the law were otherwise, controversies as to value resting only in opinion, would never end. Buckler v. Farrow, Rich. Eq. Cas. 180; Stewart v. Blease, 5 S. C., supra.

In the case from Richardson, which was in reference to a return in partition, the court says: "The commissioners are required by law to divide the land, if it be practicable to do so without injustice to any of the parties, and they are also required to make a return of the entire valuation. * * * If it appear on such a return made that there has been mistake, fraud or corruption, no doubt the proceedings would be set aside, and a new writ of partition ordered. But nothing of that sort is pretended in this case. * * * The commissioners are the agents of the parties, acting under the authority of the court, and they are as much bound by their return made in due form, fairly and impartially, as a plaintiff and defendant would be by an award of arbitrators made under a rule of court," &c.

But the better opinion seems to be that, whether the parties themselves may or may not demand it as a right, the court which issued the process still has control of it, and in the exercise of a sound discretion may withhold confirmation from a return which, in its judgment, does injustice from any cause. It seems to be considered that, to complete the matter, both the return of the commissioners and the confirmation of the court are necessary. Payne v. Payne, Dud. Eq. 127; Beaty v. Hearst, 1 McM. 31; Gibson v. Marshall, 5 Rich. Eq. 262. In the last case cited Chancellor Wardlaw said: "It is not necessary that there should be any corruption or misfeasance on the part of the commissioners; it is enough to set aside the return that, *they have mistaken the extent and value of the interests or shares of the parties concerned. Their return is intended to satisfy the conscience and judicial discretion of the chancellor, and any circumstance exhibiting error on their part may justify him in refusing to do that which seems to him to be inequitable."

In the case before us no such thing as "mistake, fraud or corruption" was charged, only a mistake in judgment on the part of the commissioners, and in accordance with the principles above announced, if the Probate judge had approved the action of the commissioners and simply confirmed the return, we would have been inclined to sustain it. But he seems to have confirmed it contrary to his judgment, in the view that as no fraud or error of principle was shown, he had not the power to withhold his confirmation. In his decree he says: "I intended to send this case back to the commissioners, coupled with such instructions as would change their return, so that at least some more cultivatable land would be set out to her; but after more mature reflection and consideration of the testimony, I am reluctantly forced to another conclusion: reluctantly, because while I feel assured that the return here confirmed does not give the dowress the full measure of her right, still the case made is not sufficient to set aside the return of commissioners when no fraud nor error of principle is shown." We agree with the Circuit judge that in this the Probate judge erred in underrating his power.

In regard to the costs: As the case has to go back, it would seem to be premature to determine now the question of costs, but the matter is made the subject of one of the exceptions.

It is true that subdivision 6, of section 333, of the original code (1870) provides that "in an action hereafter brought to recover dower, before admeasurement, of real property aliened by the husband, the plaintiff shall not recover costs, unless it appear that the dower was demanded before the commencement of the action and was refused." This section was stricken out by the amendments to the code in 1873 (15 Stat. 500), and certain other provisions inserted in its place, but in the section striking out it is "provided that nothing herein contained shall apply to suits commenced and existing at the time of the passage of this act, *wherein the costs shall be the same as allowed previous to the passage hereof." This action was commenced in 1871, after the code but before the said amendment, and if there was no other law upon the subject, the costs in this case would probably have to be taxed under the provisions of the original code, unaffected by the amendment of 1873. But in 1880 the legislature passed an act covering the whole subject of costs, (Gen. Stat. §§ 2425-2446,) which in effect repealed the provisions of both the original code and the said amendment as to costs in cases for dower, and, as we understand it, this is now the only law of force upon the subject.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

KENNESAW MILLS CO. v. WALKER.

JENKINS &amp; SON v. SAME.

[1. Execution ⇨393.]

In supplementary proceedings separately taken by two judgment creditors against the same defendant, an order was passed in each case, referring it to a referee to take the examination, the referee in both cases being the same person. Held, that the two cases might be heard together.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sparks v. Davis, 25 S. C. 384.]

For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1146; Dec. Dig. ⇨393.]

[2. Reference ⇨47.]

A referee, no matter how limited his powers, must sometimes necessarily decide questions of law arising in the progress of the inquiry he is ordered to make.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. § 78; Dec. Dig. ⇨47.]

[3. Judges ⇨27.]

A Circuit judge at his chambers in a county other than that in which the judgment debtor resides, may pass the final order in supplementary proceedings, the examination of the defendant having been had in his own county before a referee appointed for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. § 119; Dec. Dig. ⚭27.]

[4. Contempt ⚭72; Execution ⚭398; Jury ⚭16.]

An order in supplementary proceedings for the surrender of a sum of money ascertained to be in the defendant's hands, and for imprisonment in case of refusal, is not a "punishment without trial by jury," nor "imprisonment for debt," within the meaning of those terms as used in the constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. § 251; Dec. Dig. ⚭72; Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1151; Dec. Dig. ⚭398; Jury, Cent. Dig. § 89; Dec. Dig. ⚭16.]

[5. Contempt ⚭55; Execution ⚭402.]

But in an order for the delivery of money by the judgment debtor to the receiver, it is error to incorporate a direction for imprisonment in case of refusal; the application for attachment should be made after the time fixed for the execution of the order, and on rule to show cause.

The order to pay over should direct a payment of so much only as is necessary to satisfy the debts proven, and the costs of the proceeding.

*105

*Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, January, 1880.

These were supplementary proceedings in the two cases of the Kennesaw Mills Company against W. E. Walker, and T. Robert Jenkins & Son against the same defendant. The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. B. Cleveland, for appellant.

Messrs. Evans, Bomar & Simpson, J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. In each of these cases judgment was rendered against the defendant, W. E. Walker, in the county of Spartanburg; one for $147 and costs, and the other for $67.42 and costs. Executions were issued against the property of the defendant and returned by the sheriff "unsatisfied." Supplementary proceedings in each case were instituted, in which Judge Wallace, at chambers, made similar orders, appointing Charles P. Wofford, Esq., referee, and directing the defendant to appear before him at Spartanburg Court House, on May 8th, 1879, and answer concerning his property, and abide such order as might then or thereafter be made in the premises.

The same referee being appointed in both cases, to hear the matter at the same time and place, he considered both the cases together. At the outset a motion was made to vacate the service of the orders upon the defendant, which the referee refused, and after an examination of the defendant and taking other testimony, and giving very careful consideration to the facts, he reported on May 23d, 1879, that the defendant had in his possession or under his control money at least to the amount of $1,097.50, which he unjustly refused to apply to his debts. The report also stated that there were other outstanding judgments against the defendant, amounting to the sum of $4,864.19.

As Judge Wallace was the judge of the Circuit to which Spartanburg belongs, and had ordered the proceedings, the report was made to him at his home in Union county, and he, at chambers, after full argument and consideration, confirmed the report of the referee, appointed Charles P. Wofford, Esq.,

*106

receiver, with *all the rights and powers of a receiver under the law, and then ordered as follows: "It is further ordered that William E. Walker, the said defendant, do pay over to Charles P. Wofford, the said receiver, the aforesaid sum of one thousand and ninety-seven and fifty one-hundredths dollars, now in said defendant's hands, within two days after personal service of this order upon said defendant, or that in default of such payment (such default to be evidenced by the affidavit of said receiver, served upon the sheriff of Spartanburg county,) that said sheriff do arrest said defendant, William E. Walker, and commit and imprison him in the common jail for said county as for a contempt of court, until he shall comply with this order, or unless sooner discharged by order of court. It is further ordered that from the amounts which under this order may come into his hands, the said receiver do first pay the costs and disbursements of these proceedings, to be taxed by the clerk of the court, and that he do retain the balance thereof subject to the further order of this court."

To this decree the defendant excepted, and appeals to this court, charging error as follows:

1. "That he had not jurisdiction to pass such order at chambers in Union county, when the record showed upon its face that the judgment debtor was ordered to appear and answer in Spartanburg county, and the proceedings were had to enforce the payment of an execution issued from the Court of Common Pleas for Spartanburg county, based on an action tried in that county and not lodged in the county of Union.

2. "His Honor, the Circuit judge, erred in holding that the orders passed by Judge Pressley were not an estoppel to a further proceeding herein, when the orders passed by Judge Pressley are still of force and not appealed from.

3. "Because his Honor erred in holding that the cases could be heard together, and that the same examination could be used in both cases.

4. "Because of error in that the Circuit judge held that the referee could decide questions of law, when the report and evidence submitted showed upon its face that the referee passed upon matters of law to which objection was made at the time, and argued before him and exceptions taken.

*5. "Because the order passed by his Honor, January 27th, 1880, is unconstitutional and not warranted by law, in that it inflicts and imposes a punishment as for a contempt, and subjects the defendant to imprisonment, before he can be heard by himself or counsel as to whether he may be in contempt, and is a decree final in its nature and not passed in term time.

6. "Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that there was such a continuity of proceedings as rebutted the presumption of abandonment from the lapse of time.

7. "Because the order directs the payment of a sum in gross which is more than sufficient to satisfy the claims of the plaintiffs.

8. "Because the order vests in the sheriff of Spartanburg county the right to determine whether the order is obeyed, and to that extent is a delegation of power which can rest only in the court.

9. "Because the order is repugnant to and in violation of section 14, article I. of the constitution of this State, in that it inflicts a punishment not based on the verdict of a jury.

10. "Because the process for commitment does not run in the name of the State of South Carolina, and is not tested by the seal of the court."

The second exception seems to have reference to some homestead proceedings before Judge Pressley, in which other creditors objected to the homestead assigned to the defendant. Neither the record nor Judge Pressley's rulings were in evidence before the referee, and can not in any way affect this case.

The third exception complains that the judge erred in holding that the referee could hear the cases together. We are unable to see why not. The union did not and could not injure the defendant. The course pursued by the referee not only saved time, trouble and expense to all concerned, but was precisely the proper course. Where there is more than one judgment creditor, prosecuting supplementary proceedings against the same debtor, the practice is to unite them in one proceeding. All the creditors have a common interest in the same matter. The proceeding is not technically what is called a special proceeding, but a continuation of the action in which the judgment was recovered, and in one sense a substitute for *the former creditor's bill. Voorh. Ann. Code, page 462 and notes. Section 318 of the code, after giving the judge the power to appoint a receiver of the property of the judgment debtor, provides: "But before the appointment of such receiver, the judge shall ascertain, if practicable, by the oath of the party or otherwise, whether any other supplementary proceedings are pending against the judgment debtor, and if such proceedings are so pending, the plaintiff therein shall have notice to appear before him, and shall likewise have notice of all subsequent proceedings in relation to said receivership. No more than one receiver of the property of a judgment debtor shall be appointed," &c.

The fourth exception makes the point that the referee could not decide questions of law, but without specifying any particulars in which he erred in that respect. We agree with the Circuit judge that a referee, no matter how limited his powers, must sometimes necessarily decide questions of law which arise in the progress of the inquiry he is ordered to make. If he has not decided such questions wrongly and thereby prejudiced defendant's rights, there is no just ground to complain. The Circuit judge certainly had this right, and he approved all the rulings of the referee. In looking carefully through the record we can not see that the referee decided any questions of law, except those raised by the defendant himself. He moved to vacate the service of the order under which the reference was held, and now complains that the referee had no right to decide that motion. To set aside a referee's report upon such grounds would be to put proceedings in the power of those against whom they were instituted.

The first exception makes the point that the judge, at chambers, in Union county, had not the right to confirm the referee's report and grant the final order—the defendant residing, and the judgment having been recovered, and the proceedings before the referee had, in the county of Spartanburg.

The code of procedure, in the chapter on the subject of "Proceedings supplementary to the execution," provides as follows:

"Section 312. When an execution against property of the judgment debtor * * *

is returned unsatisfied, the judgment creditor, at any time after such return made, is entitled to an order from a judge of the Circuit court, requiring such judgment debtor to appear and answer concerning his property before such judge, at a time and place specified in the order, within the county to which the execution was issued," &c.

"Section 320. The judge may in his discretion order a reference to a referee agreed upon by the parties or appointed by him, to report the evidence or the facts, and may in his discretion appoint such referee in the first order or at any time."

"Section 318. The judge may also, by order, appoint a receiver of the property of the judgment debtor, in the same manner and with the like authority as if the appointment was made by the court according to section 265," which provides that "A receiver may be appointed by a judge of the Circuit court, either in or out of court."

"Section 317. The judge may order any property of the judgment debtor, not exempt from execution, in the hands either of himself or any other person, or due to the judgment debtor, to be applied towards the satisfaction of the judgment," &c.

From these provisions it is manifest that the judge, as well as the court, may make orders in supplementary proceedings. Indeed, it seems that at least the first order for the examination of the debtor can only be made by the judge out of court. Voorh. Code 464, note. It seems to us also that the restriction in section 312, "within the county to which the execution was issued," relates only to the examination of the debtor. When that examination had to be made before the judge who issued the order, the place where he kept his chambers was a matter of importance with reference to the view that the debtor, compelled to answer, should not be carried out of his county to do so.

But after the power was given to the judge to appoint a referee to take the examination and "report the evidence," it ceased to be important where the judge who issued the order resided. Wilson v. Andrews, 9 How. Pr. 39. When the referee in this case took the examination of the debtor in Spartanburg county, and reported the evidence to Judge Wallace, the whole purpose *of the provision in the code was accomplished, and all other orders in the case "to continue and consummate the proceeding," including that made upon the evidence reported to him, could be made by the judge of the circuit at his home in Union, within the judicial district, though not in the county of Spartanburg, where the execution was issued and the examination was taken. Crouse v. Wheeler, 33 How. Pr. 337.

Exceptions 5, 8, 9 and 10, in different forms, make the point that the order appealed from is unconstitutional, first, as repugnant to and in violation of section 14 of the "Declaration of Rights," in that it inflicts a punishment not based upon the verdict of a jury; but if not, second, that the attachment was ordered prematurely, in being included in the same order which required the payment of the money; that it could only issue by the judge himself, after the disobedience and failure to show cause why the attachment should not issue.

If the first ground could be sustained, it would utterly defeat the whole purpose of supplementary proceedings, which, after the abolition of imprisonment for debt, were given as a sort of substitute for the old process of capias ad satisfaciendum. There can be no doubt that a court of record has the right to enforce its orders by attachment as for a contempt. As we understand it, that has always been the law in this State. Ex parte Thurmond, 1 Bailey 607; Sherman v. Cohen, 2 Strobb. 556. In the last-named case a certain sum of money was found to be in the hands of a garnishee. The court ordered him to pay it, which he refused to do, and, having no other means of enforcing it, held that it might and should be enforced by attachment for a contempt.

In delivering the judgment, Judge O'Neill said: "If the court has ordered it to be paid over (as in this case), and the defendant has failed to comply, cannot the court enforce that order? To say that it cannot would be to make the mandate of the court a sound and no more. But the case Ex parte Thurmond, 1 Bailey 606, tells us that an attachment may be issued to compel the performance of 'the orders' of a court of record. This shows that when no other remedy is given to enforce obedience, attachment is proper. The notion that a party has *sworn off the contempt in advance, and therefore the writ can not issue, is altogether wrong," &c.

We do not think that this pre-existing right of the court to enforce its own orders by attachment, was taken away by the fourteenth section of the "Declaration of Rights," in the constitution of 1868, which declares that "the general assembly shall not enact any law that shall subject any person to punishment without trial by jury." Commissioners of New Town Cut v. Seabrook, 2 Strobb. 564. The code of procedure, enacted soon after the constitution was adopted, and to a large extent by the same persons who framed it, gives the right in express terms. Section 322, upon this very subject of supplementary proceedings, enacts that "if any person, party or witness, disobey an order of the judge or referee duly served, such person, party or witness may be punished by the judge for contempt."

But it is urged that this view is met by that other provision of the present constitution, which forbids imprisonment for debt "except in cases of fraud"—that attachment in such case for the non-payment of money is only an indirect way of restoring the old law of imprisonment for debt. In regard to the enforcement of an order by attachment there may possibly be some difference (alluded to in some of the cases) between an order for the payment of money generally, and the delivery of property—a specific thing, such as a horse, a watch, or a note. In the former case, the order, in form at least, is something like a money decree, and as such may be supposed to run counter to the aforesaid provision of the constitution, but clearly in the latter case no such question can arise.

We consider that the order in this case to turn over the money was something more than mere process for the collection of a debt which was already in judgment, and the execution returned “unsatisfied.” It was in effect an order to deliver a specific thing—specie or bank bills to a certain amount—ascertained to be in the possession or under the control of the defendant; and the super-added order to attach him in case of his disobedience, was not within the provision of the constitution against imprisonment for debt. The question in the case of Gilliam v. McJunkin, 2 S. C. 443, was as to the enforcement by attachment *of a mere money decree of the Probate judge, which was rendered without authority of law. Besides, may it not be said that such orders are never issued except “in cases of fraud,” which are exceptional. Be that as it may, the code, as above stated, has expressly given the power, and in section 199, which prohibits arrests in civil cases, declares that “the same shall not apply to proceedings for contempt.”

It only remains to consider the form of procedure adopted. It appears that there was no application made to attach the defendant after he had failed to obey the order, but the same order which required the money to be paid within two days, went on and directed in the alternative, “or that in default of such payment, (such default to be evidenced by the affidavit of the receiver, served upon the sheriff of Spartanburg county,) that said sheriff do arrest said defendant, William E. Walker, and commit and imprison him in the common jail for said county, as for a contempt of court, until he shall comply with this order or unless sooner discharged by order of court.” Was this error? The code gives the right to attach for contempt, but no direction as to the form of proceeding. As to that we must look to the general law and practice.

It seems to us that there is force in the view that one failing to obey an order, should have an opportunity to be heard upon the subject before he is punished by imprisonment. The nature of the right to attach is such—being in stricti juris and involving the liberty of the citizen—that in exercising it the greatest care should be observed, to the end that the subject of it should not be deprived of any privilege which the law gives him. It may be conceded that in his return to a rule to show cause why he should not be attached for disobeying the order to pay, the defendant could not renew the litigation and re-open the question of fact as to whether he had possession or control of the money, which was adjudged against him upon his answering before the referee, (Freem. Judg., § 327,) but we can conceive of matters which might be shown in the return, as, for instance, that the money, after it was found to be in his possession, had been lost or destroyed without fault upon his part. It is the safer course that the judge or the court which issued the order should hear *the application for attachment, after the time fixed for its execution, and determine whether there has been in fact a default, and if so, whether any excuse which may be given should or should not be held sufficient to exonerate the party.

It is true the order in the alternative follows precisely the form for such an order given in 4 Wait Pr. 170; but it seems that the New York authorities upon this subject are not in accord. The same author elsewhere, under the head of “Process of Contempt,” states the practice as follows: “Application for an order of attachment may be made ex parte or on notice of motion, accompanied by copies of the papers on which it is founded. Whether it shall issue in the first instance or on notice, is discretionary with the court or the officer granting it. It is said, however, that the usual and more advisable course is to apply for the attachment on notice in the usual manner, or on an order to show cause. * * * The order for the attachment should merely direct the issuing of the attachment, or only declare that it appears to the court there is probable cause for issuing an attachment, to bring the defendant before the court to answer as to the alleged contempt. It should not contain an adjudication of the court that the defendant is guilty of the contempt,” &c. 4 Wait Pr. 181.

We see no reason why the attachment for contempt, allowed in supplementary proceedings, should not conform to the general rule. The case of Earle v. Stokes, 5 S. C. 336, is the only one in our reports in which there was an attachment to enforce an order made in supplementary proceedings, and in that case there was a rule to show cause after the failure to answer. As we understand it, the practice in this State is not to attach until the party has had an opportunity to be heard. In the case of the State v. Hunt, 4 Strobb. 338, which was the attachment of an attorney for contempt, the court say: “The proceeding by rule is the result of the provision contained in the act of 1811, which grew out of the commitment by Mr. Justice Grimke of the constables at Newberry in 1807, who were found absent from their posts, without requiring them to show cause. Its provision, that no one shall be imprisoned without *hearing him, necessarily, in a case like the present makes the proceeding by rule proper. It has the sanction of a well settled practice, and is prudent as affording cooling time and an opportunity for the interference of friends."

We do not see in the case any evidence that judgment creditors, other than the two who instituted the proceedings, were ever notified or came in as parties and proved their judgments. Neither their names nor the respective amounts of their judgments are given. The only reference made to them is the statement of the referee that "It was in testimony that there were other outstanding judgments against the defendant amounting to the sum of $4,869.14, inclusive of interest and costs." Under these circumstances we can not regard these other judgment creditors as parties to the proceeding, in such sense as to authorize an attachment in their behalf. The order to pay the money found to be in the hands of the defendant should have been limited to so much as was necessary to pay the costs of this proceeding, and the debt, interest and costs of the two judgment creditors who instituted supplementary proceedings.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, in so far as it confirmed the report of the referee; but in so far as it ordered the defendant to pay the whole sum found to be in his hands, or in default thereof to be arrested and imprisoned, be set aside and the case remanded for such further proceedings as may be deemed necessary, according to the principles herein announced.

January 30th, 1883. The following order was passed by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. On hearing the pleadings, the agreed statement of facts and the argument of counsel, and after full consideration thereof, it is adjudged that the plaintiff relator is entitled to the relief demanded in his complaint, and that judgment be entered accordingly, and also for the plaintiff's costs and disbursements. The reasons upon which this judgment is based will be announced in an opinion hereafter to be filed.

March 20th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. At the general election in November, 1882, the relator was elected register of mesne conveyances for Greenville county, an election for said officer in said county at each general election having been provided for by amendment to the General Statutes, passed at the session of 1881-82. Gen. Stat., § 764. After giving the required bond and receiving his commission from the governor, he demanded the books and records of said office of the respondent, W. A. *McDaniel, clerk of the court. McDaniel declined to give them up, claiming that having been elected to the office of clerk of the court in said county, at the general election in 1880, when the duties of register of mesne conveyances were attached to said office, and his term not having expired by two years, that he was entitled to hold on for that time. Upon this refusal, the relator commenced this proceeding in the nature of quo warranto, which, upon an agreed statement of facts without action, has been heard under the original jurisdiction of this court.

The ground relied upon by the respondent to sustain his refusal is the unconstitutionality of the act under which the relator claims to have been elected. This proposition is urged upon three grounds: 1. Because it was an amendment to an act as to a matter not expressed in the title of said act, and therefore in violation of section 20, article II., of the constitution, which declares that every act and resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject and that shall be expressed in the title. 2. That McDaniel having been elected clerk for four years, when by law the duties of register of mesne conveyances had to be performed by the clerk, he had a vested right in said office, both by law and by contract, of which he could not be deprived by an "act." 3. That the office of register of mesne conveyances was a constitutional office with a fixed term, and therefore beyond the reach of an "act."

The first ground, we think, is met by section 3, article V. of the constitution, which provides that the general assembly at its first session and within every subsequent period of ten years, shall make provision to revise, digest and arrange under proper heads the body of our laws, civil and criminal, &c. &c. This section not only authorizes the general assembly to consolidate the matter directed therein, but imposes it as an absolute duty, and inasmuch as no special mode is prescribed for the performance of this duty, the end carries with it all the necessary powers, the general assembly having carte blanche in their exercise according to its discretion.

No doubt the end intended to be accomplished was the formation of a code containing all the acts of force at the time in a statutory form and arranged according to some definite and well-considered plan, which, being adopted as a whole, would take the place of the mass of separate statutes found scattered through different volumes containing the numerous acts of the different sessions. At all events the general assembly seems to have come to the conclusion that the requirements of this section of the constitution could be best accomplished by the enactment of a general statute of the kind indicated above. Hence the commission to whose labors the work was entrusted, and hence the general statutes which have been the result,

Now, it is admitted that this general statute does not relate to but one subject which is expressed in its title—on the contrary it relates to the numerous subjects found in the different acts which it embraces and codifies, and there seems to be no title attached; and being in both respects in direct conflict with section 20, article II., of the constitution, if that section applies of course it would follow that the position of the respondent is well taken. Does it apply? We think not, for the reason indicated above. We do not see how the work required of the general assembly, section 3, article V., referred to supra, could possibly be performed with that body trammelled and hampered by section 20, article II.

The provisions of the constitution evidently intended that all the acts passed in the different decades of our history, should be arranged and embraced together in one general and convenient form, and when so arranged should have the force and effect of law. We see no way in which this could be done except by the passage of one general act containing them all, duly ratified and approved, and inasmuch as this could not be done in accordance with the requirements of section 20, article II., we must conclude that said section was never intended to apply to this duty, as we can not think that the constitution would impose a duty upon the general assembly, and at the same time tie its hands and thereby prevent the discharge thereof.

In our opinion section 3, article V., makes an exception to section 20, article II., and is in the nature of a proviso thereto. The two should be read together, and when thus read both can be sustained in harmony, as follows: Every act and resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, which *shall be expressed in the title, except as to the revision and codification of the statutes, which the general assembly is required to make every ten years, in such way and according to such scheme as may be deemed best. Thus construed, we think the general assembly had power to put the general statutes upon its passage without regard to section 20, article II., and when thus upon its passage it was subject to such amendments as in its wisdom the legislature might adopt according to the rules governing in such cases.

We understand that the objection that the two houses did not concur in the amendment in question has been withdrawn. It therefore need not be considered. Nor in the view we have taken, is it necessary to consider the question of fact, whether this amendment was read three times in each house, because, being simply an amendment to a bill which was thus read, the rule suggested was complied within the three readings of the original bill. We conclude that the first ground relied on by respondent can not be sustained.

Second. Did the respondent have such vested right in the office of register of mesne conveyances, by virtue of his being clerk of the court, as that the legislature could not divest it? As to this, it is only necessary to say that a public office, created by legislative enactment, never escapes from the control of the legislature; on the contrary, such office exists by sufferance only, as it were. If there be no constitutional inhibition, its powers and duties may be modified or limited as the public interest may require, or the entire office may be abolished at the will of the legislature. See the numerous authorities cited by the relator, and especially our own case of Alexander v. McKenzie, 2 S. C. 81.

It is said, however, that while this may be the case as to offices created by acts of the general assembly, yet this has no application here because this is a constitutional office of four years. This position has no better foundation than those already considered. The office of register of mesne conveyances seems to have come down to us from a remote period in our history. In 1685 (2 Stat. 14) we find provision made for a register of marriages, births, &c. In 1695 (2 Stat. 120) this officer was *required to reside in Charleston. In 1698 it was enacted that the sale, conveyance or mortgages of land first recorded in the register's office in Charleston, should be good as against conveyances not so recorded. 2 Stat. 137. This last appears to be the first mention of an office for the recording of deeds, &c.

In the constitution of 1776 (1 Stat. 133) the office is mentioned by name as "register" of mesne conveyances, to be elected by joint ballot of the general assembly and legislative council, and to hold his office during good behavior." In the constitution of 1778 (1 Stat. 143) it is provided that the register of mesne conveyances in each district shall be elected by joint ballot of the senate and house of representatives for the term of two years.

In the constitution of 1790 no mention is made in terms of this office, but section 2, article VI., (1 Stat. 190,) after having directed how certain named officers should be elected, provides that "all other officers shall be appointed as they hitherto have been, until otherwise directed by law."

The matter remained in this condition until 1799 (7 Stat. 296), when an act was passed constituting the clerk of the court of each district where the county courts had been established, as register of mesne conveyances. In 1812 (5 Stat. 674) it was enacted that registers should be elected by the legislature for a term of four years. In 1839 (11 Stat. 88) it was enacted that clerks of the court, whose election had previously been given to the people, should be the registers of mesne conveyances in their respective districts, except in the districts of Georgetown and Charleston.

Thus the law stood at the adoption of the constitution of 1868. The act of 1839 was embodied in the general statutes, and under this act the clerks of the several counties have since been discharging the duties of register, except in Georgetown and Charleston. In 1882, by the act now under consideration, a change was made as to Greenville county, which provides that the register for that county shall be elected at every general election, thus substantially cutting down the term of office for this county for two years, and withdrawing it from the duties of the clerk of the court. This act also provides that the register for Charleston shall be the register for the new county of Berkeley.

It will be seen from this history that under the constitutions of 1776 and 1778, this office was a constitutional office, the tenure under the first being good behavior, and under the second for two years. In the constitution of 1790 it was impliedly recognized as in existence, and to remain so until otherwise directed by law. Since then, and up to the constitution of 1868, by virtue of the above provision of the constitution of 1790, it has been entirely under the control of the legislature, as appears from the various acts referred to above, to wit: Acts of 1799, 1812 and 1839, supra. The constitution of 1868, as has been stated, makes no provision in reference to it, either as to the mode of election or its terms. At the adoption of this constitution, the act of 1839, which imposed the duties of register upon the clerks of most of the counties, was of force, and this act remained of force, by virtue of its original enactments, until it was incorporated into the general statutes, in 1872.

Thus it will be seen that, at the session of 1882, when the present act was passed, the office of register and the mode of having its duties performed depended solely and entirely upon the act of 1839, which had been passed by virtue of the constitution of 1790, and which had been re-enacted and incorporated into the general statutes in 1872. In 1882, therefore, the constitution of 1790 having been swept away and a new constitution adopted in 1868, which latter made no mention of this office, it was simply (and nothing more) a legislative office, and, therefore, under the authorities already cited, subject to be modified, limited, or altogether abolished, at the will of the legislature.

Let this opinion be filed with the judgment of this court heretofore pronounced and entered.

Application refused.

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, April, 1882. Action by M. G. DeCamps against A. Carpin.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. Julius H. Heyward, for appellant.

March 22d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover certain amounts alleged to be due to the plaintiff by one P. Jaffeux, the payment of which the plaintiff claimed had been assumed by the defendant.

It seems that the plaintiff, being the owner of a tract of land, had agreed to sell it to Jaffeux for $500, the same price which he paid for it, and had also befriended him by making advances and becoming security for stock and fertilizers. Jaffeux being unable to pay for the land, negotiations were opened by the defendant for the purchase of the land, by letter bearing date July 24th, 1878, in which he proposed certain terms which are stated in the letter as follows: "You will sell me your property, with immediate possession, in consideration of the sum of $500, which I will pay at the following dates, viz.: $100 the 1st of January 1879, * * * and lastly, $100 the 1st of January 1881. * * * It will be impossible for me to do any better, and above all to give any money at once, besides in giving you $100 on the 1st of January next, and that which Mr. Jaffeux will give you, may be $100 also, you will then have the sum you wish to have. I say $100, but I do not know if Mr. J. owes you that sum, in interest or otherwise. At any rate I engage myself to compensate you at this period of that which he may owe you outside of the price of acquisition, such as interest, money still due on stock or any private account, &c., from the time he went on the farm until the day I enter in possession. * * * If these, my conditions, seem acceptable to you, you can settle to date with Mr. Jaffeux all he owes you, and make him acknowledge the sum payable on the 1st January next. I will be security if you desire it."

These terms were acceded to by plaintiff with a slight modification as to the rate of interest, and accordingly titles were made to defendant, and he went into possession. The plaintiff then made a settlement with Jaffeux and found that they were about even, but plaintiff was liable as surety for Jaffeux on a note to one Davis, for $65, given for a mule, and, Jaffeux failing to pay, the plaintiff paid the note to Davis on June 28th, 1879. The plaintiff had also become surety for Jaffeux for some guano and for a physician's bill due by Jaffeux, amounting together to the sum of $10.90, which the plaintiff subsequently paid.

The plaintiff, in his complaint, amongst other things alleges that on July 24th, 1878, the defendant "wrote to this plaintiff a letter requesting the plaintiff to sell said land to defendant, upon certain terms therein set forth, and agreeing to be security for all that the said Jaffeux might be indebted to plaintiff in case he accepted the terms proposed. That plaintiff sent a message to the defendant the next day, agreeing to sell him the land upon the terms set forth in said letter, with a slight modification in the rate of interest. That these terms were accepted by the defendant, and this plaintiff made a title to said land to the defendant in accordance with the terms of said agreement." The complaint then goes on to allege an indebtedness on the *part of Jaffeux, which, however, was not proved at the trial; and also that he had been compelled to pay the note to Davis, as well as the other liabilities mentioned above, and demands judgment for the amount so due by Jaffeux, together with the amount so paid for him by plaintiff, as surety.

The defendant, in his answer, admits writing the letter referred to, a copy of which is set out in the "Case," "in which certain terms were offered the plaintiff for the purchase of the tract of land mentioned in the complaint, as also certain terms upon which the defendant would be willing to bind himself as surety for such debts of the said Jaffeux as were specified in the said letter, but the defendant denies that said terms have ever been accepted or complied with;" and he also denies all the other allegations contained in the complaint.

The only testimony offered at the trial was that of the plaintiff himself, and the letter of defendant above referred to. Amongst other things, the plaintiff testified "that it was the understanding between him and the defendant that the defendant was to re-imburse him for every liability, of every kind whatsoever, which he had incurred for Jaffeux, and that he would not have sold the land to the defendant, at the price agreed upon, on any other terms, as he could have sold the land to other parties at an advance of $150."

At the close of the testimony defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the following grounds: "1. That it had not been shown that the terms offered in the letter of defendant had been complied with, and unless it were shown that the amount claimed by the plaintiff had been acknowledged by Jaffeux, and made payable on January 1st, 1879, as required by the terms of said letter, the defendant could not be held liable. 2. That by the very terms of the letter itself, the defendant could not be held liable for any debts of the said Jaffeux, paid by the plaintiff after July 24th, 1878." The motion for a non-suit was refused and the defendant offered no testimony.

The Circuit judge, amongst other things, charged the jury as follows: "Now, the question for you is, What was the contract? Did the defendant, Carpin, promise to pay the plaintiff, DeCamps, the $500, and, in addition, what Jaffeux owed him *for money advanced, and also for what he was liable to pay on his account?" The jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appeals upon various grounds, which, in substance, allege error in refusing the motion for nonsuit, and in leaving it to the jury to say what was the contract between the parties.

There can be no doubt that the plaintiff brought his action upon the contract as stated in the defendant's letter, only modified as to the rate of interest, about which there seems to be no dispute, for that is the only contract mentioned in the complaint and there is no allegation that it was in any way modified except as to the rate of interest. On the contrary, it is expressly alleged that the contract was "upon the terms set forth in said letter, with a slight modification as to the rate of interest." By that contract, therefore, must the plaintiff stand or fall.

The rule is well settled that the construction of the terms of a written contract is a question for the court and not for the jury, (Mowry v. Stogner, 3 S. C. 251; Hammond v. Port Royal and Augusta R. R. Co., 15 S. C. 10; Russell v. Arthur, 17 Id. 477.) and therefore we think that the Circuit judge erred in referring it to the jury to say what was the contract between the parties. The contract sued upon was the one stated in the letter, and it was for the court, and not for the jury, to say what was the proper construction of the terms in which it was stated in the letter. The real point in dispute between the parties was, whether, under the terms of the contract sued upon, the defendant agreed to pay simply what was due by Jaffeux to the plaintiff at the time, or whether he did not also agree to pay whatever debts the plaintiff might then be liable for as the surety of Jaffeux, and which might afterwards be paid by the plaintiff. The plaintiff contends for the latter, while the defendant insists that the former is the true construction of the terms of the contract.

We think that the construction contended for by the defendant is the correct one. The terms proposed in the letter of the defendant, which were acceded to by the plaintiff and which have hereinbefore been stated, conclusively show that the agreement was that defendant was to pay whatever Jaffeux might then owe the plaintiff, and not what he might subsequently become *indebted for by reason of a surety debt subsequently paid or otherwise. This is evident from the fact that the proposition was to pay on January 1st, 1879, what Jaffeux then owed to plaintiff, and confirmed by the further fact that defendant went on to say if his terms were accepted the plaintiff could settle with Jaffeux "to date," July 24th, 1878, "all he owes you," and make him acknowledge the same payable January 1st, 1879. This certainly could not have been done if the intention was to include not only what Jaffeux then owed plaintiff, but also what he might subsequently owe him on account of a surety debt subsequently paid by plaintiff for him.

Until the plaintiff paid the debt upon which he was surety for Jaffeux, the latter could not be said to owe the plaintiff anything on account of such debt, for it might turn out that Jaffeux would himself pay the debt and thus relieve his surety, or it might be that the surety never would pay the debt; and, hence, as it is well settled, it cannot be said that Jaffeux owed anything to the plaintiff at the time, on account of the debts for which the plaintiff was surety for Jaffeux. The indebtedness of Jaffeux to the plaintiff on account of these debts did not arise until nearly a year after the contract in question was made, to wit, on June 28th, 1879, when the plaintiff paid these debts, and we do not see how such indebtedness could have been brought into a settlement, to be made with Jaffeux in July, 1878, in which he was to acknowledge the sum due, which was to be payable January 1st, 1879. It seems, too, that such must have been the intention of the parties at the time, for it appears from plaintiff's own testimony that when the contract with defendant was closed, that he had a settlement with Jaffeux, as proposed by defendant in his letter, in which it was ascertained that Jaffeux then owed him nothing.

It is true that the plaintiff, in his testimony, did say "that it was the understanding, between him and the defendant, that the defendant was to reimburse him for every liability of every kind whatsoever which he had incurred for Jaffeux," but this amounts to nothing more than an attempt on the part of the plaintiff to give construction to the terms of the contract in question, and nothing is better settled than that, when parties *contract in writing, they must abide by the terms as written, and cannot interpolate into the contract the "understanding" which the parties had of the meaning of those terms. We must look alone to the writing to ascertain what were the words used by the parties, and then it is for the court, and certainly not for one of the parties, to give a proper construction to the words used.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the plaintiff not only failed to prove that Jaffeux owed him anything at the time the contract with defendant was made, but, on the contrary, did prove that he then owed him nothing, the motion for a non-suit should have been granted. And as it is not a case of a want of evidence merely, but one in which the nature of the demand, as set up by plaintiff, is such that he cannot in any event recover, under the authority of the case of Sampson & Wyatt v. Singer Manufacturing Company, 5 S. C. 465, the complaint must be dismissed.

This case differs from the case of Carter v. Columbia and Greenville R. R. Co., [19 S. C. 20, 45 Am. Rep. 754], and Carrier & Harris v. Dorrance, ante p. 30, decided at the present term, in this respect: In those cases the motions for non-suit were based solely upon the want of evidence tending to establish material allegations in the complaints, while here the nature of the demand, as set up by plaintiff, is such that he could not in any event, recover. The real cause of action is the indebtedness of Jaffeux to plaintiff, arising from the payment by plaintiff of certain debts for which he was liable as surety for Jaffeux, and, as we have seen, the defendant could not be made liable, under a proper construction of the agreement upon which the complaint is based, for such indebtedness, no matter how well established.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed.

[1. Trusts ⇨89.]

In order to establish a resulting trust in lands conveyed to the grantee, it is necessary that an actual payment of the purchase-money, or some definite portion of it, should be clearly proved to have been made by the cestui que trust at the time of the purchase.

[2. Judgment ⇨772.]

*Lands conveyed to a judgment debtor become instantly subject to the lien of the judgment, unless there be some equity then existing superior to such lien; it cannot be defeated by a subsequent payment of the purchase-money by a third party.

[3. Trusts ⇨70.]

A., against whom there was an outstanding judgment, purchased land in his own name, and paid for it with a check upon funds in bank to his credit, and charged the same on his books to an account with certain adjacent property owned by himself and B. jointly, the income from which A. alone collected, and which was then in credit with him—there being at the time no agreement between the two concerning the matter. After deducting such payments, divisions of profits from the property so held in common, and also from the new purchase, were made, and balances due to B. were credited to his indebtedness on another account in A.'s books against B., who, upon a full adjustment of his several accounts with A., was indebted at all times until after the death of A. Held, that in the land so purchased there was no resulting trust in favor of B., and that it was subject to the lien of the outstanding judgment against A.

Before Thomson, J., Charleston, June, 1880.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree, omitting its statement of the petition, was as follows:

The case was referred to the master, Hon. W. D. Porter, who, upon examination, held that a trust resulted in favor of the petitioner, and so reported. The case comes before the Circuit Court upon exceptions to the master's report, filed by Christopher F. Hampton, administrator and creditor of George A. Trenholm, by judgment in the United States Circuit Court. This judgment was recovered in June, 1869, against George A. Trenholm individually and as a member of the firm of John Fraser & Co.

The first exception is, that the money which was paid for the property was not the money of Frank H. Trenholm when the payments were made; and that George A. Trenholm did not make the purchases as a nominal purchaser with the money of Frank H. Trenholm as the real purchaser. There seems to be little difference of opinion as to facts. The exception is that, in fact, the testimony does not prove a resulting trust.

The principal facts relied on by the judgment creditor are found in the books of George A. Trenholm & Son (William L. Trenholm), which exhibit accounts kept with the petitioner under three heads or divisions, namely: 1. That for "Atlantic *Wharves." 2. That for "Individual Account," and, 3. That for "Security Account." The money with which the purchases were paid was charged to "Atlantic Wharves." The judgment creditor charges that, upon the other accounts, the petitioner was in arrears; and was so for a long time after the purchases and until 1877. That the three accounts should be aggregated and show a balance in the petitioner's favor, before George A. Trenholm could have any money of the petitioner's in his hands, from the use of which a trust could result.

As a fact, however, there do not seem to have been stated any regular adjustments of these three accounts, with intent to show that the parties regarded a general balance, at certain periods, necessary to declare and fix the indebtedness of one to the other. For, although a balance may have been carried from one of the accounts to the other, still it appears upon the settlements of the account of "Atlantic Wharves," that the net balance was struck and divided, and the fourth of F. H. Trenholm carried to the "Security Account," without reference to what would be the general balance upon the three accounts.

The right of the judgment creditor cannot be greater than that of George A. Trenholm, were he living. It must be taken for granted that entries in the books of George A. Trenholm & Son were known to George A. Trenholm. The charge to "Atlantic Wharves" of the purchase-money, is a deliberate entry by George A. Trenholm, that he took to pay for his purchases, money, one-fourth of which he knew was the petitioner's. The striking of the balance afterwards, and division of the net proceeds, was a confirmation of this use of the money. The money, at the time when charged to "Atlantic Wharves," was the money of George A. Trenholm and of the petitioner; and the petitioner's right to his part could not be affected by balances struck afterwards or the state of the general account.

The second exception is, that Frank H. Trenholm was not personally a party to the transaction (purchase), in name or fact, and the money was paid by a check of George A. Trenholm & Son. Admitting that Frank H. Trenholm was not personally connected with the transaction, that is only to state what often occurs in cases of resulting trusts.

*129

The right or title does not *depend upon a contract made; it rests in equity upon the ground that he is the owner who paid the money, though he may not be connected, personally, with the purchase. Though the payments were made by checks of George A. Trenholm & Son, still the source from which the money was drawn or derived is shown, namely, by the charge on "Atlantic Wharves." Admitting that some transaction, intermediate or temporary, occurred, the payment rests upon the profits of "Atlantic Wharves," according to the proof.

The third exception is, that the judgment of C. H. Hampton attached upon the legal interest in the lots the moment they were conveyed to George A. Trenholm, in 1873 and 1874; also on his equitable interest, for the reason that he paid his own money therefor—and that such interest could not be divested by any settlement made with F. H. Trenholm after his father's death. This exception and the fourth are so nearly connected that they may be considered together. There is no doubt but that, to the extent of three-fourths of the property purchased, the interest vested in George A. Trenholm. The whole legal estate was conveyed to him, and, so far as it was not affected by F. H. Trenholm's equity, the judgment bound the property.

But it is plain that an assumption that the judgment bound the whole equitable interest because George A. Trenholm paid the whole purchase-money, is taking the point in dispute for granted. The foundation of the petitioner's claim is a denial that George A. Trenholm did pay the whole price of the lots with his own money. The petitioner's claim is, that at the same moment George A. Trenholm paid the purchase-money from profits of "Atlantic Wharves," he became trustee for the petitioner. In other words, the money that acquired the legal estate for George A. Trenholm acquired at the same time to the extent of one-fourth the equitable interest for the petitioner.

It is not to be overlooked that the money—the profits of "Atlantic Wharves"—was undivided, and that until division the money was the money of both, though in parts unequal in value. Had the money been separated into parts—three-fourths to George A. Trenholm and one-fourth to the petitioner—and G. A. Trenholm, believing that his son would unite with him in *the purchases, had from his own part paid the whole, and, after payment to the vendor and title made to himself, the son had paid his father the one-fourth, it might well be doubted if there would be a resulting trust. Before the judgment could attach upon the lots the title in George A. Trenholm must be complete. Here the legal estate vested in G. A. Trenholm and the equitable estate in one-fourth in F. H. Trenholm.

In regard to the fifth exception, it may be said that there is no question of the principle that the money of the party claiming a resulting trust must, in the beginning, enter into the transaction. If there were material accounts between parties which awaited a settlement, and upon adjustment it was found that the debtor had invested money in lands instead of paying his creditor, the creditor could have no claim on the lands as a resulting trust. The reason is obvious that until such settlement the creditor had no money in his debtor's hands which he could call his; but in the present case in every dollar of profits of "Atlantic Wharves" when made, the petitioner was entitled to his quarter in the same right that G. A. Trenholm was to his three-quarters, provided he had not overdrawn it, etc.

As to the sixth exception, it is to be observed that the judgment was obtained before the lots were purchased. It follows, of course, that the contract on which the judgment rests must have existed before the judgment. Then no credit was given to G. A. Trenholm on the appearance of ownership of property by possession, or upon unrecorded deeds. The complaint, then, is that forbearance was extended to G. A. Trenholm, upon the belief he was the owner of property (of which he was indeed in great part) when he was not wholly the owner. The gravamen of the complaint as affecting F. H. Trenholm in this exception is, that he was silent when he should have spoken out. But the elements of this species of covin are wanting. Whatever may have been said by G. A. Trenholm, deceased, (and death has closed his lips,) there is no proof that any action of the judgment creditor rested upon either the silence or action of F. H. Trenholm. He never was in a situation that bound him to speak out, and when silence would be a wrong.

If George A. Trenholm did speak as if he had been the sole claimer of the property purchased, this surely does not alter the fact. What is alleged he said, has not the force of a denial of F. H. Trenholm's right. In any event it can be no more. The claim itself is not adverse. The declarations admit a right in F. H. Trenholm whilst declaring the uses to which the purchases would be applied, namely, to attach them to "Atlantic Wharves" or convey to his son at some future time.

Striking out the testimony of F. H. Trenholm as to conversations had with his father in his life-time, the other proof appears sufficient to establish a resulting trust for the petitioner in the lots of land described in the petition, conveyed to George A. Trenholm. It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the exceptions of C. F. Hampton, the judgment creditor, be overruled, and the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the master made the judgment of the court.

C. F. Hampton, administrator, the judgment creditor of Geo. A. Trenholm, appealed to this court upon several exceptions, raising the precise points determined by this court, and others not considered.

March 27th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. F. H. Trenholm, by this petition, asks that he may be allowed to intervene in the cause above stated, which was a proceeding for the settlement of the estate of George A. Trenholm, under which the lots of land hereinafter referred to have been sold as part of his estate, for the purpose of setting up a resulting trust in the petitioner, and claiming one-fourth of the proceeds of the sale of said lots. The facts upon which this claim is based do not seem to be disputed, and the real controversy is as to the proper legal conclusion to be deduced from the facts.

It seems that George A. Trenholm and the petitioner, F. H. Trenholm, were tenants in common of certain property in the city of Charleston, known as the Atlantic Wharves, the former being entitled to three undivided fourths and the latter to one undivided fourth, and that George A. Trenholm, who, for the purposes of this case, may be regarded as doing business under the name and style of George A. Trenholm & Son, (the son, Wm. L. Trenholm, being merely a salaried partner and having no further interest in the concern,) had the management and control of said property, receiving the income, and, at stated periods, dividing the same between himself and the petitioner in the proportions above stated.

There were three accounts on the books of George A. Trenholm & Son in which F. H.

Trenholm was interested, viz.: (1) Atlantic Wharves account, in which he was interested to the extent of one-fourth; (2) account of F. H. Trenholm individually; (3) F. H. Trenholm security account. The books show that the portions of the credit balances on Atlantic Wharves account, to wit, one-fourth, which F. H. Trenholm was entitled to, were regularly transferred to the credit of the F. H. Trenholm security account, and "that at no time, from the beginning of this account, had there been any balance on the security account, or on the three accounts taken together, in favor of F. H. Trenholm, until July, 1877, when his account was closed by entry of a credit from distribution of profits of Atlantic Wharves." The books also show "that with the exception of February 10th, 1873, Atlantic Wharves were always in credit with George A. Trenholm & Son, when the payments were made for the lots, and that all payments on account of the wharves were made by checks of George A. Trenholm & Son."

*133

*On January 25th, 1873, George A. Trenholm purchased from George Gibbon one of the lots in question, paying one-third cash, and securing the balance by his own bond and mortgage, payable in two equal annual installments, and taking the titles in his own name, the papers bearing date January 25th, 1873. The cash payment was made on February 10th, 1873, by a check of George A. Trenholm & Son on the bank in favor of the purchaser, and the amount of said payment was, on the same day, charged to Atlantic Wharves account, and as the other installments became due they were paid in the same way, and the amounts thereof likewise charged to the same account. On May 30th, 1874, George A. Trenholm purchased the other lot in question from J. M. Shackelford, for cash, taking titles in his own name and paying the purchase-money by a check of George A. Trenholm & Son on the bank, the amount of which was also charged on the same day to Atlantic Wharves account. These lots, "from the time of purchase, were incorporated with or made a part of Atlantic Wharves, and the income from them was divided, in common with the other income from the wharves, between George A. Trenholm and F. H. Trenholm in the proportion of three-fourths to one-fourth."

The foregoing statement, condensed from the report of the master, to whom the case was referred, embraces substantially the material facts upon which he bases his conclusion. There is, however, an additional fact found in the testimony of Wm. L. Trenholm, which seems to have escaped the attention both of the master and the Circuit judge, and which appears to us to be of some significance. That witness says: "His father bought four pieces of property after the purchase of Atlantic Wharves, because they were on, or connected with, the wharves. These pieces were paid for out of the income of the wharves, and were incorporated with it. The two pieces now in hand were conveyed to him; the others were conveyed, three-fourths to George A. Trenholm and one-fourth to F. H. Trenholm, those being the proportions in which Atlantic Wharves were held. He knows of no reason for the distinction made, and supposes it was a mere inadvertence that the one-fourth was not subsequently conveyed to F. H. Trenholm."

*134

*Upon this state of facts the master reported in favor of the resulting trust, and the Circuit judge sustained the view taken by the master and rendered judgment establishing the trust in favor of the petitioner. From this judgment C. F. Hampton, as administrator of Frank Hampton, a judgment creditor of George A. Trenholm, appeals upon various grounds set out in the "Case," which we do not deem it necessary to repeat here. The sole question for our determination is whether the facts found in the record are sufficient to establish a resulting trust in favor of the petitioner. This is not a case in which we are called upon to review and reverse the findings of fact by the court below, for, as we have stated, there does not seem to be any dispute as to what the facts are, but the real controversy is, as to the legal conclusion to be drawn from undisputed facts.

The legal principles applicable to the question under consideration are so fully and clearly stated in the authorities cited by the counsel for appellant, that we are relieved from the necessity of doing more than simply quoting from some of the cases referred to. In the leading case of Botsford v. Burr, 2 Johns. Ch. at page 408, Chancellor Kent says: "If A. purchases an estate with his own money, and takes the deed in the name of B., a trust results to A. because he paid the money. The whole foundation of the trust is the payment of the money. Willis v. Willis, 2 Atk. 71. If, therefore, the party who sets up a resulting trust made no payment, he cannot be permitted to show by parol proof that the purchase was made for his benefit or on his account." Again he says: "Nor would a subsequent advance of money to the purchaser, after the purchase is thus complete and ended, alter the case. It might be the evidence of a new loan, or be the ground of some new agreement, but it would not attach by relation a trust to the original purchase; for the trust arises out of the circumstance that the money of the real, and not of the nominal, purchaser formed at the time the consideration of that purchase, and became converted into the land."

In Willis v. Willis, supra, Lord Hardwick says, in speaking of this class of resulting trusts: "Now trusts of this nature are when the legal interest is in another, but the purchase-money has *been paid by a third person: this is a resulting trust for him who paid the money, but then he must clearly prove the payment." As is said by Kent, Ch., in Boyd v. McLean, 1 Johns. Ch. at page 590, in speaking of the admissibility of parol evidence to establish a resulting trust: "The cases uniformly show that the courts have been deeply impressed with the danger of this kind of proof as tending to perjury and the insecurity of paper titles, and they have required the payment by the cestui que trust to be clearly proved.

In 4 Kent Com. 305 (fifth edition) it is said, upon the authority of a number of cases there cited: "Where an estate is purchased in the name of A., and the consideration money is actually paid at the time by B., there is a resulting trust in favor of B., provided the payment of the money be clearly proved. The payment at the time is indispensable to the creation of the trust."

In Olcott v. Bynum, 17 Wall. 59 [21 L. Ed. 570], it is said: "Such a trust must arise, if at all, at the time the purchase is made. The funds must then be advanced and invested. It cannot be created by after-advances or funds subsequently furnished. It does not arise upon subsequent payments under a contract by another to purchase."

In our own case of Taylor v. Mayrant, 4 Desaus. 516, it is said: "It appears from the authorities quoted that a resulting trust cannot be raised by construction. It must be grounded on plain proof of the application of the funds of the party for whom it is raised."

From these authorities, as well as others cited in appellant's brief, it seems to be well settled that, in order to establish a resulting trust of the kind here sought to be set up, which, as Chancellor Kent said, in Boyd v. McLean, supra, tends so much to impair the security of paper titles, it is necessary that the payment of the purchase-money, or some definite portion of it, by the cestui que trust, should be clearly proved; that it must be an actual payment, and not a payment by construction merely; and that the payment must be at the time of the purchase.

Testing this case by these principles, we think it clear that the petitioner has failed to establish any resulting trust in his favor.

*So far from the payment of any portion of the purchase-money by the petitioner, at the time of the purchase, being clearly proved, we think the testimony shows that the entire purchase-money was paid by George A. Trenholm & Son, who, as we have said, for the purposes of this case, may be regarded as identical with George A. Trenholm. As to the lot bought from Gibbon, there can be no doubt. The title to George A. Trenholm was made on January 25th, 1873, and the purchase-money was not paid until February 10th, following. The moment the legal title became vested in George A. Trenholm, as it did so soon as the deed was executed, the property became subject to the lien of Hampton's judgment, unless there was then some existing equity in some one else superior to such lien.

The assumption of the master, based upon some alleged custom by which two or three weeks are allowed for the examination of titles, that the purchase was not fully consummated until February 10th, when the cash payment was made, is without evidence to sustain it, and we are bound to assume, until there is some evidence to the contrary, that the deed was delivered at its date and that the title then passed. So that, even if it had been proved beyond the possibility of a doubt that F. H. Trenholm furnished his father, ten days or more after the title thus became vested in George A. Trenholm, with the money with which the payment was made, no resulting trust in his favor would arise, because the money was not paid at the time of the purchase; for, as one of the cases expresses it, the trust must be coeval with the deed, and cannot arise from any subsequent transactions.

The other lot, bought from Shackleford, seems to have been paid for on the same day that the title was made, and therefore, it becomes necessary to inquire whether any of the money belonged, at that time, to F. H. Trenholm. It is not pretended that he, in fact, actually furnished his father with any of the money used in paying for this lot, but the contention is, that inasmuch as the amount of the purchase-money was charged on the same day to the Atlantic Wharves account, in which F. H. Trenholm was interested to the extent of one-fourth, he, in effect, must be regarded as having, at least, constructively, paid one-fourth of the purchase-money. But, as we have seen, there must *be an actual payment, and a mere constructive payment will not be sufficient to raise a resulting trust. Even were this not so, can it be properly said that any money belonging [to] F. H. Trenholm was used in paying the purchase-money of this lot? The payment was made by a check of George A. Trenholm & Son, or, in effect, of George A. Trenholm himself, on the bank, and, therefore, when the purchaser got the money, he got the money of George A. Trenholm & Son, lying to their credit in bank, and the purchase-money was actually made, not with the money of F. H. Trenholm, but with the money of George A. Trenholm & Son, practically of George A. Trenholm.

When did it become the money of F. H. Trenholm? It belonged to George A. Trenholm when it was deposited in bank, and was his until it was drawn out on his check and paid to the vendor. It was not money belonging to the Atlantic Wharves, which, it must be remembered, was mere property, and not a corporation or other artificial person. It does not appear that there was any account kept in the bank in the name of Atlantic Wharves, upon which the check could be drawn, but it does appear that, even if there was such an account, the payment was not made by a check drawn on such account; but it was drawn on the account of George A. Trenholm & Son—in reality, George A. Trenholm—and the payment must, therefore, be regarded as made with his money. The fact that the amount for which the check was drawn was, on the same day, charged to Atlantic Wharves account, cannot have the effect of converting it into the money of that concern, even if such concern had been, not mere property, but a legal entity, having an artificial existence as a legal person. The most that can be said is that George A. Trenholm, being a tenant in common with F. H. Trenholm, of the property known as Atlantic Wharves, and in receipt of the entire income from that property, thereby became a debtor to F. H. Trenholm to the amount of his interest in such income, and liable to account to him for the same; and surely it cannot be said that, because a debtor buys property and pays for it before settling with his creditor, he has used some of the money of his creditor in paying for the property, and that thereby a trust results to the creditor.

*As matter of fact, however, George A. Trenholm was not indebted to F. H. Trenholm at the time either of these lots was bought, for it is conceded that, at the time the first lot was bought, there was no balance to the credit even of the Atlantic Wharves account; and that at no time, until July, 1877, which was after the death of George A. Trenholm, would he have been indebted to F. H. Trenholm upon an adjustment of all three of the accounts in which F. H. Trenholm was interested. All that F. H. Trenholm could, at any time, have required of George A. Trenholm would have been an accounting for the income of Atlantic Wharves, and, of course, upon such accounting, George A. Trenholm would have been entitled to set off against any balance appearing to be due F. H. Trenholm on the Atlantic Wharves account, such balances as were due by F. H. Trenholm on the other two accounts.

The view presented by the master and concurred in by the Circuit judge, that George A. Trenholm must be regarded as having advanced for F. H. Trenholm his one-fourth of the purchase-money, cannot be sustained, especially when there is no testimony to support such a view, except the fact that the amount of the purchase-money was charged to Atlantic Wharves account; and the further fact that the lots in question were incorporated with that property. There is no evidence tending to show that there was any agreement between George A. Trenholm and F. H. Trenholm that such an advance should be made for the latter. On the contrary, if we look at the testimony of F. H. Trenholm, which is incorporated in the "Case," though ruled to be incompetent, such an idea is negatived, and the only understanding was that a one-fourth interest should be transferred to F. H. Trenholm "after the payments were made, * * * if it should appear to be advantageous before payments were completed."

It would seem from this, that so far from there being at the time even an understanding that the purchase was made on joint account, much less that the money of F. H. Trenholm should be used in paying one-fourth of the purchase-money, the true inference would be that it was to depend upon future contingencies, whether F. H. Trenholm was to have any interest in the purchase. This view is very much strengthened by the testimony of William L. Trenholm, that although four pieces of property were purchased by George A. Trenholm and incorporated with Atlantic Wharves, the two lots in question were conveyed to George A. Trenholm, while the other two were conveyed—three-fourths to George A. Trenholm and one-fourth to F. H. Trenholm; and the witness was unable to give any reason for the distinction, except his supposition (which, of course, cannot be regarded as evidence,) that it was a mere inadvertence. We think the more reasonable supposition is that while a definite conclusion was reached as to the two lots conveyed to the parties jointly, there was no conclusion reached at the time as to the two lots now in question, but the disposition that was to be made of them was left to be determined by subsequent contingencies.

So that we think it clear that, so far from the money of F. H. Trenholm having been used in paying for the lots in question, there was not even any settled understanding reached at the time that F. H. Trenholm was to have any interest in the purchase, but that whether he should thereafter be admitted to such interest depended upon whether subsequent events should prove the purchase to be an advantageous one; and that George A. Trenholm, in charging the purchase-money to Atlantic Wharves account, only intended to afford the means of an easy settlement of the matter in case it should be subsequently determined that F. H. Trenholm was to have an interest in the purchase, he knowing that if it should be determined otherwise, the accounts between the parties could be easily rectified in the adjustment of other accounts.

Convinced, as we are, that the petitioner has failed to establish any resulting trust in his favor, the other questions discussed in the argument cannot arise, and need not be considered.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

*STATE v. SHULER.

(November Term, 1882.)

An indictment that charges the stealing of corn "in the field," is fatally defective as an indictment under a statute which makes stealing "from the field" a felony.

Before Pressley, J., Orangeburg, October, 1882.

This was an indictment against Adam Shuler. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Solicitor Jervy, for appellant.

Mr. D. A. Straker, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant was indicted under section 2487, General Statutes of 1882, for stealing corn "in the field" of one Riley, and upon conviction moved in arrest of judgment, because the indictment was fatally defective in that it charged that the corn was stolen "in the field," instead of "from the field," in the language of the statute. The Circuit judge refused to arrest the judgment on the ground that the indictment was good as an indictment for petit larceny, the property stolen being under the value of twenty dollars, but held that the indictment was defective under the statute, in that it did not contain the words used in the statute—"from the field"—and accordingly sentenced the defendant for petit larceny. The State appeals from this ruling, upon the ground that the offense, which was made a felony by the statute, was sufficiently set forth in the indictment.

For a proper understanding of the question raised by this appeal, a brief review of the legislation upon this subject will be instructive. As far back as 1826 (6 Stat. 284) the legislature, impressed with the necessity for providing a remedy for what was, doubtless, a growing evil, passed an act for the purpose of making it larceny to steal any grain or cotton—the staple products of the State—before it was severed from the soil upon which it grew, inasmuch as, by the common law, that species of property was not the subject of larceny, being regarded as part of the realty. It is curious to observe that, while the title of that act expressly pointed to the conclusion that the object was to punish, criminally, that which, by the common law, would have been a mere trespass, to wit, the taking of corn or grain before it was severed from the soil, the body of the act contained no such pointed words. The title is as follows: "An act to make the fraudulent and secret taking of cotton, corn and other grain, before severance from the soil, larceny," while the language of the body of the act is as follows: "If any person shall take from any field, not belonging to such person, any cotton, corn, rice, or other grain, fraudulently, with intent secretly to convert the same to the use of such person taking the same, such person, so offending, shall be guilty of larceny, either grand or petit, as the value of the property may be."

In 1866 (13 Stat. 405) the legislature passed an act to amend the criminal law, by the fourth section of which the offense created by the foregoing act was prohibited in the following language: "Stealing from the field any grain or cotton, not yet severed from the freehold, is hereby made a felony with benefit of clergy." This change of phraseology from that found in the act of 1826 was, doubtless, mainly for the purpose not only of increasing the grade of the offense, but also for the purpose of making it plain that the object was to punish the fraudulent taking of grain or cotton from the field, even though it had not been severed from the soil at the time it was taken, inasmuch as, in the body of the previous act, nothing had been said as to severance from the soil.

In 1872, when the General Statutes of that year was adopted, the fourth section of the act of 1866 was incorporated therein without any substantial change in its language.

In 1879 (17 Stat. 77) the legislature, perhaps under the apprehension that offenders might often escape, by reason of the difficulty of proving that the grain or cotton had not been severed from the freehold at the time of the taking, amended the act so as to make it a felony to steal cotton or grain from the *field, whether severed from the freehold or not, and in this form the act was incorporated in the General Statutes of 1882 as section 2487, which reads as follows: "Whoever shall steal from the field any grain or cotton, whether severed from the soil or not, shall be deemed guilty of felony; and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than one year nor more than five years, or in the jail for not less than three months nor more than six months, or by fine, not less than fifty dollars nor more than five hundred dollars."

From this review of the legislation upon the subject, we think it plain that the true intent of the act was not to punish the stealing of the particular kind of property there mentioned in a particular place, but to punish the stealing of a particular kind of property, to wit: the products of the soil mentioned in the act—the staple products of the State—before they were gathered by the owner, inasmuch as that kind of property would necessarily be more exposed to the depredations of thieves than that which the owner had the means of guarding and protecting more securely, just as the legislature, doubtless actuated by the same motive, has, from time to time, made the larceny of cattle and other live stock, which were accustomed to roam at large beyond the reach of the owner's protecting care, the subject of special legislation.

We think, therefore, that the real purpose in using the words "from the field," was to point to a particular kind of property, to wit: the products of, or outgrowth from the field, of the kind designated, before they were gathered by the owner, and not to the stealing of that kind of property in any particular locality. Thus, if a bag of corn, taken from the owner's barn, or purchased in market, should be carelessly left by him in an open field, and stolen while in such field, the offender could not be indicted under this section of the general statutes because that would not, in our judgment, be the offense there denounced. The object of the statute was not to protect, specially, property which the owner had thus carelessly exposed to the depredations of thieves, because the common law afforded sufficient protection for that kind of property by an ordinary indictment for larceny, *but the object was to extend special protection to a kind of property which the owner could not so carefully guard and protect from theft, as it must necessarily remain exposed in an open field until it could be gathered.

Under this view of the scope and intent of the statute, it is very obvious that the word "from," as used in the act, is a material word, and the word "in," used in the indictment, cannot be regarded as a sufficient substitute for it, and therefore, the indictment was properly adjudged to be fatally defective, as an indictment under the statute. This court has so recently considered the rule as to how far it is necessary to follow the words of a statute, in an indictment for an offense created by such statute, in the case of State v. Padgett, 18 S. C. 317, where Mr. Justice McGowan has very fully and satisfactorily discussed the subject, that we do not deem it necessary to go into that matter now further than to say that it is well settled that an indictment under a statute must follow the material words found in the statute, or use words which are substantially equivalent thereto.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Fairfield, June, 1882.

*This was a motion by Mary A. Duvall for relief against a judgment obtained against her by W. R. Doty & Co., in a trial justice's court. The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant.

Mr. A. S. Douglass, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The defendant was sued before a trial justice; was summoned to appear on August 5th, 1881; went to see her lawyer, but he was absent at the time; and, as she states, supposing that the case would not be tried until the next regular term of the Court of Common Pleas for the county, she failed to be present before the trial justice on the day named for trial, and judgment was rendered against her by default, although she had a good defense.

On September 5th, thirty days after the rendition of the judgment, the attorney of the defendant, having returned and learned the facts, served notice upon the plaintiff that, on September 10th, he would move the trial justice for an order vacating the judgment for the purpose of having the action tried on its merits under section 195 of the code. The trial justice refused the motion upon the ground that he had no authority beyond hearing a case, except to hear a motion for a new trial within the time prescribed by law. From this refusal to hear the motion, the defendant appealed to the Court of Common Pleas.

Judge Wallace affirmed the order of the trial justice, and the defendant appeals to this court upon the following grounds: 1. "Because his Honor dismissed the appeal from the court of trial justice. 2. For that his Honor held that there is no statute giving to a court of trial justice power to grant the motion made in the case. 3. For that his Honor held that the trial justice had no power to vacate a judgment by default and direct a trial upon the merits upon a motion made thirty days after the judgment was rendered."

Considered as a motion for a new trial, there can be no doubt that the trial justice was right in refusing to hear it, for the *reason that sub-division 18 of section 88 of the code, which gives the right to a trial justice to grant such a motion, declares that "no motion for a new trial shall be heard unless made within five days from the rendering of the judgment; provided, that the right of appeal from the judgment shall exist for five days after the refusal of a motion for a new trial." This is jurisdictional, and was absolutely mandatory upon the trial justice. Davis v. Vaughan, 7 S. C. 342; Scott v. Pratt, 9 S. C. 82; Russell & Co. v. Follin, MS. Dec., No. 729.

It is suggested, however, that the motion was not for a new trial under the statute, but to the court which rendered the judgment, to give relief against said judgment in order to prevent injustice, as it was rendered against the defendant through her excusable neglect, which was claimed to be a common law power possessed by all courts having the right to try cases after summons to the parties. Without disputing the principle which applies to all inferior courts of limited jurisdiction, that all authority claimed must be pointed out in the express law, and nothing can be supplied by intendment, it is insisted that the rule only applies to matters which are jurisdictional in their nature, and that as soon as jurisdiction attaches, these courts have the right, without special authority given, to proceed according to the principles and practice which govern all other courts; and that the amount involved being under $100, it was within this inherent general power for the trial justice to grant the motion.

A judgment, regularly obtained and entered of record, should not be set aside without good cause, according to the established practice, based upon clear and full authority. The framers of the code thought it necessary to declare and define by statute the right to relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his excusable neglect, even as to the Court of Common Pleas, which has general jurisdiction; and we cannot hold that a trial justice's court, being of inferior and limited jurisdiction, has such inherent power, without limit of time, as to all cases within its jurisdiction in amount, merely as an incident to the right given by statute to hear and determine them in the first instance.

But, assuming that the trial justice could not exercise the *authority claimed without express authority of law, it is insisted that the power was given to him by section 195 of the code of procedure, which provides that "the court may also, in its discretion and upon such terms as may be just, at any time within one year after notice thereof, relieve a party from a judgment, order or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect," &c. It is argued that this provision includes "the court" of a trial justice as well as that of the Common Pleas, and the question is, whether that is the proper construction.

Certainly the power is given to "the court" in terms very general without any limitation expressed, and, upon principle, it would seem that the same reason for its exercise, in some form or other, should exist alike as to the proceedings of all courts which have occasion to render judgment after summons to the parties; but we cannot think that this provision was intended to be applied to the court of a trial justice. If such court is included, we do not see why the Court of Probate should not also be included; but that would not be in conformity with the plan of the code, which treats of these inferior courts under separate heads, and, as it seems to us, outside of the chapters which make special provisions for these courts, generally uses the unexplained phrase of "the court," in reference to the Court of Common Pleas, as having general jurisdiction and being the most important.

The code of procedure is divided into two general parts. The first treats "of the courts of justice and their jurisdiction," viz.: the Supreme Court, the Circuit Courts, Probate Court, the courts of trial justices, &c. In regard to the last named, the jurisdiction is expressly given and defined in title 5, and in section 88 in that title it is enacted that "the following rules shall be observed in the courts of trial justices." Among these rules are the following: No. 8 provides "that in case the defendant does not appear and answer, the plaintiff cannot recover without proving his case." No. 15 declares that "the provisions of this code of procedure respecting forms of actions, parties to actions, the rules of evidence, the times of commencing actions and the service of process upon incorporations shall apply to these *courts." No. 17 enacts that "any trial justice's court of this State shall have the power to grant a new trial in any case tried in the said court for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law of this State; provided, however, the case shall only be heard and tried anew by the trial justice before whom the case was first tried," &c.

The second part of the code treats "of civil actions." Title I., as to the forms of actions; title II., as to the time of commencing; title III., as to parties; title IV., as to the place of trial; title V., as to the manner of commencing; and title VI., as to "the pleadings in actions." This last title has six subdivisions, or chapters: First, as to the complaint; second, the demurrer; third, the answer; fourth, reply; fifth, general rules of pleading; and sixth, "mistakes and amendments;" and under this last chapter appears the section (195) which, it is contended, embraces "the court" of trial justice as well as of the Common Pleas. It will be observed that the courts of trial justices had been dealt with specially in part I., and their jurisdiction clearly defined.

It seems to us that all the provisions of part II., were intended to apply only to the Court of Common Pleas, except where express reference is made to the inferior courts, which is done in title II., chapter 3, upon the subject of "appeals to the Circuit Court from inferior courts," of which we will speak hereafter. Many of these provisions would be inappropriate to courts of trial justices, and were manifestly not intended to apply to them. Indeed, equivalents in simple form had already been provided for them, and the declaration made in sub-division 15 of section 88, as to what provisions of the code "should apply to these courts," was in effect a declaration that all other general provisions of the code should not so apply. It is a case for the application of the maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." As was said in the case of Brown v. Buttz, 15 S. C. 490: "The act defining the civil jurisdiction of trial justices is found incorporated in the code. In this act the jurisdiction of these courts is specially defined and limited."

There is, in the second part of the code, title II., chapter 3, express provision made for the courts of trial justices in regard *to "appeals to the Circuit Court from inferior courts." These are very specific as to the time and manner of taking appeals, as to what matters are appealable, and how the appeals should be heard by the Circuit judge, acting as appellate court. These provisions give the identical relief, by appeal, which was sought here by motion to the trial justice. We think that the relief asked for in this case, by applying to the trial justice to open a judgment rendered by himself, was not in his power to grant under section 195 of the code of procedure; but that the only way to obtain that relief was by appeal, in the time allowed for appeal under subdivision 1, section 368 of the code, which provides as follows: "Upon hearing the appeal (from the judgment of a trial justice) the appellate court shall give judgment according to the justice of the case, without regard to technical errors and defects, which do not affect the merits. * * * If the defendant failed to appear before the trial justice, and it is shown by the affidavits served by the appellant, or otherwise, that manifest injustice has been done, and he satisfactorily excuses his default, the court may, in its discretion, set aside or suspend judgment and order a new trial before the same or any other trial justice, in the same county, at such time and place and on such terms as the court may deem proper," &c.

As we understand it, this view, that the relief can only be granted by way of an appeal from the trial justice court, is not inconsistent with the New York practice. We have not been referred to a case, nor have we been able to find one, in which the relief was granted by the justice himself, on direct application to him. In all the cases where the judgment of the justice has been opened, it seems to have been done by the appellate tribunal. Such was the course in the case of Wavel v. Wiles, 24 N. Y. 635 (10 Smith), Court of Appeals, 1862, stated at the bar to be the exact counterpart of the case before us, and confidently relied on by the appellant.

In that case judgment by default was rendered by a justice of the peace. Defendant appealed to the county court, which ordered a new trial. The Supreme Court reversed this. An appeal was then taken to the appeal court of the State, which reversed the judgment of the Supreme Court, leaving in force *the order of the county court directing a new trial, and in doing so used this language: "If in this case the county court had held that it had no power to hear and decide the question of error in fact upon the affidavits, it would have been proper for the Supreme Court to have reversed such decision and remitted the case to the county court for the correction of such errors. But the county court did act: it heard the application and made the appropriate order, in its discretion, to give relief to the defendant.

It granted a new trial and the defendant was bound to pursue that remedy, otherwise he is remediless so far as relates to any proceeding to review the judgment," &c. That is to say, the county court, on appeal, had the power to decide the question, and, although it decided wrong in granting a new trial, the defendant was bound to pursue that remedy or have none to review the judgment.

Precisely so in the case before us. If the application had been made to the Circuit Court (county court in New York) by way of appeal from the judgment of the justice, the Circuit judge would have been bound to decide the question, and his judgment, although wrong, could not have been corrected on appeal to this court. There was, in one sense, an appeal before the Circuit judge in this case, but it was not an appeal regularly taken from the judgment of the trial justice, but from his refusal to open the judgment (after the time for an appeal from the judgment had passed), under the section of the code giving a year.

In Voorhies' Code 464, under the head of "Appeal to Common Pleas or to a county court," it is said: "If the defendant failed to appear before the justice, and it is shown by the affidavits served by the appellant, or otherwise, that manifest injustice has been done, and he satisfactorily excuses his default, the court may, in its discretion, set aside or suspend judgment, and order a new trial, before the same or any other justice in the same county, at such time and place and on such terms as the court may deem proper." And in 4 Wait's Practice 464, as to "Appeals to the county courts," it is said: "Under the present practice, the appellate court may always relieve a defendant where he excuses his default and shows that manifest injustice has been done to him in the rendition of the judgment. In seeking relief from a judgment by default there are several points in the practice which must be observed. And, in the first place, it is to be remembered that there is no relief except by way of appeal from the judgment. It is only by an appeal that the county court acquires any jurisdiction of the cause, or has any power to afford relief. A mere motion in the county court, in a case in which no appeal has been taken from the judgment, would be useless and would be denied because of a want of power to interfere with the judgment rendered by the court below. Donnell v. Carroll, 1 Code Rep. (N. S.) 288. In the next place, the notice of appeal ought to assign, as one of the grounds of appeal, that manifest injustice has been done by the judgment, and that the defendant's default is excusable," &c.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Ex parte ROBERTS.

[1. Judgment  $\hookrightarrow$  627.]

A., after the death of his wife and her surviving children, filed a bill in the Court of Equity, claiming all the property included in his marriage settlement, the next of kin then living of his deceased wife being parties defendant. The court decreed that, as to a moiety, it descended, at his death, to those persons who at that time would be the heirs-at-law of the deceased wife. After the death of A., the children of P., who was an aunt of the wife and a party to the former action, but who died before A., filed their petition in the original cause, claiming a share of this moiety, their mother at the time of the wife's death being one of her next of kin. Held, that the matter was res judicata.

[4. Husband and Wife  $\hookrightarrow$  31.]

Under a marriage bond, the husband bound himself to convey certain property to trustees when his wife attained her majority, to be held in trust for himself during life, and in case his wife died first without issue living at her death, or such issue should die in his life-time, then in trust (1) as to one moiety for whomsoever he should by will appoint, or, in default of appointment, to his heirs; and (2) as to the other moiety, for the heirs-at-law of the said wife. The wife died leaving children, all of whom died in the husband's life-time. Held, that the remainder to her heirs was contingent and not vested.

*Before Hudson, J., Charleston, December, 1881.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree was as follows:

The petition in this case has been filed to obtain the construction of the marriage article between Samuel Porcher Gaillard and Mary M. Peyre, his wife: all technical objection to the regularity of the proceeding being waived with a view to obtaining the judgment of this court.

In the principal cause in which the petition is filed, the bill was filed to have from the court a construction of the same articles. To it were made parties all who were or might be interested in that construction, including the mother of the petitioners, Betsey S. Porcher, who, by her intermarriage, subsequently became Betsey S. Roberts. The construction so given included the question now raised by this petition, and required the judgment of the court to be rendered as to the question, At what time were the persons to be ascertained, who would answer the description of "her heirs-at-law?" Whether at her death, or at his death? And the judgment of the Circuit Court was affirmed by the Appeal Court, that "then," as used in the marriage articles, referred to his death and not to hers.

That judgment was against S. P. Gaillard, who thus raised precisely the same issue as is now raised by these petitioners, and was in favor of Betsey S. Porcher, who, in that controversy, was found on the side opposite to that held by these petitioners. The court held contrary to Gaillard's construction, that Betsey S. Porcher might in futuro be heir-at-law to Mary M. Peyre, i. e., if she survived S. P. Gaillard, but otherwise not.

At his death the heirs-at-law of Mary M. Peyre were Anna M. Stoney and Isabella S. Porcher. Betsey S. Porcher (by her marriage Betsey S. Roberts), the mother of the petitioners, had died before Samuel P. Gaillard; and at his death, therefore, did not answer the description of an heir-at-law of his wife, Mary M. Peyre. She was, therefore, not entitled to share in the distribution of the property of Mary M. Peyre, and the petitioners who claim through her, as her representatives, are, therefore, excluded according to the judgment of the highest appellate tribunal in the State, at the time when the case was before it. A reference to the case as reported will show that the point now before this court was distinctly raised in the pleadings, and as distinctly decided by the court. Gaillard v. Porcher, McMull. Eq. 359.

When, therefore, the plea of res judicata is interposed, and under it objection made to the consideration of the petition and the relief asked, it must prevail. After the lapse of nearly forty years, to re-open a case and renew a controversy solemnly decided by the highest judicial authority in the State, on behalf of the representatives of one who was before the court, a party to that controversy, cannot be allowed. The judgment of the court, is that the matter of the petition and the relief asked is res adjudicata, and that the petition must be dismissed and the relief it asks be refused.

For the purposes of this case, it would not be necessary to say more. But the counsel for the petitioners have pressed on the argument and urged the opinion of the court upon the question before the Court of Appeals, as if it were res nova. It is only necessary for me to say, that while the judgment of that court would control me under any circumstances, yet if the petition were before me as res nova, I would consider that the construction given by the Court of Appeals is the proper construction, and fully sustained by the adjudged cases.

The counsel for petitioners are in error in supposing that this construction is at variance with the rule laid down in Rutledge v. Rutledge, Dudley Eq. 201; in Hicks v. Pegues, and Buist v. Dawes, 4 Rich. Eq. 413 and 421, and in Glover v. Adams, 11 Rich. Eq. 264. There is no conflict discoverable upon an examination of the written instruments construed in each case. Rutledge v. Rutledge was at that time familiarly known to the court and bar, and was doubtless advanced as a leading authority by counsel of S. P. Gaillard, but without effect on the court.

Let the petitions be dismissed, with costs.

*March 31st, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. In the year 1835, S. Porcher Gaillard and Mary M. Peyre, in contemplation of marriage, entered into an agreement that the property of the said Mary should be settled to certain uses. The marriage settlement was not, in fact, executed; but, by way of articles for a settlement, the said S. P. Gaillard executed what is styled "a marriage bond" to William Mazzyck Porcher, Peter C. Porcher and Thomas Walter Peyre, in the penalty of $40,000, conditioned that as soon as the said Mary attained the age of twenty-one years, he would convey the property mentioned to the aforesaid payees of the bond in trust, as follows, to the said S. Porcher Gaillard, for life, for the maintenance of Mary M. Peyre and her children. "But in case the said M. M. Peyre should die before the said S. P. Gaillard, leaving no issue living at her death, or in case she should leave any child or children, grandchild or grandchildren, living at her death, and they should all die in the lifetime of the said S. P. Gaillard, unmarried and without issue, then in trust, (1) as it regards one-half of the said property, real and personal, to and for the use and behoof of such person or persons, their, his or her heirs, executors and assigns, as the said S. P. Gaillard shall, by his last will and testament, to be executed in the presence of three or more credible witnesses, appoint to take the same; and in default of such appointment then to and for the use and behoof of the heirs-at-law of the said S. P. Gaillard, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns forever; and, (2) as it regards the other moiety or half of the said property, to and for the use and behoof of the heirs-at-law of the said M. M. Peyre, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns forever."

Mary M. Peyre, the wife, died about Octo-her, 1839, in the life-time of her husband, S. P. Gaillard, leaving three children, all of whom died shortly after, unmarried and without issue, but leaving collateral heirs (an uncle, Thomas Porcher, and an aunt, Elizabeth C. Ravenel,) of the whole blood, and numerous uncles and aunts of the half blood, among whom was a maternal aunt, Betsey S. Porcher, who afterwards intermarried with John J. Roberts, and died in the life-time of

S. P. Gaillard, leaving *surviving her husband and two children, Jane D. Roberts and Martha D. Roberts, who, as will be stated hereafter, are the petitioners.

After the death of the said Mary M. Peyre and her children, to wit, on or about the year 1842, the said Samuel P. Gaillard filed his bill of complaint (being the same revived in which this petition was filed) in the Court of Equity for Charleston district, against the trustees named in the marriage bond, and against all of the aunts and uncles of the said Mary M. Peyre, including the said Betsey S. Porcher, who were all regularly made parties: in which bill he asked construction of the marriage bond, and claimed the whole property as only heir-at-law of his deceased wife and children. Upon the bill and answer, the cause was heard by Chancellor Harper, who dismissed the bill, saying: "If the terms of these articles had been upon the husband's surviving and dying without issue, then, as to one moiety, the persons who shall, at that time, answer the description of the wife's heirs-at-law, there would have been nothing ambiguous, and nothing to prevent the dispositions having effect. I imagine that no one ever read the words in question, who doubted that such were their meaning, and no other. The words are: 'If he survives her, and dies, leaving no issue of the marriage living at his death, then, as to one-half of the property, for the use of such persons as he shall appoint by his will; and if he make no appointment, then to his heirs-at-law; as to the other half, to her heirs-at-law.' The word 'then' plainly relates to the whole of the clause, and in the ordinary and popular acceptance of the terms, they would be taken to mean the persons who shall at that time be her heirs-at-law. * * * The legal title of the property never having been transferred to the trustees, the complainant needs no relief. He may enjoy it according to the terms of his contract. Upon the application of the trustees, or of the parties who may be entitled at his death, the proper relief will be granted. It is ordered and decreed that the bill be dismissed."

From this decree the complainant appealed, on the ground "That the intention of the parties, as indicated by the terms of the bond to execute a marriage settlement, was that the heirs should be fixed *at her death, or, at all events, at the death of her last surviving child, unmarried and without issue." Upon the appeal being heard, the old appeal court in equity decided as follows: "We concur in the decree of the Circuit Court. Appeal dismissed." Gaillard v. Porcher, McMull. Eq. 358.

Samuel Porcher Gaillard died in August, 1880, leaving a will which disposed of his half of the property. In the meantime all the aforesaid uncles and aunts of Mary M. Peyre, including Betsey S. Porcher, who were parties to the bill of Gaillard, had died, except two, viz.: Anna M. Stoney and Isabella S. Porcher, who, at the time of the death of S. P. Gaillard, were the only persons living who answered the description of her heirs, as the children of those who had died—first cousins—were too far removed to take, while the two aunts, before named, were living.

In June, 1881, Jane DuB. Roberts and Martha D. Roberts, children, as before stated, of Betsey S. Porcher, who had died before S. P. Gaillard, filed this petition in re, claiming the share to which their mother, if living, would have been entitled, and asking the court "to require William Mazyek Porcher, the only surviving trustee, to apportion and pay over to them as the share of the estate to which they may be entitled." The surviving trustee answered, denying the claim, upon the ground that, by the articles of marriage settlement, the property was given for life to S. P. Gaillard, and then, as to one moiety, over to those persons who, at the time of the death of said Gaillard, answered the description of heirs of Mary M. Peyre; that the articles had been so construed by a competent tribunal, and the question was res adjudicata so long as 1842 in the proceedings above referred to; that the only persons who answered the description of heirs of the said Mary M., at the death of Gaillard, her husband—Anna M. Stoney and Isabella S. Porcher—are entitled to the whole of the other half of the property, and that the petitioners, not now being heirs, have no interest, and their petition should be dismissed.

The petition and answer were heard by Judge Hudson, who dismissed the petition, holding that the matter was adjudged by the former proceedings in 1842; but, if the question were still *res integra, he concurred with Chancellor Harper, that the proper time for ascertaining who were the persons to take, under the description of "heirs of Mary M. Peyre," was at the falling in of the life estate—the death of S. P. Gaillard. From this decree the petitioners appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

First, "Because his Honor erred in holding that the question presented to the court is res judicata, for the reasons that his Honor erred in holding: (1). That in the principal cause the question presented was, 'At what time were the persons to be ascertained who would answer the description of her heirs-at-law,' whether at her death or his death?' The real question presented being whether the husband should not take the whole property, to the exclusion of the wife's relations—not which of the wife's relations should take. (2). That the decree in the principal cause decided 'That Betsey S. Porcher might, in future, be heir-at-law to Mary M. Peyre, i. e., if she survived S. P. Gaillard, but not otherwise.' (3). That the question now before the court is precisely the same as that before the court in the principal cause.

"Second. Because his Honor erred in holding that 'at his death (S. P. Gaillard) the heirs-at-law of Mary M. Peyre were Anna M. Stoney and Isabella S. Porcher,' and that the legal representatives of Betsey S. Porcher were not heirs-at-law at that time, and not entitled to share in the distribution."

The exceptions charge error in the Circuit decree in sustaining the defense of res adjudicata, upon the ground that neither the subject-matter nor the parties in this suit are the same as those in the former proceeding. To determine this it will be necessary to have a clear view of the scope and limit of the doctrine. This court has lately had occasion in several cases to consider that subject, and in the case of Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 40, announced the principle in the following terms: "The doctrine of res adjudicata is very far-reaching and effective. It is founded on principles of the wisest policy, because the peace and order of society require that a matter once litigated should not again be drawn in question between the same parties or those claiming through them. * * * As we understand it, the rule established in the Duchess of Kingston's Case is: First.

That the *judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, directly on the point, is as a plea, a bar, or as evidence, conclusive between the same parties upon the same matter, directly in question, in another court. Second. That the judgment of a court of exclusive jurisdiction, directly upon the point, is in like manner conclusive upon the same matter, between the same parties, coming incidentally in question, in another court, for a different purpose. But neither the judgment of a concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which comes collaterally in question, though within their jurisdiction, nor of any matter incidentally cognizable, nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment. 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 494 and notes. It seems, therefore, that to make out the defense at least three things are necessary: the parties must be the same, or their privies; the subject-matter must be the same; and the precise point must have been ruled."

Taking this as our guide, Was it error in the Circuit judge to hold that the petitioners were estopped by the principle of res adjudicata? As to the question whether the parties are the same: This petition is filed in re in the identical proceeding in which the former judgment was pronounced. It is true that S. P. Gaillard, the complainant in that case, and many of the other parties are now dead, but all of the original parties who are still living must be considered as now before the court. It is also true that the petitioners were not parties to the former proceeding. At that time they were not born, but their mother, Betsey S. Porcher, through and under whom they claim, was a party to the proceeding, and, being her privies, both in blood and estate, they stand in her place and are bound by whatever would bind her. Tate v. Hunter, 3 Strobb. Eq. 136; Watson v. Columbia Bridge Co., 13 S. C. 436; Hart v. Bates, supra.

Then, as to the subject-matter. We suppose there can be no doubt that the principal question made in the former case was as to the proper construction of the marriage articles, and that such is the question now made. But it is earnestly urged that the former case did not decide negatively the precise point made here, viz.: that the interest of the persons described as heirs of Mary M. Peyre vested in them as heirs upon her death, and, *being so vested, was transmissible to their representatives, so that the children of one of them, who died in the lifetime of S. P. Gaillard, may now after her death recover the share of that predeceased parent. Whether this precise point was decided by the former judgment may be determined in one of two ways—either by the record or extrinsic proof, showing whether as a matter of fact the point was expressly made; or, if not, by showing from the nature of the issue that the point must of necessity have been determined by the judgment. As expressed by Mr. Justice Miller, in his dissenting opinion in the case of Aurora City v. West, 7 Wall. 106 [19 L. Ed. 42], "The rule is, that where a former judgment is relied on it must appear from the record that the point in controversy was necessarily decided in the former suit, or be made to appear by extrinsic proof that it was in fact decided. This is expressly ruled no less than three times within the last eight years by this court, viz.: in the Steam Packet Co. v. Sickles, 24 How. 333 [16 L. Ed. 650]; Same v. Same, 5 Wall. 580 [18 L. Ed. 550]; Miles v. Caldwell, 2 Wall. 35 [17 L. Ed. 755]."

Extrinsic evidence was not offered in this case, and the question is, whether the record shows that the precise point above indicated was expressly made in the former proceeding, or was substantially involved and necessarily decided by the judgment therein. The bill was filed by S. P. Gaillard after the death of his wife and children, claiming the whole property absolutely, first as heir of his wife along with his children, and then as sole heir to them. It stated that "If the heirs-at-law of your orator's late wife, within the meaning of the said bond, are to be fixed at the time of her death, then your orator claims as her sole surviving heir-at-law and the sole surviving heir of her children also to be entitled to the whole of the trust property absolutely. But if the heirs-at-law of your orator's late wife are to be fixed at the time of the death of her last surviving child, then your orator submits that he is entitled absolutely to one moiety under the express terms of the bond, and to two-thirds of the other half as favored heir-at-law, she having, besides your orator, left no nearer kindred than uncles of the whole and half blood," &c.

To this claim the answer was, that "By the events which *have occurred the estate is to remain in trust for the use of the said complainant (S. P. Gaillard) for his life, and after his death then, as to one moiety thereof, for such person as he shall appoint by his last will, and in default of such appointment for his heirs-at-law; and as to the other moiety, for such persons as shall at the time of the said complainant's death answer the description of heirs-at-law of his deceased wife," &c. Upon the issue thus made, Chancellor Harper rendered the decree before stated, holding that the word "'then' plainly relates to the whole of the clause, and, in the ordinary and popular acceptance of the terms, they would be taken to mean the persons who shall at that time be heirs-at-law," and dismissed the bill.

Looking to the issue made in the pleadings and the terms of the decree itself, it seems to us that the judgment necessarily decided the exact point—that the death of S. P. Gaillard, and not any period anterior to that event, was the time at which the persons described as heirs of Mary M. Peyre were to be ascertained. In dismissing the bill of S. P. Gaillard, the court certainly did decide that he, the person indicated by the law as the principal heir of his wife, did not acquire any fee-simple vested interest in any part of the property as such heir. And so deciding as to him, did not the decision include and determine the same rights of all others who were then in the category of heirs? He claimed the whole as heir and would have recovered it, in addition to his own moiety, if the principle asserted in the case of Glover v. Adams, 11 Rich. Eq. 267, had been applied by the court.

In that case, relied on by the petitioners, it was held by a divided court that "the husband, in addition to the provision made for him as survivor of his wife, took an interest along with her distributors upon her death, an interest cumulative to that held under the deed." It is plain that the court did not think that principle applied to this case, otherwise they would have sustained the bill and granted the relief prayed for.

They decided the contrary, and in effect held that the interest over did not vest until the death of S. P. Gaillard.

It is urged, however, that while this may be true as to Gaillard, it does not follow as to the other heirs, for he was excluded *as an heir because he was already provided for in having the use of a life-estate in the whole. As was said in the case of Glover v. Adams, supra, "It will hardly do to blot out one express provision because there is another express provision." We know of no authority for such a distinction between him and the other heirs. The marriage articles certainly made none such; but, on the contrary, gave the aforesaid moiety in general and unqualified terms "to and for the use and behoof of the heirs-at-law of the said Mary M. Peyre." The very fact that no distinction was made excluding the person—already in the use of the whole for life—from also taking, as heir, the greater part, if not the whole of the property absolutely, may have had its influence in bringing the mind of the court to the conclusion which they expressed, that it was the intention of the parties that no inquiry for heirs should be made until the death of S. P. Gaillard, and that the aforesaid moiety was for such persons as should at that time answer the description of "heirs-at-law of his deceased wife."

The interest over was never, in any sense, a vested remainder; but, on the contrary, very contingent. The persons who were described as the "heirs-at-law of Mary M. Peyre" were not to take by descent as her heirs, but as purchasers per formam doni; the description of the persons to take as "the heirs of Mary M. Peyre" being intended, probably, to indicate as recipients her blood relations as contra-distinguished from her husband, who had the use of the whole for life, and his relations who were otherwise provided for.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Kershaw, June, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. Ernest Moore, for appellant.

Mr. J. T. Hay, contra.

April 3d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action commenced in the Court of Common Pleas for Kershaw county, "for the settlement, partition and distribution of the estate of Wiley Kelly, deceased." The administrator and heirs-at-law are parties, and the creditors were called in to establish their demands before the master. The appellant, D. A. Williams, as administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of William McKenna, deceased, came in under this order and presented a claim, and this gave rise to the questions presented by this appeal.

The claim was in the form of a judgment recovered by the predecessor in office of the said D. A. Williams, in Lancaster county, a transcript of which was lodged in the office of the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Kershaw county, before the present action was commenced. The judgment was based upon a bond of Wiley Kelly, bearing date January 24th, 1861, conditioned for the payment of $1,282.25, "payable in three years, in equal annual installments, with lawful interest thereon from January 21st, 1861, payable annually, and the first installment, with interest on the whole principal sum due, payable on January 21st, 1862," which bond was secured by a mortgage of real estate situate in Lancaster county.

To the action on this bond, brought for a foreclosure of the mortgage, the administrator of Wiley Kelly, as well as the administrator and heirs-at-law of J. A. Cunningham, to whom the said Wiley Kelly had conveyed the mortgaged premises, were made parties, but the heirs-at-law of Wiley Kelly were not parties. The prayer was not only for judgment of foreclosure, but also that execution be awarded against the administrator of Wiley Kelly for any balance that might remain unpaid by the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises. To that action the administrator of Wiley Kelly appeared, by attorney, but made no answer, and, judgment having been recovered, the mortgaged premises were sold, and, upon a report to the court of the balance remaining unpaid, after applying the proceeds of the sale, judgment was entered for such balance against the administrator of Kelly.

Upon an accounting had in this case the administrator of Kelly has been found indebted to the estate of his intestate in amount more than sufficient to pay the claim presented by D. A. Williams, as administrator as aforesaid, and the lands of the intestate, Wiley Kelly, have been sold under an order in this cause, and the proceeds are now in the hands of the court.

The master, to whom it was referred to take proof of the claims presented, after setting forth the origin and nature of this claim, stated that the respondents alleged that the judgment was taken for a larger amount than was really due, by reason of two errors in the calculation: First, in computing annual interest on the bond after its maturity; and second, in omitting to credit the net proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises; and claimed to have the amount of the claim reduced to what it would be after correcting these alleged errors. The master, while finding that these errors had been committed, reported that he did not think that he had any authority to open the judgment and correct the errors, and he therefore declined to do so; but, at the request of counsel, he appended to his report a statement of what he regarded as a correct calculation of the amount due on the bond, in which he stopped the computation of the annual interest at the maturity of the bond, only allowing simple interest after that date, and also gave credit for the amount of the net proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises.

To this report both parties excepted—the respondents substantially upon the ground that the master erred in declining to correct the errors above mentioned; and the appellant upon the grounds, substantially, that the judgment was conclusive, and that the master should have reported the claim, as established, for the full amount; that, even if the judgment should be opened, there was no error in the mode of computing the interest, inasmuch as, by a proper construction of the terms of the bond, it bore interest, payable annually after as well as before maturity; and, lastly, because the master erred in finding that the net proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises had not been credited.

The Circuit judge, agreeing with the master that the errors pointed out did exist, held that the heirs of Wiley Kelly, not having been parties to the action in which the judgment was recovered, “are not estopped or precluded thereby from showing any error therein,” and that, under a proper construction of the terms of the bond, it ceased to bear interest payable annually after its maturity. He therefore allowed the claim only for the amount as ascertained by the statement appended to the master’s report, in which the alleged errors had been corrected, and ordered it paid out of any money in the hands of the court.

From this judgment D. A. Williams, as administrator as aforesaid, appeals upon two grounds, substantially: First. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the heirs-at-law of Wiley Kelly were not precluded from showing error in the amount of the judgment recovered against the administrator of Wiley Kelly, insisting that he should, on the contrary, have held that the judgment was conclusive. Second. That there was error in holding that the interest on the bond did not continue to be payable annually after its maturity.

It is true that, in the appellant’s exceptions to the report of the master, which he adopts in his grounds of appeal, it is alleged that there was error in finding that the net proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises were not credited, but as nothing was *said about this matter in the argument, we presume it was abandoned. At all events, whether abandoned or not, all that we know about it is what is said in the master’s report, and he found, as matter of fact, that this credit had been omitted, which finding is concurred in by the Circuit judge. Therefore, even if such an exception had been urged, it could not be sustained.

The appellant also, in his argument, makes the point that, inasmuch as it appears from an accounting in this case that the administrator of Kelly is indebted to the estate of his intestate in an amount more than sufficient to pay the full amount of the judgment, he, at least, should be entitled to an order for the payment of the full amount of the judgment out of such balance, the administrator having been a party to the action in which such judgment was recovered, and, therefore, bound thereby. We are unable to find where any such point was made in the court below, or in the exceptions to the judgment appealed from, and, therefore, we are not at liberty to consider any such point.

There are then but two questions presented for our consideration: First. As to the effect of the judgment presented by the appellant. Second. If we shall conclude that the judgment presents no bar to such an inquiry, as to the proper mode of calculating the interest on the bond.

In considering the first question, it would be interesting, though we do not regard it as either necessary or important, to go into an examination of the various cases in this State, in which questions relating to the effect of a judgment obtained against the administrator in a proceeding to which the heirs were not parties, upon the rights of the heirs in the lands of the ancestor, have been considered; but in the pressure of business now before this court, we are admonished that our duty will best be performed by confining our attention strictly to the real points necessary to be determined in the cases presented for our consideration. It is sufficient to say, that from the time of the case of D’Urphay v. Nelson, 1 Brev. 289, decided in 1803, down to the case of Rogers v. Huggins, 6 S. C. 356, decided in 1874, it has been uniformly held that the lands of a decedent may be sold under a judgment obtained against the administrator, even *though the heirs were not parties to the proceeding in which the judgment was recovered.

It is true that, upon more than one occasion, regrets have been expressed by some of our most eminent judges that such a doctrine should ever have become a rule of law, and although we may be fully convinced that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to vindicate such a doctrine if it were now an open question, yet a due regard to the rule of stare decisis forbids any interference with it at this late day. But believing, as we do, that it is difficult to reconcile this well-settled doctrine with certain other equally well-established fundamental principles, we are not disposed to extend the doctrine beyond what the decided cases imperatively demand. Those cases do not, in our judgment, determine the question now presented for our consideration, and, therefore, without in any way intending to impair the authority of D’Urphay v. Nelson, and other cases which have followed it—but, on the contrary, fully recognizing their binding force—we shall enter upon the discussion of the question presented by this appeal.

If the appellant had undertaken to levy and sell the lands of the intestate under his judgment recovered against the administrator, and the heirs had instituted a proceeding to enjoin the sale, upon the allegation that the judgment had been recovered for an amount larger than what was justly and lawfully due, a very different question would have been presented. But that is not the case we are called upon to consider. The precise question now before the court is whether, when a creditor, who has obtained judgment against an administrator for a debt due by his intestate, presents his claim, in that form, in a proceeding in the nature of a creditor's bill, under an order calling in creditors, he can object to an examination into the amount or validity of such claims by the heirs or by other creditors who were not parties to the proceeding in which his judgment was obtained, upon the ground that such judgment is conclusive.

There is no doubt that the heirs are necessary parties to a creditor's bill, and this is because they hold the legal title to the lands sought to be sold under such bill; and, therefore, in order *that their title, which is held subject to the claims of the creditors of the ancestor, may be divested by the sale which the court is asked to order for the purpose of paying the debts of the ancestor, it is necessary that they should be made parties upon the well-settled fundamental principle that a man is not to be deprived of his property, even at the instance of one who may have some just and legal claim upon it, until he has had an opportunity of being heard. Being parties, it would seem to follow, necessarily, that they would have the right to be heard upon every issue arising in the case upon which they have not already been heard, either in person or by some one authorized to represent their interests, otherwise it would be altogether nugatory to bring them before the court.

Now, while it may be true, so far as the personal estate is concerned, that the administrator does represent the distributees, who, under our statute, are the same persons as the heirs, inasmuch as the legal title to that kind of property vests in the administrator upon the death of the intestate, the same cannot be said as to the real estate, for with that the administrator has nothing to do. Mauldin v. Gossett, 15 S. C. 578. The heirs, not having been represented by the administrator in the action in which the judgment in question was obtained, have never been heard, or had an opportunity of being heard, upon the issues in that action; and, therefore, it would seem to follow that they ought now to be allowed the opportunity of being heard upon such issues, one of which is as to the amount legally due upon the bond, and that they will not be estopped by a judgment obtained in an action to which they were not parties or privies.

Upon the same principle it is well settled that, in a proceeding to subject descended real estate in the hands of the heirs to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, a judgment obtained against the administrator does not preclude the heirs from making any defense to which the claim upon which such judgment has been obtained, may be subject. Gilliland v. Caldwell, 1 S. C. 198, and the cases therein cited. As is said in that case, "The statute of George II. does make descended lands in the *possession of the heirs liable for the payment of the debts of the ancestor; but the cause of action must be established against them in a suit to which they are parties, and they are not bound by a judgment against the administrator to which they are neither parties nor privies."

Again, it is well settled that the assets of a deceased debtor are distributable among his creditors, according to the rank and condition of their demands at the time of the death of such debtor. Morton & Courteny v. Caldwell, 3 Strobb. Eq. 161; Tucker v. Condy, 7 Rich. Eq. 281; Wilson v. McConnell, 9 Rich. Eq. 500; Edwards v. Sanders, 6 S. C. 316; and the only exception to this rule, so far as we are informed, if it can in fact be called an exception, is that established by the act of 1878 (16 Stat. 686), which declares that, after the property of an intestate covered by a mortgage is exhausted, the grade of the demand shall be determined by the nature of the instrument which the mortgage was given to secure.

As is said by Chancellor Johnston, in Wilson v. McConnell, supra in stating the principle established by the case of Morton & Courteny v. Caldwell, in which the same chancellor had delivered an elaborate and able opinion, "demands are presentable against the estate of an intestate in the precise condition in which they existed at his death." Hence, when creditors are called in under a proceeding in the Court of Equity to present their demands against the estate of an intestate, one who has reduced his claim to judgment against the administrator stands in no higher or better position by reason of that fact, but his claim must be examined as it stood at the time of the death of the intestate, and its rank must be assigned and its amount determined by such examination. The judgment is at most only prima facie evidence of the validity of the claim, which is liable to be overcome by other evidence.

Thus, if a creditor by a joint and several bond should, after the death of the intestate, receive payments from the surety, thereby reducing the amount really due on the bond, he would still be entitled to have his debt estimated at its full amount, as it stood at the death of the intestate, in determining the pro rata of the assets of the estate to which he would be entitled, without any deduction of the payments made by the surety. Upon the same principle, if after such payments were made by the surety he should obtain judgment against the administrator for the balance then due, he would, when called in to establish his demand against the estate, be entitled to present it in the condition in which it was before such payments were made and before such judgment was recovered, and his pro rata share of the assets of the intestate's estate would be estimated upon the amount of the debt as it stood at the time of the death of the intestate, without deducting the payments subsequently made by the surety. In other words, his claim should be presented as a bond debt, and not as a judgment. This being so, it would follow, necessarily, that the claim thus presented would be open to any assault that might be made upon it, either by the heirs or by the other creditors. The issues presented would be whether the intestate was indebted, at the time of his death, upon the claim, and, if so, what was then the true amount of such indebtedness.

We think, therefore, that there was no error on the part of the Circuit judge in holding that the judgment against the administrator of Kelly, set up by the appellant, presented no obstacle to the investigation of the amount really due on the claim.

The only remaining inquiry is as to the proper mode of computing the interest, and upon this point also we agree with the Circuit judge. This question has been so recently before this Court upon several occasions, and the principles upon which it is to be determined are so well established, that we do not deem it necessary to go into any extended discussion of the subject. See Sharpe v. Lee, 14 S. C. 341; Mobley v. Davega, 16 S. C. 73 [42 Am. Rep. 632]; Watkins v. Lang, 17 S. C. 13. These cases determine that the question is one of intention to be deduced from the terms of the instrument upon which the question arises. If the promise is to pay a given amount at or within twelve months from date, with interest payable annually, then, in order to give the words italicized any force or effect at all, it is necessary to conclude that the intention was that the interest shall continue to be payable annually after as well as before maturity; but if the promise is to pay in installments extending over a period of two or more years, or to pay the whole sum two or more years after date, with interest from date, payable annually, then those words may be given full force and effect without extending that mode of calculating the interest beyond the maturity of the bond, and hence the computation of interest with annual rests will then cease, and from that time only simple interest on the amount then due is chargeable, unless there are other words in the instrument—for example, "until the whole be paid," or other equivalent words—indicating an intention that interest should continue to be payable annually as long as the debt or any part thereof remained unpaid.

The practical question, therefore, in this case is whether there are any words in the bond indicating an intention that the interest should continue to be payable annually after as well as before maturity. The words of the bond are "payable in three years, in equal annual installments, with lawful interest thereon from January 21st, 1861, payable annually, and the first installment, with interest on the whole principal sum due, payable on January 21st, 1862," and the words relied upon by the appellant are those which we have italicized. These words are certainly not the equivalent of the words "until the whole be paid," found in Watkins v. Lang; nor are they of the same purport as the words found in Wright v. Eaves, 10 Rich. Eq. 582, where the language was to "pay interest on said sum of $2,300 from this date, and pay said interest annually as it becomes due."

In fact we see no reason why the words relied upon in this case should be regarded as indicating an intention that the interest should continue to be payable annually after the maturity of the bond, or as indicating that the parties contemplated an indefinite extension of credit beyond the period fixed for the payment of the last installment. On the contrary, it seems to us that the sole purpose in inserting the words relied upon was to state expressly what, without some such words, would have been left to inference, viz.: the exact date at which the first installment should become payable; for it will be observed that the bond bore date January 24th, 1861, while the interest was to run from January 21st, 1861, and hence it might have been a matter of doubt at what precise date the first installment would become payable, without the addition of some such words as those in question.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, December, 1881.

The Circuit decree in this case, omitting its statement of facts, which are fully set out in the opinion of this court, was as follows:

*171

*In the second of the exceptions, according to the order in which they are stated, and in which it is said that there is error in the conclusion of law, that it cannot be judicially ascertained whether Mrs. Magee (the plaintiff) was or not reared in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church, the judgment of the court is that in this there was error, and the exception is sustained.

The remaining exceptions are that the conclusions of law are error when they declare that the conditions already stated are to be held as subsequent, and that the testator intended to create them as conditions precedent; that the referee erred in his conclusion that the estate or interest in the legacy is to be construed as if no such conditions had been attached thereto; that the conditions set forth in the will had never been fulfilled, and the legacy never vested; that if considered as conditions subsequent, they have never been and cannot now be complied with; and that the estate limited over upon the fulfillment of the condition, the evidence being that the condition has not and cannot be now fulfilled, takes effect.

These, then, are the questions upon which the judgment of this court is asked and now stated. Are these conditions to be considered as conditions precedent or subsequent, and, in either view, to be considered as conditions which this court will enforce, either to require performance before vesting the legacy, or subsequent to divest it, if not performed. And the judgment of the court is that upon the point whether they will be considered as conditions subsequent or precedent, they must be held as conditions subsequent; and next, that they are inoperative as conditions subsequent to divest the interest in the legacy. The non-performance of them cannot affect the right of Elizabeth Magee (now Harris) to the legacy in question.

It must be presumed that the relationship which existed between the testator and this infant of very tender years would prompt him to make the provision he did, as a bounty to her, who stood in that close connection of the only child of his deceased and only son. It would not be consistent with any natural feeling that another motive should either prompt or control him in what he did. He gives it to be appropriated "to the maintenance and education of my grandchild,

Elizabeth *Magee, the daughter of my deceased son." She was then not yet three years of age. Her "maintenance" was to be provided for, and that "maintenance," under any circumstances, he intended to be provided for; but her age required provision for her "maintenance" before her education could commence. And provision for that "maintenance" can only be carried out if the interest in the legacy was vested at the death of the testator.

The application of the income to her "maintenance" was, at least, as positive as that relating to her "education"—under the circumstances it was more pressing, and could only be fulfilled if the interest in the legacy was vested. Her education might be postponed for years, but the obligation of the testator to his grandchild was recognized by him in the provision for her maintenance. To affirm that, no matter how severe and pressing might be or was the need for applying this income to maintenance, it should be deferred until the need for education should arrive, would be to reject the motive which, it may be well supposed, prompted the provision, and subject it to a motive which would be hard and cruel.

In this case it will be seen that the position of the testator's estate, which he intends for the benefit of his granddaughter, is distinctly separated from the rest of his estate. "One-twentieth part" is so set apart and given to these trustees for the "maintenance and education" of his grandchild, the plaintiff. The severance is not postponed; it is at once done, and the purpose of that severance is at once declared to be for the "maintenance and education" of a child, then of very tender years; and one, the most immediately present of these declared purposes for which this provision had been made, was in its nature such that it would require the interest to be vested in order that the purpose might be accomplished. Without extending further this part of the case, by reference to the decisions cited in argument to support it, it is the judgment of the court that the conditions set forth in the will of John Magee, connected with this legacy to the plaintiff, are conditions subsequent, and the exceptions are on this point overruled.

The nature and effect of these conditions, because of non-fulfillment, to divest that interest, will now be considered. The *question of performance of these conditions as subsequent, and, if valid as such, divesting an interest vested, may be considered in two views: First. Can the plaintiff, Elizabeth Magee, now Harris, be required to forfeit her interest because they have not been complied with or performed? Second. Are they such conditions as will be recognized as proper to be enforced?

The testimony of the trustees is very explicit on this point that the provision made for the grandchild did not admit in itself of the performance of the condition. In the reply to the letter of the mother, the trustees plainly state that the income was not sufficient to admit that to be done which it is contended should be done, or, if not done, that this legacy shall be lost to the plaintiff. That compliance, therefore, with the conditions was impossible, because the provision made for it was wholly inadequate, is simply to state the proposition that a bequest which is valid and was vested may be divested because of that not being done which the testator himself made impossible of performance. In a case inter vivos a donor or grantor could not claim to have a gift or grant in the enjoyment of the donee or grantee avoided, because of the omission to do that the doing of which had been rendered impossible by the act of such donor or grantor. And the rule would apply as well to a bequest or devise, and operate on those who, by deed or will, claim under the donor, grantor or deviser.

But there are objections to the enforcement of these conditions to divest the interest of the plaintiff so strong that they cannot but prevail. The mother of this child, the surviving parent, is not attached to the faith of the Roman Catholic Church. She is a member of a church entertaining religious views which differ widely from those inculcated in the Roman Catholic Church. She cannot be the proper person to rear her child in the belief of the Roman Catholic Church. With her religious opinions it may well be assumed that to undertake such a duty would be a very great wrong. To rear this child as she then was in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church would involve the separation of the child from the mother; the custody and care to be taken from the mother and transferred to those whose religious faith was that in which it is said this child was *intended to be reared. And this, then, is the separation of the child from the mother—the relinquishment of the highest duty which is connected with the domestic relations, and the parting asunder of ties than which none are stronger or even more sacred in human life.

In the consideration of this part of the case, it would be only necessary to change the terms of this condition, and suppose that this was the child of a mother who was a member of the Roman Catholic Church, and the condition annexed to a legacy like this was that the child should turn from the care and religious teachings of its mother, from attending religious worship with its mother, and conform itself to other teachings wholly different from its mother's; that involving a separation in all things from its mother, would it not be considered as the greatest of wrongs to that mother and that child? It is only necessary to state the case to show that the same rule which here it is sought to enforce against this plaintiff, applied to persons who prefer any other religious belief, would in that case, as in this, violate those domestic relations which the law maintains and protects in their most perfect development.

If a condition in restraint of marriage, or that a wife shall live separate from her husband, or that a legacy be used to promote ambitious views or purchase official position, or, as in many other instances which may be cited, affect the public policy, and are held void—in which of them is to be found that which more violates public policy than is the condition in a case like this, where violence is done to the conscience alike of the mother and the child; where it breaks the ties which the great interests of humanity require should be carefully cherished, and tends to disturb, if not overthrow, the foundation on which society rests? That public policy which is seriously affected in a case like this is not the opinion of one or more men as to a particular question, social, political or religious, but that sense of public welfare which is derived from the preservation in all their force of the institutions upon which rest the whole fabric of society as it exists with us.

It is not the circumstances of this particular case which should guide us in our judgment. It is the principle that is involved,

*175

*and in which the living and their posterity are deeply concerned. If this testator can annex such a condition to this gift to a grandchild, then to all parents is extended the legal right to deal likewise with their children, whether infants or adults. To every bequest and devise can be annexed this frightful condition: That the same shall be void unless the legatee, if an infant, shall be reared in a specified religious faith, or, if an adult, shall renounce a deeply-rooted faith, and adopt the religion of the testator. Could a policy be conceived better calculated to disrupt domestic ties and sow the seeds of family feud and religious hypocrisy? Yet are we asked to announce from this tribunal that an American court solemnly sanctions so frightful a power in testators and to decree it consistent with public welfare, public policy and the genius and spirit of our laws.

Nor is this in any wise to curtail the powers which one has, to exercise his will in the disposition of that which belongs to him; for that will is ever to be measured by that power, and that must be consistent with the general welfare. The law under which the power to give, grant or devise is given, is a part of the system which is, in all its parts, created to promote the general welfare. Nor can it be better expressed than in the language of the eminent judge cited in the argument: "No man can leave his property clogged and conditioned by his own personal views of public affairs, or by his posthumous ambition (if I may so call it); he cannot make his political opinions run (like a covenant) with his land. He may leave it to whom he pleases, but it must be unfettered by any condition bearing upon matters connected with the public welfare." Egerton v. Brownlow, 4 H. L. Cas. 149.

Conspicuously in the constitution of the United States and of this State is the positive inhibition of all control over religious opinions, and the protection given to the enjoyment of it is forcibly and plainly expressed. "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," is the language of the constitution of the United States. The language of the constitution of this State is, if possible, even more emphatic: "No person shall be deprived of the right to worship God according to the dictates *of his own conscience. No form of religion shall be established by law; but it shall be the duty of the general assembly to protect every religious denomination in the peaceable enjoyment of its own mode of worship." If the power to control the conscience in matters of religious belief is thus renounced by the government, Federal as well as State, it is thus the highest and most authoritative exposition of what is in this connection regarded as the public welfare.

Will it then be claimed that this power, which is so renounced, because conducive to the public welfare, can be, nevertheless, exercised by an individual? Can he make that the condition of a gift, which the government could not do? Does not this great provision of the organic law enter into and qualify the exercise of the power of disposition which belongs to the owner of property? He cannot do that indirectly which he cannot do directly. He cannot, by a temptation held out to the ambition, the cupidity, or, perhaps, more than all, the wants and necessities of another, do that which the government has said shall not be done by itself. If the protection of religious belief be essential to the permanency of good government; if religious belief to be honest and deserving of being so called, must be the result of the free, untrammelled, unthought exercise of the faculties given to us, he who forces, trammels or buys for himself, no matter for what purpose, the control of the religious belief of another, in that violates the law which declares that "No person shall be deprived of the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience."

The exceptions to the report, if the conditions are to be considered as subsequent, are overruled. But whether these conditions be precedent or subsequent, holding them void, because against public policy, they would be as ineffectual to prevent this legacy from vesting, as to divest it if previously vested. "When a condition is bad on grounds of public policy, it must be obviously bad whether it be precedent or subsequent. The law will no more allow any thing contrary to public policy to be made the means whereby a party shall entitle himself to an estate, than whereby he shall be made to lose that of which he is already in possession." Cooke v. Turner, 15 Mees & W. 726. *"And this rule is specially recognized when the condition relates to personal property, as in this case." 1 Story Eq., § 289. If the legacy be of personal estate, under the like circumstances, (that is, of illegal condition,) the legacy will be held good and absolute as if no conditions whatever had been annexed to it.

*177

The judgment of the court is that the plaintiff is entitled to the legacy given under the will of John Magee; that she took therein a vested interest; that the condition annexed is a condition subsequent; that the non-performance thereof does not affect her interest, because its subsequent non-performance, if it be valid, was owing to no fault of the infant nor of those having control of the income and of her education, as we have before stated, but chiefly because the condition is void and inoperative as against public policy, and that the legacy, with the accumulation of the interest thereon, be paid over to the plaintiff by the special depositaries with whom it has been placed, under and subject to the order of this court.

April 17th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. John Magee, of Charleston, by a clause of his will, devised as follows: "Item. I bequeath one-twentieth part of the remaining collections and proceeds arising from the debts collected and the sales of all my personal property and real estate to my friends John F. O'Neill and Thomas O'Brien, to them and their heirs, in trust, to invest the same in property yielding a certain interest, which said income or interest shall be appropriated to the maintenance and education of my grandchild Elizabeth Magee, daughter of my deceased son, the *late Captain Arthur Magee, until her day of marriage or when she attains the age of twenty-one years, provided she is educated in some Roman Catholic female seminary or school, and is reared as a Roman Catholic in the communion and faith of her deceased father, the said Arthur Magee; and on her day of marriage, or attaining the age of twenty-one years, the bequest—the whole amount—shall be paid over to her and her heirs, forever freed from all trusts whatever. But if the said Elizabeth Magee is not educated at a Catholic seminary or school, and reared as a Roman Catholic in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church, then it is my intention, will and direction that the bequest shall accumulate, the interest or income as it arises shall be added to the principal until the said Elizabeth Magee's death or marriage or attaining the age of twenty-one years, when, on the happening of either of these events, the whole amount—principal and interest—shall be divided and paid over to the trustees of my daughter Elizabeth West, the wife of Preston West, and Mary Brown, the wife of Isaac Brown," &c., and then specifying the limitations and conditions to which the said property should be subject.

When the said Elizabeth Magee arrived at the age of twenty-one years (she is now the wife of J. E. Harris), she filed the complaint in this case against the trustees named in the will, asking that they should account for the said bequest, with the accumulated interest, and upon that accounting pay over the same to her under the will of her grandfather, John Magee. The trustees of Elizabeth West and her children, and of Mary Brown and her children, were also made parties, and they all answered, claiming that the bequest should be paid to them, for the reason that the express terms and conditions upon which the legacy had been given to the trustees for the plaintiff had not been complied with—that Elizabeth Magee was not "educated at a Roman Catholic female seminary or school, and reared as a Roman Catholic in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church," as expressly provided by the will.

The cause was referred to Isaac Hayne, Esq., as special referee to take the testimony and report on the law and facts involved in the case, who took the testimony and reported among other *things as follows: "That when the said Elizabeth Magee was about four years old, and while her father was still alive, she was baptized in the Roman Catholic Church, but she had not been 'educated at a Roman Catholic seminary or school,' and the evidence does not establish that she was 'reared in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church.' That nothing was said or done either by her mother or the said trustees prior to the year 1869 in regard to appropriating the interest and income of the trust estate to the maintenance and education of the said Elizabeth Magee. About that time Mrs. Magee (the widow of Arthur Magee), who was then living with her daughter at Greenville, S. C., applied to the trustees and requested them to assist her from the trust estate in the education of her daughter. Mr. O'Neill referred her to Mr. O'Brien, who stated that the interest and income of the estate was inadequate to maintain and educate Miss Magee at a Roman Catholic institute or school. He proposed, however, that Mrs. Magee should furnish Miss Magee with the necessary clothing and defray her traveling expenses in going to such an institution or school (there being no such school located in Greenville), and that the trustees should then pay her expenses at the institute or school for a limited period, say for about six months. This, he said, was as much as the trustees could undertake to do, in view of the small income which the trust estate yielded," &c.

And the referee concluded his report as follows: "It would seem, then, that the continuance of the estate, bequeathed to Miss Magee, having been made to depend upon a condition which is, in its nature, too vague and uncertain to be made the subject of judicial investigation, the condition is void for uncertainty, my conclusion being that it cannot be judicially ascertained whether Miss Magee was or was not 'reared in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church'; and, further, that she cannot be deprived of her legacy, unless the court shall decide that this condition, as well as the condition which required her to be 'educated at a Roman Catholic school,' has or has not been performed. I report, as my conclusion of law, that her estate and interest in the legacy continues as if no such condition had been attached *thereto, and that she is entitled to have the trust estate hereinbefore mentioned transferred and paid over to her absolutely."

Exceptions were filed to this report, and the cause came on to be heard by Judge Hudson, who decided that the plaintiff was entitled to the legacy given under the will of John Magee; that she took therein a vested interest, that the condition annexed is a condition subsequent, that the non-performance thereof does not affect her interest, because its subsequent non-performance, if it be valid, was owing to no fault of the infant, nor of those having control of the income and of her education, as we have before stated, but chiefly because the condition is void and inoperative as against public policy; and that the legacy, with the accumulation of the interest thereon, be paid over to the plaintiff by the special depositaries with whom it has been placed under and subject to the order of the court.

From this decree the defendants appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "That his Honor was mistaken in his apprehension of the testimony as to the attitude of the trustees to the plaintiff and her mother, and of their reply to her application in 1869; neither of the trustees, in their written reply, having stated that the fund was not sufficient to maintain her at a Roman Catholic school for more than six months.

2. "That the statements of Mrs. Magee bore on their face the evidence of bias, and were wholly insufficient to support or justify any conclusion of fact in the case.

3. "That his Honor erred in holding that 'the testimony of the trustees is very explicit on this point: that the provision made for the grandchild did not admit, in itself, of the performance of the condition, and that, in reply to the letter of the mother, the trustees plainly state that the income was not sufficient to admit that to be done which, it is contended, should have been done, or, if not done, that the legacy should be lost to the plaintiff.' That, on the contrary, the letter of Mr. O'Brien shows that the fund had increased from $1,500 to $4,000 in 1869, and says not a word of its insufficiency.

4. "That his Honor erred in holding that 'compliance with the conditions was impossible, because the provision made for it *was wholly inadequate,' and that the testator himself made the conditions of the will impossible of performance.

*181

5. "That his Honor erred in holding that the plaintiff took in the legacy under the will a vested interest, and that, as a consequence, the conditions attached were, in their nature, subsequent and not precedent.

6. "That his Honor erred in holding that the conditions of the bequest are void as against public policy.

7. "That his Honor erred in holding that the condition annexed is a condition subsequent, and that the non-performance thereof does not affect her interest because the condition is void and inoperative as against public policy."

The Circuit judge held that the referee committed error in deciding as matter of law, that "it could not be judicially ascertained whether Elizabeth Magee, the plaintiff, was not reared in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church;" and in this we concur with the Circuit judge. We think the phrase alluded to in the testator's will meant no more than that Elizabeth should be reared within the circle and under the influences of the Roman Catholic Church, in which she had already been baptized, and that was susceptible of proof like any other fact. So that it is clear that the proviso in the will of her grandfather was not carried out, and the only question is one of law, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the court will adjudge the plaintiff, notwithstanding the condition in the will was not performed, to be entitled to the legacy, or that it goes over to the defendants, her aunts, by way of substitution or limitation.

As the legacy was not given directly to Elizabeth, but to trustees with directions to pay it over to her "on the day of her marriage or attaining the age of twenty-one years," provided certain conditions were complied with, it is insisted that she had no vested interest in the legacy, but it remained contingent until the time arrived for its payment, and as a consequence that the conditions which were imposed were conditions precedent in their character, and their non-performance, from any cause whatever, prevented the interest in the legacy from ever attaching. All the authorities agree that conditions precedent must be strictly *construed, and that nothing vests until the thing happens, whether it be possible or impossible, legal or illegal, or in conformity to public policy or against it. And in this regard we confess that we do not clearly see the distinction contended for between this case and that of Drayton v. Grinke, Rich. Eq. Cas. 321 [24 Am. Dec. 419], where it was held that a bequest to two grandsons "on their arrival at the age of twenty-one years and assuming testator's name at that period," was held to be contingent, and that the grandsons were not entitled to the profits arising before compliance with the conditions.

But, as in this case, the income was appropriated for "maintenance" as well as education of the legatee, the necessity for which might precede the time for the performance of the condition as to education, and as our view makes it unnecessary, we will not go into the refined and somewhat artificial learning upon the subject of conditions precedent and subsequent, but consider the case as one in which an equitable interest vested, subject to be defeated by the non-performance of the condition imposed. Still the plaintiff cannot recover without showing performance of the condition, if it was possible to be performed and not objectionable in itself as being against law or public policy. There is a limitation over upon failure of the condition, and in such case the rule is that the testator shall be held to mean precisely what he says—that the words will not be considered as creating a technical condition, but rather what is called a conditional limitation. "But in regard to estates over, dependent upon the non-performance of conditions subsequent, where it is expressly provided that the estate shall go over upon the failure of the conditions, the donor is held to mean precisely what he declares, and the estate over takes effect." 2 Redf. Wills, § 66 and notes; 2 Jarm. Wills (5 Am. Ed.) 527; Fox v. Phelps, 20 Wend. 437; Finlay v. King's Lessee, 3 Peters 346 [7 L. Ed. 701]; Newell v. Nichols, 75 N. Y. 78; 1 Rep. Leg. 750.

In the first place, it is urged that the condition was impossible, and, therefore, should be disregarded. It was certainly not impossible in the sense in which that term is usually applied to conditions. "In the view of the common law a condition is said to be impossible only when it cannot, by any human means, take effect." 2 Story Eq. 1304. But we gather that the term "impossible" is used here in another sense, viz.: that the thing required was not to be done by the beneficiary herself, who was an infant, but by her mother or those who had charge of her education, and the bequest itself did not give the means of obtaining the education required; and that such inadequacy made it impossible, and was caused by the testator himself. We do not take the view that the bequest was given for the purpose of educating the grandchild. It seems to us that the condition as to the manner in which she should be educated was independent of the source from which the means were to be derived. It will be observed that the corpus was not to be paid to Elizabeth until she attained her majority, at which time, in the ordinary course of events, it was probable her education would be completed.

The whole tenor of the will shows that the testator did not intend the trustees to take charge of his granddaughter and send her to school, providing the means to do so out of the legacy. He attached the condition and left it to the mother to do as she pleased to act in regard to the education of her daughter in such way as to secure or renounce the legacy. It is true that he directed the income which might arise from the "one-twentieth part" of his estate (which turned out to be $1,500) to be appropriated to the "maintenance and education" of his grandchild, but he did not thereby undertake that such interest would be sufficient for that purpose, or mean anything more than to supplement the means of the mother, and even this assistance was only to be rendered on condition that the child was to be sent to a Catholic school; and, if not so sent, the interest was to be then retained and accumulate, as clearly appears in the limitation over. "But, if the said Elizabeth Magee is not educated in a Catholic seminary or school, or reared as a Roman Catholic, in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church, then it is my intention, will and direction, that this bequest shall accumulate, the interest or income, as it shall be, added to the principal until the said Elizabeth Magee's death or marriage, &c., when, on the happening of either of these events, the whole amount, principal and interest," &c., to go over.

Taking this to be the proper construction of the will, it is still suggested that the condition was "impossible" from the fact that Mrs. Magee, the mother, was unable, pecuniarily, to send her daughter away from home to a Catholic school. The rule is, that he who affirms must prove, and we do not see satisfactory evidence of the fact; but, passing that, it certainly does appear that Mrs. Magee could have utilized the interest in the hands of the trustees for that purpose, which would have been, at least, part performance, and, as suggested by one of the trustees, might have been taken as full performance. "When a literal compliance with the conditions becomes impossible, from unavoidable circumstances, and without any default of the party, it is sufficient that it is complied with as nearly as it practically can be, or, as it is technically called, cy pres." 1 Story Eq. 291.

Mrs. Magee removed from Charleston to Greenville, where there was no Catholic female seminary, and, knowing the terms of the will, made no application for interest or income except on one occasion, when she wrote to the trustees, asking assistance in the education of her daughter, not to send her, however, to a Catholic school, but to one at home of a different faith. The trustees assented to the use of the interest for the purpose of her education, but interposing the known condition that she should be sent to a Catholic school. Mrs. Magee testified, "That when Mr. O'Brien made the proposition above referred to, in 1869, he merely said that the fund was not sufficient to do more than has been stated for a period of six months. In that conversation Mr. O'Brien said that he was anxious that Miss Magee should get the legacy, and that carrying out the plan suggested it would give the trustees a pretext for turning over the fund to her, that he did not propose to educate her," &c. In the delicate position in which they were placed, the trustees seem to have done their whole duty, and they have accounted and been discharged, leaving the fund for whoever may be decided to be entitled to it. Nothing more was heard of a desire to receive the interest, and we cannot resist the conclusion that it was declined on the condition of sending Elizabeth to a Catholic school, either in aid of her own means, or for the limited portion of the year the amount authorized. So that the condition cannot be disregarded upon the ground that it could not be performed in whole or at least in part.

But, assuming this to be so, it is urged that the condition itself was void as being in contravention of public policy. The phrase "public policy" is very vague, and we are not sure that we clearly understand what is meant by it, as propounding a rule for judicial action in deciding the rights of property. It is the duty of the legislature to make laws and of the court to expound them, but it is not so clearly perceived what is the duty of the court when there is no law to be expounded, and the court is called upon to declare one. It is true that there are certain matters which courts, by decisions often repeated, have declared void as against public policy, such as contracts in restraint of trade, against marriage generally, marriage brokerage bonds, gambling debts, &c.; but it seems to us that the subjects in which the court undertakes to make the law by mere declaration, should not be increased in number without the clearest reasons and the most pressing necessity.

We agree entirely with the authorities on the subject which point out the danger of relying on general notions of public expediency or policy, which, from time to time, may vary so much. As to that public policy which is within the cognizance of courts, we cannot conceive of a better definition than that given by a distinguished English judge, viz.: "It cannot be the mere opinion of the judge upon any general question of public policy, or, in other words, whether the judges think that the interests of the public would be better advanced by tolerating or refusing to tolerate such provisos, but whether they are in contravention of any established law, or in contravention of the spirit, though not against the letter of the law."

This definition approaches something like clearness, and is in conformity, as we conceive, with our decisions in Willis v. Jolliffe, 11 Rich. Eq. 447; Dudley v. Odom, 5 S. C. 136 [22 Am. Rep. 6].

It is not claimed that this condition is in contravention of any established law. We know of none which prohibits a citizen from using his own means in educating a grandchild, and, in doing so, to make his own choice of a school, and have the education given under particular influences, religious or otherwise. We have no hierarchy—no particular form of religious worship made lawful, and, thereby, all others made unlawful. The State knows no religious denominations further than to protect them in their rights. The members of all, as well as those who are members of none, are equally her citizens, and she has enacted no law forbidding education under the forms and influence of any of them.

The law undoubtedly is, that any person of sound mind and of full age may, by his last will and testament, duly executed, dispose of the whole or any part of his estate at his own will and pleasure, except in two or three cases specially mentioned. Our books are full of authority for saying that, for many reasons, it is regarded important to maintain in its full integrity the right which belongs to a testator to dispose of his property as he pleases, provided only his disposition is not in violation of law. This right is secured alike to every citizen, whatever is his religious faith, be he Jew or Gentile, Protestant or Catholic. This testator exercised that right, and there is certainly no express law which requires us to declare any part of his will void.

But was the condition in this will as to the manner in which the legatees should be reared and educated, in contravention of the spirit of our law? As we understand the argument, the precise point is that, as we have no form of religious worship established by law, but the constitution declares that "No person shall be deprived of the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience," any requirement attached to a bequest that the legatee shall be educated and reared at a school and under the influence of a particular denomination of Christians, is in violation of the perfect liberty of conscience vouchsafed to all; and there being no express law upon the subject, the court should declare it void as against public policy. Presented in this form it is certainly a new question in this State, if not in the United States, and one, in some aspects, not without difficulty.

The constitution does declare in the bill of rights, section 9, that "No person shall be deprived of the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience;" but it also declares, in section 10, that "No form of religion shall be established by law, but it shall be the duty of the general assembly to pass suitable laws to protect every religious denomination in the peaceable enjoyment of its own mode of worship," &c. And the constitution of the United States declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religious, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Art. I., Amend. Constitution.

Taking these provisions together, we are not authorized to infer from the prohibition against an established church, that the government is indifferent to religion in all its forms. It must be supposed that the founders of our government knew that the religious sentiment, besides involving the highest interest and duty of man, has always been a potent agency in giving strength to law and permanency to order. We assume that the separation of church and State was made because it was conceived that matters of faith are too elevated and spiritual for human control, and possibly for the additional reason that the diversity of creeds rendered hopeless the task of giving authoritative sanction to one without unjustly depressing others; all being equally sound and essential in the views of those entertaining them respectively. Instead of saying that the government has renounced all, it is more correct to say that the government recognizes all religious denominations. The constitution, which prohibits the establishment of any one, protects each and all "in the peaceable enjoyment of its own mode of worship." It is not denied that one of the most marked and distinctive features of our institutions is the perfect and unqualified freedom of opinion in matters of religion which they secure to all who dwell under them.

It seems to us that the leading purpose was to prohibit the establishment of any particular form of religion which would deprive persons not belonging to the favored church, of the right to worship according to the dictates of their own consciences, but to go no further, except to protect all. Can it be properly said to be against the spirit of the constitution, for a member of one of these religious denominations, so protected, to endeavor by peaceable and legal means to extend his faith and to influence his children and grandchildren to adhere to the church of their fathers—for one belonging to the

Presbyterian or Methodist, or *any other denomination, to use such influences as argument, association, schools, colleges, donations, &c., to impress the minds of others, and particularly the youth of the country? Because such things may have some effect in determining religious opinions, can it be truly said that, therefore, they violate liberty of conscience, and are productive of evil consequences to the public—against public policy?

As we understand it, the good work of the ministers of the different denominations, under the highest commission, is directed to the promotion of morality, the increase of religion, and making converts to their own particular tenets, and upon this privilege rests the justification of all voluntary contributions to denominational schools and colleges, which the distinguished counsel for the plaintiff admitted were legal. He said: "If the testator had, in place of the plaintiff, given his money to establish a Roman Catholic school or college, his perfect right to do so could not have been disputed. In England a trust to establish a place of worship for Protestant dissenters was held good; and also a bequest for enabling persons professing the Jewish faith to observe its rights. 1 Jarm. Will. 190. * * * But the toleration, and I use the term in no invidious sense, of the right of one to dispose of his property is different from the use made of it when it becomes a means of coercion," &c.

It seems to us that in principle the distinction is rather shadowy between a donation for a school to be conducted according to certain religious forms, and one to a person to be educated in that school. It is admitted that such a condition as that under consideration would be held good in England, provided the church indicated was the Church of England (Clavering v. Ellison, 7 H. of L. Cas. 707); but it is said that it would be held good there only for the reason that that church is established by law, "because such a condition would be the public policy declared by the government, carried out in the disposition of the property." Apply this principle to our condition. We have no established church, and therefore, in the proper sense of the term, no "dissenters." Our constitution recognizes all denominations, and directs that the general *assembly shall pass laws for their protection. If recognition by law is the ground upon which courts are authorized to declare what is termed the public policy of the State, it would seem that what is allowed in England as to one, because recognized by law, might here be allowed as to all, equally recognized by the fundamental law.

We do not regard this case as analogous to that of Egerton v. Earl Brownlow, 4 H. of L. Cas. 149. In that case John William, Seventh Earl of Bridgewater, held under the crown a great dignity, in the nature of a public office, which was about to expire with him. He desired to have this dignity revived in his family, and for that express purpose devised his immense estates to Lord Brownlow, but if he should die "without having acquired the title of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, then the devise should be void." The condition of the devise was held to be void as against the public policy of England, in regard to the acquisition of dignities at the disposal of the crown. The terms of the condition made it an important matter of state. On the contrary, the matter here is purely one of private right, in regard to private property.

The power of disposition is general. The power to give includes the right to withhold or to fix the terms of gift, no matter how whimsical or capricious they may be, only provided they do not in any way violate the law. Mr. Magee, in his life-time, could have given money to educate his granddaughter at a particular school, or he could have withheld it at his pleasure. Suppose he had entered into a covenant with Elizabeth or her mother, that if she was educated at a particular school named, and under certain religious influences, he would, upon her attaining twenty-one years, pay to her five thousand dollars, we suppose that if she were not so educated, she could not go into the court and recover the money. Suppose, further, that before the time for payment arrived, John Magee had died, would that strengthen her claim to recover the money against his personal representatives? We are unable to see any material difference in regard to the necessity of complying with the terms imposed, between this supposed case and that of a voluntary gift by will.

*We can not say that the terms of this will so far exceed the license which is allowed the citizen in the disposition of his own property, as to render it void as against public policy. We do not understand that there was anything in this bequest which can be properly called coercion, or that Elizabeth was "deprived" of the liberty of conscience. Terms were attached to the bequest which may seem to us exacting, unkind and unnecessary, but we cannot say they were unlawful or that they were complied with. If they were declined from conscientious motives, far be it from us to say that such conduct was wrong; but, from our view of the law, we are constrained to hold that the legacy, with its accumulations of interest, must go to those to whom, in the event which has happened, it was given by the will.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded for such further orders as may be necessary.

Before Aldrich, J., Orangeburg, May, 1882.

*This was an action by Morris Kohn and other creditors of E. M. Meyer against E. M. Meyer, A. W. Meyer and others, creditors of E. M. Meyer, commenced October 8th, 1881, to set aside a confession of judgment, and also a sale of personal property, made by E. M. Meyer to A. W. Meyer. Upon the complaint and answers and affidavits, and the examination of E. M. Meyer, taken in open court before him, under sections 407-409 of the code of procedure, Judge Hudson granted a preliminary injunction restraining the sheriff from paying out the proceeds of the sale of E. M. Meyer's stock of goods. The case was heard on its merits before Judge Aldrich, the testimony of E. M. Meyer, taken as above stated, being used as evidence, and other witnesses being examined in open court before the presiding judge. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. C. Dibble, W. L. Glaze and Lathrop & Webster, for plaintiffs, appellants.

Messrs. J. F. Izlar and S. Dibble, for defendant creditors, appellants.

Messrs. De Treville & Glover and M. I. Browning, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action brought by the plaintiffs in behalf of themselves and other creditors of the defendant, E. Milton Meyer, for the purpose of setting aside a judgment confessed by him to his father, Augustus W. Meyer, one of the defendants, upon the ground of fraud; and, also, for the purpose of setting aside the sale of certain personal property, claimed to have been made by E. M. Meyer to A. W. Meyer, on April 25th, 1881.

The judgment in question was confessed on June 9th, 1880, for the sum of $2,800, but no execution was issued thereon until September 12th, 1881. The statement required by section 400, Lynch's Code (now section 384), is as follows: "Upon the 31st day of May, A. D. 1880, the plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant his certain share in the stock in trade in a certain store on Russell street, in the town of Orangeburg, which was valued *at, and for which the defendant agreed to pay, the sum of $2,800, and for which amount the defendant has made his note to plaintiff, dated June 9th, 1880, payable one day after date, no part of which note has been paid; and the sum of $2,800, with interest from said date, as specified in said note, is now due and owing the plaintiff."

This statement was duly sworn to by said E. M. Meyer on the same day that the judgment was confessed, but in his answer to the complaint in this case he gives a totally different account of the origin and consideration of the debt for which the judgment was confessed, and says "that on June 9th, 1880, he made a confession of judgment to A. W. Meyer for the sum of $2,800, for certain sums lent and advanced to him by the said A. W. Meyer, for the purpose of carrying on his business in the town of Orangeburg, in the mercantile trade. First, he (the defendant) borrowed $1,800 from said A. W. Meyer when he first commenced his business aforesaid, which was put in the stock in trade of his store, and afterwards $1,000 more were advanced by the said A. W. Meyer to this defendant for the same purpose, to wit: to carry on the said business." A. W. Meyer, in his answer, only says in reference to the confession of judgment, "that the same was made for a bona fide debt due to this defendant for money advanced to said E. M. Meyer, and given at a time said E. M. Meyer owed no debts, to protect this defendant."

E. M. Meyer, in his testimony, gives substantially the same account of the origin and consideration of the debt to his father as that which he gave in his answer, but goes rather more into details as to the time when and circumstances under which the alleged loans were made. It appears from his testimony that he commenced business some time in the latter part of the year 1878, (in October, as it was conceded at the hearing,) and that the first loan of $1,800 was made to him to enable him to start in business, but no note or other memorandum of such loan was taken by his father until nearly two years afterwards, when the amount, without interest, was incorporated in the judgment. The next loan of $1,000, according to his testimony, was made just before he was married, which was on May 27th, 1880, about two weeks *before the judgment was confessed, when the witness said he was in need of more money.

A. W. Meyer, in his testimony, says that the confession of judgment was given for money loaned his son ($1,800) when he started business, and $1,000 just before his marriage. He took the confession of judgment so that E. M. Meyer's wife would know it was borrowed money and witness' younger children would not suffer. He further says, that when his son borrowed the $1,000 he had a note coming due and had to raise money to pay it. When the judgment was confessed would have waited twenty years, or as long as witness liked, if no one else disturbed him.

It seems, also, from E. M. Meyer's testimony, that during the time he was in business, he usually carried a stock of from $3,500 to $4,000; that he sold mostly for cash, and that his sales ranged from $300 to $800 per week, upon which he usually made a profit of 25 per cent., and yet, in the course of about three years, upon being closed up by the sheriff on September 12th, 1881, when the execution in favor of A. W. Meyer, as well as an execution in favor of Steffens & Werner, were levied upon his stock of goods, it appeared that his total indebtedness amounted to something over $6,500, while his assets, consisting solely of the stock of goods, were only estimated by himself at $3,500, and actually brought, at sheriff's sale, $2,416.

It seems, also, from the testimony of both father and son, that on April 25th, 1881, the father took a bill of sale of all the personal property of the son, outside of the stock of goods, consisting of work animals, farming implements, and the crop then just planted, but the son remained in possession, and subsequently traded one of the animals, with the knowledge and consent of the father. The origin of this transaction, as stated by both father and son, is that the son was again in need of money, and sold this property to his father for the sum of $615, a part of which ($315) was paid in cash, and the balance in May following the date of the receipt or bill of sale; but the son remained in possession of these articles until they were levied on by the sheriff, as the property of the son, under an execution *in favor of Bruff, Faulkner & Co., when A. W.

Meyer forbade the sale, and they were left in the possession of E. M. Meyer.

The debts due the creditors established in these proceedings were mostly, if not entirely, for goods sold by them to E. M. Meyer, and were contracted at different dates, ranging from February 17th, 1881, to June 18th, 1881, and it nowhere appears in the evidence that any of the creditors had any actual notice of the confession of judgment until July 27th, 1881, when it was mentioned to the witness, Green, a salesman in the employ of Bruff, Faulkner & Co., who are the largest creditors; nor does it appear that any of the creditors even knew that the son was indebted to the father in any form until E. M. Meyer mentioned in a letter of June 30th, 1881, to Bruff, Faulkner & Co., that he had been compelled to borrow money from his father to pay a debt which pressed him.

The foregoing is a general outline of the testimony upon which the case was heard by the Circuit judge, who held that the confession of judgment was based upon a bona fide indebtedness of the son to the father; that there was no fraud in the transaction, and that the judgment was a valid lien. He also held that the creditors who were seeking to set aside the judgment, being subsequent creditors, could not do so. He further held that the defect in the statement upon which the judgment was confessed was a mere irregularity which could not be taken advantage of in this form of proceeding, and that no one but the defendant in such judgment could take advantage of it. As to the alleged sale of the personal property, he held that there was no necessity to consider it, for, having established the judgment to be a valid lien, the personal property would be bound by it, and, hence, it was immaterial to consider whether the transfer could be sustained, though he does go on to discuss the validity of the transfer, and plainly intimates his opinion that it was unimpeachable.

From this judgment, the plaintiffs, as well as such of the defendants as are identified in interest with them, appeal upon numerous grounds, which allege error both in the conclusion of law and fact reached by the Circuit judge, but, from the view *which we take of the case, it will not be necessary to consider, in detail, the various grounds of appeal.

We must confess that the testimony, coming as it does almost entirely from E. M. Meyer and A. W. Meyer, has made a very different impression upon our minds from that which it seems to have made upon the mind of the Circuit judge, who has certainly, upon at least two important points, entirely misconceived the testimony. In speaking of the transfer of the crop and work animals, he uses this language: "The father says, I do not want them, but if you will confess a judgment, so that your wife will understand this is a loan and not a gift, I will take the property and raise the $1,000, provided you manage the farm and crop. The son agrees to it, the confession is entered, the transfer made, the money paid, he remains in possession, and has not a creditor in the world but his father. No one is or can be hurt by this transaction. A year after, these creditors sell the son $4,000 worth of goods."

It is quite manifest that here two entirely distinct and different transactions have been confounded, viz.: the loan of the $1,000, and the alleged sale of the personal property for $615. The former took place nearly a year before the latter, for both of the Meyers testify that the loan of $1,000 was made just before the marriage of E. M. Meyer, the date of which is fixed at May 27th, 1880, and the judgment embracing this $1,000 was confessed on June 9th, 1880, while the alleged sale did not take place until April 25th, 1881, as shown by the receipt or bill of sale offered in evidence. These two different matters are not only confounded, but the statement that the son, at the time of the alleged sale, had not a creditor in the world is not only without any evidence to sustain it, but is directly in conflict with the undisputed testimony, which shows that a large part of his present indebtedness was contracted prior to April 25th, 1881.

But there is another more important misconception of the testimony. It is assumed, throughout the discussion in the Circuit decree as to the validity of the judgment, that the creditors had actual notice of the confession of judgment before they sold goods and extended credit to E. M. Meyer; as it is expressed in *one place, "The elder Meyer did not hold out inducements to them to sell to his son; did not encourage them; on the contrary, he warned them of his prior lien; his son and these creditors made the confession a subject of discussion at the time the debts were contracted." And again, "These creditors came to Orangeburg a year or more after the confession was entered; they saw it; they knew it; they talked about it, and then extended their credit." It is difficult to see how the Circuit judge could have so far misconceived the uncontradicted testimony in the case except upon the supposition that two totally distinct matters have again been confounded. The debts were contracted, as we have seen, at different dates, from February 15th, 1881, to June 18th, 1881, and there is not a particle of testimony even tending to show that any one of the creditors ever knew or heard of the confession of judgment until July 27th, 1881, after which date, so far as appears, not a single debt was contracted. Indeed, until the letter of E. M. Meyer of June 30th, 1881, to Bruff, Faulkner & Co., which was after the last debt was contracted, it does not appear that any of the creditors ever heard that E. M. Meyer was indebted to his father in any form.

The Circuit judge, therefore, in making the statements which we have quoted from his decree, must have confounded what occurred after the creditors had learned of the confession of judgment, when they were endeavoring to secure their debts, with what occurred when such debts were contracted. In view of these manifest errors in the Circuit decree, we feel less hesitation in taking our own view of the testimony than we would otherwise feel. It is true that both the Meyers testify that this son, E. M. Meyer, was not in debt to any one at the time the confession of judgment was taken, and the Circuit judge has adopted their testimony as establishing that fact in the case, upon which his whole judgment mainly rests. How A. W. Meyer could know this fact it is not easy to see, especially when, by his own account, he seems to have been singularly ignorant of the business of his son, although living in the same town with him, carrying on a similar business but a few doors from him, and not only claiming to be by far his largest creditor, but having good reason to know, from the applications to him for help, that the son was certainly not managing well.

It seems to us incomprehensible how, in the short space of three years, the younger Meyer could have become so involved in debt as he represents himself to be, if he has given a correct account of the manner in which he has managed his business. According to his account, he started business in the latter part of 1878, with a cash capital, borrowed from his father, of $1,800, upon which he was not required to pay any interest for nearly two years—nearly one-half of the amount of stock which he usually carried; that he sold goods almost entirely for cash, usually at a profit of twenty-five per cent.; that his capital, in less than two years afterwards, was increased by a further loan of $1,000, and yet, at the expiration of about three years, he finds himself hopelessly involved—owing debts amounting to something more than $6,500, and with assets only estimated to be worth $3,500 and actually selling for $2,416, and this, too, without the slightest evidence that he had been engaged in any speculation or that he was addicted to gambling or any other bad habits which would lead to a waste of his means. Looking at these facts, which, of course, E. M. Meyer cannot dispute, as they are gathered from his own testimony, we think that the most charitable construction which can be put upon them is, that, while his bald declaration that he owed no debts at the time the judgment was confessed, may possibly be nominally true, yet that he must have been constantly making debts, and paying one by making a debt to another.

But be this as it may, we think that the Circuit judge erred in holding that a confession of judgment cannot be set aside for fraud, except at the instance of creditors whose debts were contracted before such confession was taken, and that subsequent creditors cannot attack it. If a person, though not in debt at the time, confesses a judgment with a view to protect his property from debts which he expects to contract, or from a liability which he apprehends he will be subsequently subjected to, the judgment may be set aside as a fraud upon such subsequent creditors. State v. Fife, 2 Bail. 337; Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bail. 324 [23 Am. Dec. 140]. Moreover, the testimony of both father and son *distinctly shows that at the time of the alleged loan of $1,000, only a very short time before the confession was taken, the son was in debt and made that a pretext for borrowing that sum, but whether it was used in the payment of such indebtedness does not appear from the testimony of either father or son. The elder Meyer says: "When he borrowed the $1,000 I did not have the money; he had a note coming due, and had to raise money to pay it." But whether the note became due before the confession was taken, and whether it was paid, is nowhere stated by either father or son, but it does appear from the testimony of Hickman, that A. W. Meyer told him that his son had spent a considerable portion of the $1,000 in furnishing his house, just before his marriage. We think, therefore, that there is every reason to believe that E. M. Meyer was in debt at the time the $1,000 was obtained, and at the time when the confession was taken; certainly that the confession was taken to protect the property of the son from future indebtedness which he was constantly contracting.

But aside from all this, there is another fatal objection to the confession of judgment. It does not comply with the requirements of section 400 Lynch's Code (now section 384), inasmuch as it does not state the facts out of which the debt arose, which it was given to secure. As we have said in the recent case of Ex parte Carroll, 17 S. C. 450: "The judgment in question derives its origin from a special statutory provision, and to make it valid the requirements of the statute must be strictly complied with. Freeman on Judgments, § 543. * * * The object of the statement required by the code is to protect creditors against fraudulent confessions of judgment by giving them such information as will enable them, by inquiry, to ascertain whether the alleged indebtedness is bona fide or pretensive and fraudulent, and if the statement fails to furnish such information, then the judgment based upon it must be regarded as fraudulent and void as to other creditors even though it may be valid as between the parties to it who may be estopped from questioning its validity." See also the case of Weinges v. Cash, 15 S. C. 61, where this subject is discussed.

*From what is said in these cases it is clear that the failure to make the statement as required by the section of the code above cited, is not a mere irregularity, but renders the judgment void as to creditors whether antecedent or subsequent; for as to them it is no judgment inasmuch as it fails to comply with one of the essential requirements of the statute, which alone is the authority for taking a judgment in this form; and it is only upon the principle of estoppel that it is good between the parties. If, as is abundantly established by the authorities, a defective statement renders such a judgment void as to creditors, nothing would seem to be clearer than that a false statement, or even one so grossly inaccurate as to mislead the inquirer, would also render the judgment void. Certainly if mere omission to give such information as will enable creditors to prosecute any inquiry into the bona fides of the judgment, is fatal to the validity of the judgment, giving false information, or such as would mislead inquirers, ought to have the same effect. A failure to give any information is less likely to defeat the object of the statute than the giving of false information, or such grossly inaccurate information as to throw the inquirer off instead of putting him on the track.

Applying these principles to the case in hand, it is perfectly manifest that the judgment in question is void as to creditors. If the answers and the testimony of the two Meyers are to be believed, then it is quite clear that the statement upon which the judgment was based was absolutely false, or, to put it in the mildest form, was so grossly inaccurate as to mislead any creditor who should have undertaken to inquire into the bona fides of the judgment. Not a single fact stated in it is true, except as to the amount of the indebtedness. The date of the origin of the indebtedness is fixed in the statement at May 31st, 1880, while the testimony fixes it, as to the larger part, nearly two years before, and of the remainder at some time prior to May 27th, 1880. The consideration alleged in the statement is the sale of A. W. Meyer's share in the stock of goods to E. M. Meyer, while the testimony shows that A. W. Meyer never had any interest in the stock of goods, and that the real consideration was money borrowed to buy goods—not the stock which was in the store May 31st, 1880, but the stock purchased when he first started business, nearly two years before.

The attempt, therefore, to reconcile this glaring conflict by the supposition that E. M. Meyer "described the indebtedness as stock in trade of his father, because the goods had been paid for with the money he had borrowed from him," seems to us far-fetched and unreasonable. It could hardly be pretended that the stock of goods in the store on May 31st, 1880, the day fixed by E. M. Meyer, in the statement, as the date of the origin of the indebtedness, was the stock of goods which he had purchased with the $1,800 loaned him by his father, when he started business in October, 1878. And as to the $1,000, alleged to have been borrowed just before the confession was taken, there certainly is not a shadow of pretense that it could be represented by the stock of goods then in the store. Perhaps the more reasonable supposition would be, that this radical difference in the account given of the origin of the indebtedness upon which the confession of judgment was based, was due to the allegation of partnership in the complaint. We are entirely satisfied, therefore, that the statement upon which the confession of judgment was based, was either false or so grossly inaccurate as to mislead creditors, rather than assist them in prosecuting their inquiries into the bona fides of the judgment, and that, upon the principles above announced, the judgment is void as to the creditors, and should have been so declared.

As to the alleged sale of the personal property, it is manifest that the judgment below must be reversed, as it is based upon error of law, in holding that as "the judgment is a valid lien, there is no necessity to consider the transfer of personal property, for that is bound by the judgment." Judgments never were a lien upon personal property, and under the code an execution had no lien until it was levied, and it does not appear that there ever was any levy under the execution issued on the judgment by confession, upon the property transferred. It is true that the Circuit judge does go on to indicate very plainly his opinion that the transfer was a valid one, and could not be assailed by the creditors, but his conclusion rests largely upon what has *been seen to be an error of fact, to wit, that E. M. Meyer was not in debt at the time when the transfer was made.

But, inasmuch as no distinct judgment was rendered as to the validity of this transfer, we, perhaps, ought to refer that matter back to the Circuit Court. In doing so, however, we do not wish to be understood as endorsing the views thrown out by the Circuit judge as to this matter. It seems to us that when a person who is in debt at the time, makes a transfer of all, or a large portion of his personal property without notice to his creditors, and retains possession, using and actually claiming it (as was said by one of the witnesses, E. M. Meyer did,) as his own, it will require strong evidence to rebut the presumption arising from such retention of possession. See the case of Pringle v. Rhame, 10 Rich. 72 [67 Am. Dec. 569], where the authorities upon this subject are collected and commented on.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court, with instructions to render judgment declaring the confession of judgment from E. M. Meyer to A. W. Meyer void as to the creditors of the former; and to hear and determine the question whether the alleged transfer of personal property by E. M. Meyer to A. W. Meyer, is valid as against the creditors of said E. M. Meyer.

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, December, 1881.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. M. Thomas, for appellant.

Mr. G. D. Bryan, contra.

April 17th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant, Mr. Caulfield, (the other defendants being parties merely as junior lien creditors,) appeals from a judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate. The mortgage was given for the purpose of "securing all sum or sums of money which have been or may be loaned to me under the ordinance for rebuilding the burnt district and waste places of the city of Charleston, ratified the twenty-eighth day of August, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, with interest, insurance and other proper charges."

The scheme of this ordinance, in general terms, was that bonds of the city, which are usually called fire loan bonds, were to be issued and loaned to owners of lots in the burnt district, which loans were to be secured by mortgage of such lots, and not only *were the faith and funds of the city pledged for the payment of the fire loan bonds, but all sums of money received in payment of loans made to the lot owners were "set apart and appropriated as a special fund for the redemption and extinguishment of said bonds and interest." It was, therefore, manifestly a scheme by which the city was to lend its credit to the lot owners for the purpose of enabling them to obtain the means of rebuilding on the lots over which a disastrous fire had passed, destroying the buildings in a large portion of the city. With a view to quiet doubts entertained as to the power of the city council to pass such an ordinance, the legislature, on September 19th, 1866, (13 Stat. 371,) passed an act in which the ordinance was set out in full, ratifying and confirming the same. The act also prescribed the form of the mortgage to be taken by the city council as security for any loans made under it, which form seems to have been followed in the case now in hand.

On June 23d, 1870, the mortgage in question was executed to secure the payment of sundry bonds of the appellant, made on that day and on other days up to January 1st, 1871, aggregating, in the whole, the sum of $8,000, and fire loan bonds of the city were delivered to the appellant in exchange therefor, which last-mentioned bonds were put on the market by him and sold at various prices, ranging from forty-eight to fifty-two cents on the dollar. It appeared in evidence that these loans were effected upon the mortgage of lots upon which wooden buildings were erected. Various defenses were set up by the appellant, which will be stated more particularly when we come to state the exceptions to the judgment appealed from.

The case was placed on the Equity Docket for November Term, 1880, and defendant made a motion to strike it from the docket, upon the ground that more than a year and a day had elapsed since the filing of the answer, without any intervening steps having been taken in the cause. This motion was refused and the appellant excepted.

The master to whom it was referred, to report upon the issues of law and of fact raised in the pleadings, reported that no payments had been made on account of the principal or interest due on the bonds of the appellant, since January 1st, 1871, and that *on July 1st, 1871, as it is stated in the "Case" (though we presume it is a misprint and should be 1881), there was due and payable the sum of $15,753.97, for principal, interest, taxes and insurance, and that he saw nothing in any of the defenses set up which should operate to defeat the right of the plaintiff to have a sale of the mortgaged premises, which he accordingly recommended. To this report appellant excepted on various grounds, but as they are all adopted as part of his exceptions to the judgment, they need not be set out here. The Circuit judge confirmed the master's report, and gave judgment for foreclosure and sale, and from this judgment the defendant Caulfield appeals upon numerous grounds, which are, in effect, as follows:

1. Because the master did not report the testimony taken in the cause.

2. Because he has not reported his findings of fact and his findings of law.

3. Because he should have reported as a fact that the action was on the penal bond of a private party, payable to the city, conditioned to pay for a loan to him of city fire loan bonds, upon his application, to improve his private property with said bonds.

4. Because he should have reported as law that the city could not maintain an action on such a bond or contract, which is invalid, as conditioned for the faithful application of the city bonds to works which the city had no power to construct, or assist in constructing.

5. Because he should have reported that the fire loan bonds are without authority of law, being for private and not for public objects.

6. Because he should have reported that the bond was in contravention of the act of 1866.

7. That the plaintiff is not the real party in interest, nor has it clean hands in this transaction, so as to enable it to maintain this action, nor can the city be a trustee for the real plaintiffs as to this real estate.

8. That there was no proof of the condition of the bond having been broken, there being no evidence of any money loaned; that the defendant is entitled to a homestead under any *decree which may be made in favor of the real parties in interest; that only a decree for payment in fire loan bonds can be rendered, and that there has been no proof of notice under the terms of the ninth section of the act of 1866.

9. Because the decree is in contravention of the eighth and ninth sections, article IX., of the State constitution, and of article V. of amendments to the United States constitution.

10. Because of error in refusing the motion to strike the case from the docket.

11. Because a stay should have been granted under sections 361 or 363 of the code of 1870.

The point raised by the first ground, even if maintainable at all as a ground of appeal, has been obviated by the supplement to the "Case," in which the testimony taken does appear.

The second ground is disposed of by the case of Bollmann v. Bollmann, 6 S. C. 44.

None of the several points raised by the eighth ground can be sustained. If the appellant received valuable consideration (as we shall presently see that he did) for his bonds secured by the mortgage sought to be foreclosed in this action, we cannot conceive what difference it makes whether such consideration consisted of money or something else.

That the claim of homestead cannot be sustained against the mortgage is too well settled to admit of dispute. Homestead Association v. Enslow, 7 S. C. 1; Rosenberg v. Lewi, 7 S. C. 344; Smith v. Mullone, 10 S. C. 22.

Nor is the position that only a decree for payment in fire loan bonds could be rendered, based upon any better foundation. The appellant did not obligate himself to pay in that way. His obligation was to pay so much money, not to return the fire loan bonds which he received. The provision contained in the fifth section of the ordinance, authorizing the borrower to pay in fire loan bonds, only applied to payments in advance of the stated times of payments, and the appellant having failed to avail himself of such provision cannot now claim any benefit therefrom, especially as he does not now tender payment in such bonds.

As to the objection that there was no proof of notice, that is fully met by the supplement to the "Case," where it appears that the appellant did receive notice not only from the city treasurer, but also from the corporation counsel.

We are not aware of any statute or rule of court under which the tenth ground can be sustained, and there is nothing in the "Case" which shows that the appellant had taken the necessary steps to entitle him to the stay claimed by the eleventh ground.

Under the view which we take of this case it will not be necessary to consider or determine whether the legislature had the power, under the constitution, to invest the city council with authority to issue the fire loan bonds for the purposes contemplated by the ordinance of the city council of August 28th, 1866, as ratified and confirmed by the act of 1866, hereinbefore cited. But, while not intending to indicate any opinion as to the constitutional question raised in the argument, we shall assume, for the purposes of this case only, that the city council had no lawful authority to issue the fire loan bonds for the purposes contemplated by the ordinance, and that they, therefore, are not valid obligations of the city. But, assuming all this, the question still remains, whether the appellant is not nevertheless liable on his contract with the city council.

To have a clear view of this question it will only be necessary to inquire what was practically the transaction between the city council and the appellant. It was simply this—the appellant not having the means necessary to enable him to rebuild, obtained from the city council the means of doing so; and it seems to us wholly immaterial to the inquiry, whether the city council, in obtaining the means which it furnished to the appellant, went outside of its corporate authority or not. The appellant got what he wanted and what he bargained for, and in equity and good conscience he ought to pay what he agreed to pay for what he got and used. Having received the fire loan bonds from the city council, sold them and applied the proceeds to his own use, it certainly does not lie in his mouth to say that the bonds which he has thus converted to his own use are not valid obligations of the city, and therefore that he is released from his obligation to pay the amount which he has agreed to pay for them. He received them as valid obligations, sold them to others as such, enjoyed the benefits of such sale, and he is now estopped from denying their validity.

This seems to us so plainly in accordance not only with well settled principles of equity, but also with the dictates of common honesty, that we cannot suppose that any authority is needed to support so plain a proposition. But if authority be necessary, we think it can be found in the case of Railroad Companies v. Schutte, 103 U. S. 118 [26 L. Ed. 327]. In that case bonds of the State of Florida, on which were endorsed certificates of the governor, to the effect that they were issued in aid of certain railroad companies, and that the State of Florida held first mortgage bonds of said companies for a like amount as further security to the holders thereof, which had been issued without constitutional authority, were delivered to certain railroad companies in exchange for their own bonds secured by statutory mortgages, and the State bonds were put upon the market and sold by the railroad companies. One of the questions in the case was as to the liability of the railroad companies under their statutory mortgages, and it was held that they were liable notwithstanding the want of validity of the State bonds which they had received in exchange for their own bonds secured by the statutory mortgages.

Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, after conceding the invalidity of the State bonds, used this language: "But it by no means follows that because the State is not liable on its bonds, the companies are free from responsibility under their statutory mortgages. By the express provisions of the act the State bonds were to be given the company in exchange for its own bonds. The company, not the State, was to use and dispose of the State bonds. The object of the State was to aid the company with its credit. * * * It is clear, therefore, that the intention was that, as between the State and the company, the State was to be the guarantor of the company bonds, and the company the principal debtor. With the public, however, it was different. There the State was the debtor and the company was only known through the statutes under which the bonds were put out, and the certificates endorsed on the bonds themselves, which were that the State road company for a like amount, as security to the holder thereof. Such bonds of the State, with such endorsements, the company put on the market and sold. Under these circumstances the certificate of the governor as to the security held by the State is, in legal effect, the certificate of the company itself, and equivalent to an engagement on the part of the company that the bonds, so far as the security is concerned, is the valid obligation of the State. The case is clearly within the reason of the rule which makes every endorser of commercial paper the guarantor of the genuineness and validity of the instrument he endorses. We cannot doubt that under these circumstances the company is estopped, so far as its own liabilities are concerned, from denying the validity of the bonds. Having negotiated them on the faith of such a certificate, the company must be held to have agreed, as part of its own contract, whatever that was, that the bonds were obligatory." Again, at page 144, in disposing of the position that the recovery must be limited to the amount actually received for the State bonds when sold by the companies, he said: "As we have endeavored to show, the bonds, although void as to the State, are valid as to the company that sold them. Having been put on the market by the companies as valid bonds, the companies are estopped from setting up their unconstitutionality. As against the companies they occupy in the market the position of commercial securities, and may be dealt with and enforced as such. * * * In commerce, commercial paper means what on its face it represents, regardless of what its maker or promoter may have got for it."

*held the first mortgage bonds of the rail-

The fact that there was no such certificate endorsed upon the fire loan bonds as there was upon the Florida State bonds, cannot, as was argued by the appellant, affect the question. The liability arises from having put the bonds on the market as valid, having sold them as such, and having received the proceeds of sale. But, as matter of fact, the recital contained in the fire loan bonds, the form of which is given in the supplement to the "Case," practically amounts to the same thing as the certificates on the Florida bonds. It seems to us clear, therefore, both upon principle, and authority, that the appellant *cannot escape liability, even though it be conceded that the fire loan bonds are not valid obligations of the city.

By the seventh ground the appellant makes the point that the plaintiff is not the real party in interest, and, therefore, cannot maintain this action, nor can it be a trustee for such real party, and in that way maintain the action. Whether the plaintiff is or is not the real party in interest, depends upon facts not developed in the pleadings or evidence. On the face of the papers the city council appears to be the legal owner and holder of the bonds secured by the mortgage in question, and it was incumbent upon the appellant to show the facts to be otherwise. It will be observed that the faith and funds of the city were pledged for the payment of the fire loan bonds, as well as all sums of money received in payment of loans made to the lot owners. If, therefore, a portion of the fire loan bonds had been redeemed, as was stated at the bar to be the fact, out of the funds of the city derived from taxes, and sources of revenue other than amounts collected on loans to lot owners, the city, to that extent, became the absolute owner of the bonds given to secure loans to an amount equal to the amount of the fire loan bonds so redeemed.

But, waiving this, as it rests upon suppositions and not evidence, we do not see why the city council cannot be regarded as holding the bonds and mortgages to secure the loans made to lot owners, as trustee of a fund for the redemption of the fire loan bonds, and thereby trustee for the holders of such bonds. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp., § 437, et seq., where the leading cases are cited at length, showing that a municipal corporation may hold property in trust. If, then, the plaintiff is such a trustee, the holders of the fire loan bonds would undoubtedly have an equity to compel the city council to collect the bonds given by the lot owners, and apply the proceeds to the purpose for which such bonds were given; and, if so, it would seem to follow, necessarily, that the city council might, of their own motion, do that which they could be compelled to do.

But it is urged that, even if the city council can be regarded as trustee for the fire loan bond holders, the action should have *been brought by the plaintiff, as trustee. We are unable to appreciate the force of this position. The mortgage here sued upon was not given to the city council as trustee, and we see no necessity for making such an addition to the name of the plaintiff in this case. The action is brought, and properly brought, in the name of the obligee of the bonds secured by the mortgage sought to be foreclosed, who is the legal owner and holder thereof. Code of 1882, § 134.

Again, the appellant contends that, as the mortgage contains an authority for the mortgagee to sell the mortgaged premises, in case of default in making payments as they become due, the plaintiff cannot maintain an action for foreclosure, but must resort to the remedy provided by the act in prescribing the form of the mortgage, with a power of sale clause. This provision is merely permissive and not mandatory, as is clearly shown by the provision in section 7 of the ordinance, expressly declaring that if the borrower shall, at any time, be in arrear for one year's interest, his mortgage shall be foreclosed. But, even were this not so, it is well settled.

that the power of sale is merely an additional remedy, and does not preclude a proceeding by action. As is said in 2 Jones Mort., § 1773, "The power is merely a cumulative remedy. It is one species of foreclosure, but it does not exclude jurisdiction in equity."

As we understand the sixth ground, the point intended to be there made is that the loan was invalid because it was made upon a mortgage of lots upon which wooden buildings were erected, the seventh section of the ordinance forbidding such a loan. Aside from the fact that the appellant is, by this position, attempting to take advantage of his own wrong in erecting a wooden building, in violation of that section of the ordinance upon which his point is based, it appears that, by the acts of February 28th, 1870, (14 Stat. 378,) and March 1st, 1870, (14 Stat. 412,) the city council were authorized to alter this provision as to wooden buildings, and that, accordingly, an ordinance to that effect was passed before the loans were made, which the mortgage now in question was given to secure.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Mackey, J., Pickens, September, 1880.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Norton, Keith & Hollingsworth and R. A. Child, for appellants.

Messrs. Perry & Perry and J. H. Whitner, contra.

April 17th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. Isaac Anderson, having duly made his last will and testament, of which the defendant, William H. Anderson, is the sole qualified executor, departed this life February 17th, 1867, leaving as his heirs-at-law, his widow, who died in May, 1877, and the following named children, to wit: William H. Anderson, James P. Anderson, John F. Anderson, Polly Anderson (who is an imbecile), Huldah Keith, Nancy Stewart, wife of A. Stewart; Hester Nimmons, wife of William Nimmons; Sarah A. Alexander (a widow), and Alpha Barton, wife of O. E. Barton; and the following grandchildren, to wit: M. E. Kirksey and Ellen E. Mauldin (children of a predeceased son).

*and the plaintiffs, who are the children of another son, who likewise predeceased the testator.

In 1859 the testator conveyed, by deed of gift, to his daughter, Mrs. Barton, a tract of land, having previously given to her and most of his other children comparatively small amounts of personal property. On April 10th, 1863, the testator, Isaac Anderson, in consideration of natural love and affection, as well as nominal sums of money, conveyed to several of his children, to wit: John F. Anderson, William H. Anderson, Hester Nimmons, Nancy Stewart and Sarah A. Alexander, respectively, valuable tracts of land, reserving to himself a life-estate therein; all of whom, except John F. Anderson, who was living in California, went into possession of the tracts conveyed to them, respectively, and have ever since retained possession. On November 9th, 1866, the said Isaac Anderson conveyed to his two granddaughters, the defendants, M. E. Kirksey and Ellen E. Mauldin, a tract of land, of which they took and have ever since retained possession.

On November 10th, 1866, an agreement under seal was signed by certain of these parties, of which the following is a copy:

"Whereas, Isaac Anderson, of the State and district aforesaid, on or about the tenth day of April, 1863, for the purpose of advancing his children and making suitable provision for them, did partition and divide certain tracts of land and assign them to some of his said children, and execute and deliver conveyances thereto, reserving, as was then thought, a sufficient amount of property to equalize his children; and whereas, the unfortunate termination of the recent war has swept away much of the said property, and rendered it almost impossible for justice to be done as the matter now stands, especially as the lands which were conveyed and transferred by him were valued in the then depreciated currency of the country; and whereas, the changed circumstances of the country render a modification of the agreement, then partially entered into, necessary, and, also, another valuation of the said lands; now, know all men by these presents, that, for and in consideration of the above-mentioned premises, and in order to compromise and arrange, and prevent further misunderstanding and disagreement in the undersigned, children of the said Isaac Anderson, and the husbands of such daughters as are married, have covenanted and agreed to

and with each other, *and to and with our father, the said Isaac Anderson, that the lands heretofore conveyed to us, or to each and any of us, shall be revalued by commissioners, appointed for that purpose—the same persons to act as commissioners who acted before, if that be possible—and the true value being thus ascertained to be affixed to the said several tracts of land; and we do further agree, severally, to account for the said valuation of the said lands at the death of the said Isaac Anderson, to his executors or administrators. As it is well known and understood to and among all the parties to this agreement that the said lands are, or have been given by the said Isaac Anderson to his children as advancements, and we further, severally, agree to pay over to the said executors or administrators whatever amount may be found necessary to equalize the children in the settlement of the estate of the said Isaac Anderson after his decease. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals, this 10th day of November, A. D. 1866.

This paper was taken charge of by William H. Anderson, who says in his testimony: "It was the intent that all should sign this paper. I kept this paper after it was executed. Thought I was the proper person to take care of it. Was attending to my father's business. Was not attending to all his business, as a general thing."

On the same day that this paper was signed by the above named parties, Isaac Anderson made his will, the provisions of which need not be stated, further than that they show the desire of the testator to make all his children "equal in the end," and, for this purpose, that each of his children should "render in their advancements." In accordance with the provisions of this paper, the land conveyed to the children and grandchildren who signed the same, as well as the tract conveyed to John F. Ander*son were appraised, but no appraisal was made of the land given to Mrs. Barton.

This action was originally commenced by the plaintiffs on February 9th, 1878, (the amended complaint having been served May 7th, 1879,) for the purpose, mainly, of enforcing the performance of the covenants contained in the agreement above set out, by requiring the parties who had received land from the testator to account for the value of the same, as provided for in said agreement, and also for the purpose of obtaining from the executor an account and settlement of the estate, it being alleged in the complaint that the executor had neglected and refused either to account himself or to require the other covenantors to account for the value of the land received by them respectively, because of his own liability so to account, or because of collusion with one or more of his co-covenantors to deprive the other children of the testator, or their representatives, of their right to an equal share of the estate of the testator.

Various defenses were set up by such of the defendants as are appellants, all of which were overruled by the Circuit judge, who rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, by which he directed the appellants to pay certain specific sums of money to the plaintiffs, for the purpose of equalizing the shares of the testator's estate. From this judgment an appeal has been taken upon several grounds, but under the view which we take of the case, it will not be necessary to set out these grounds in detail.

The fundamental and controlling question in the case is, whether the agreement or covenant of November 10th, 1866, was ever fully executed so as to bind the parties who signed to the performance of its terms. We think it clear, not only from the terms of the paper itself, but also from the parol evidence adduced—which was competent for the purpose of showing that the paper was not fully executed, and which not being objected to would be competent for that reason, if for no other—that the intention was that all the children who had received advancements in land should sign the paper and become bound by its terms, and until this was done the transaction was inchoate and incomplete, and no obligation attached to those who did sign,

*until all who, according to the understanding of the parties at the time were to sign, had done so.

The cases of Robertson v. Evans, 3 S. C. 330, and Arthur v. Anderson, 9 S. C. 234, cited by the appellants, with the authorities therein referred to, are so perfectly conclusive upon this point that it is wholly unnecessary to add anything upon the subject. In Robertson v. Evans, the obligation was in form joint and several, and yet that was not allowed to affect the result. So here the fact that by the paper in question the parties covenanted severally to account for the value of the land given to them respectively, does not take this case out of the rule as settled by those cases. No one of the parties intended to incur any obligation at all, unless all who stood in the same category came into the proposed arrangement. It is assuming the very point in issue to say that the parties who did sign covenanted severally, and therefore it made no difference to them whether others entered into the covenant. The true view is, that there never was any covenant at all, because all who, according to the understanding, were to join did not do so. Where two or more persons agree to enter into a certain covenant as a matter of necessity, one must sign first, and if, after he has signed, the others refuse to do so, his signature amounts to nothing and imposes no obligation upon him.

The scheme, manifestly, was to equalize the shares of all the children, and this could only be effected by all of the children who had received advancements, entering into the proposed covenant, binding themselves each to account for the true value of their respective advancements. But if the terms of the agreement are enforced against those only who signed, the very object which all the parties had in view—equality—would be defeated, and those who did sign would be required to pay more to those who had received nothing than they would have had to do if the arrangement which the parties understood at the time that they were entering into, had been perfected and not left inchoate and incomplete as it was.

It is true that the terms used in the recital would seem to indicate that the intention was that only those were to sign whose lands were appraised on the day the paper was signed by some *of the parties, but when we look to the declared object of the whole transaction, and especially when we consider the undisputed parol testimony, it is clear that the intention was that all, including Mrs. Barton, who had received her advancement several years before, should enter into and become bound by the terms of the arrangement. The testimony is direct to the point that the intention was that Mrs. Barton should sign the paper, and that a messenger was sent for her for that purpose. Her testimony does not even tend to show that such was not the understanding with which the other parties signed, but only shows that she was unwilling to enter into the proposed arrangement.

But even if be conceded that it was not in the contemplation of the parties that any should sign except those whose lands were appraised, yet the failure of any one of that class to sign the paper would defeat the whole arrangement, and deprive the instrument of any binding force even as to those who did sign it. Now it is apparent that one of that class, John F. Anderson, never signed the paper, and that alone would be sufficient to destroy the validity of the instrument. It is argued, however, that John F. Anderson being in California at the time could not sign the paper, and therefore it cannot be supposed that it was the intention he should sign. We are not able to appreciate the force of such an argument. There was precisely the same reason for his becoming a party to the arrangement as that any of the others should, and the fact of his absence in these days of rapid and easy communication between distant points, presented but a very small obstacle to his joining in the paper, one which could have been very easily overcome.

It will not do to say, as was argued by respondents, that no land was in fact ever given to John F. Anderson, inasmuch as he was in California at the time, and the deed for his tract was never delivered to him; for it was put upon record, and this would be sufficient evidence of delivery, in the absence of anything to the contrary, except that he was away at the time. But in addition to this it appears from the facts as found by the Circuit judge, that the tract of land conveyed to him was, after his death, partitioned as his property and not as a part of the *estate of his father, as stated in the argument for respondents) amongst the parties to this case, as his heirs-at-law, and it is now too late for any of them to deny that it was his land.

Again, it is perfectly clear, and, indeed, is conceded, that Mrs. Stewart and Mrs. Nimmons, being married women at the time, under the law as it stood at the date of the paper, their act in signing the instrument in question was an absolute nullity, and amounted to nothing more than if they had not gone through the form of putting their names to the paper. But, it is contended that, after they had acquired all the rights and powers of a feme sole, by virtue of the present constitution and the subsequent legislation upon the subject, they have, by their acts, recognized their obligations under the covenant, and must, therefore, be held bound to respond to its terms, and the Circuit judge has so found. After a careful examination of the testimony incorporated in the "Case" we have been unable to discover any evidence whatever that either of these ladies have done any act recognizing the binding force of the covenant, by paying money under it or otherwise.

In the absence of any such testimony it becomes unnecessary to consider whether the act of a feme covert, which is absolutely void, can be ratified or confirmed after she becomes discoverd, either in fact or in law, or whether any, and if so what, acts done by her would amount to a re-execution of a deed signed by her while under the disability of coverture. There is evidence that Mrs. Alexander, who seems to have been a widow at the time, did subsequently make payments to the executor for the purpose of bringing about equality in the shares of the children, but there is no evidence that she did so in pursuance of the terms of the covenant, and, on the contrary, she says expressly that she did so because she "thought all were bound to pay back without the paper."

We are satisfied that the covenant which constitutes the basis of the plaintiff's case, was never sufficiently executed to become of any legal or binding force, even as to those of the parties who did sign it; and under this view the other questions presented cannot arise, and need not be considered.

*The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

STATE v. PENNY.

(November Term, 1882.)

[1. Criminal Law ¶1159.]

Under an indictment charging the offense to have been committed in the county where the indictment was found, a verdict of guilty establishes as true the fact so charged, and this court cannot disturb such finding.

[2. Pilots ¶17.]

The penalties prescribed by the act of 1878, section 16, (16 Stat. 420), for crossing the bar, when entering port, without a pilot, or a signal for a pilot worn, applies to masters bringing their own vessels into port.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pilots, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. ¶17.]

[3. Commerce ¶57.]

The statute prescribing a system of pilotage for the ports of this State, requiring the employment of licensed pilots, and establishing the fees to be paid them by incoming and outgoing vessels, does not conflict with any of the provisions of the constitution of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 74; Dec. Dig. ¶57.]

[4. Criminal Law ¶93.]

The offense of crossing the bar without a pilot, or pilot signal worn, under section 16 of the act of 1878, being less than felony and punishable by fine not exceeding $100, is not within the jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions.

Before Aldrich, J., Charleston, June, 1882.

This was an indictment against S. J. Penny for a violation of the act of 1878 (now section 1275 of the General Statutes of 1882), committed on April 27th, 1881. The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. M. Thomas, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

April 19th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant was indicted under the act of 1878, entitled, "An act to regulate the pilotage at the port of Charleston." The indictment charged "that on the 27th of April, 1881, at Charleston bar, in the county of *Charleston, the defendant, not having a license as a pilot of the bar and harbor of Charleston, of the board of commissioners of pilotage for the port of Charleston, did unlawfully presume to bring into the aforesaid port, and did unlawfully bring into the aforesaid port a certain vessel, to wit: the schooner William B. Herrick, of which he was master, and which had to cross the bar, there being then and there, on said schooner, no signal for a pilot—against the form of the statute," &c. Upon trial he was convicted.

He then moved in arrest of judgment and for new trial on the grounds stated in the exceptions for this appeal, which motion being overruled the appeal was taken:

1. "Because the court had no jurisdiction over the alleged misdemeanor: (1). It having been done on the high seas and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States District Court sitting in admiralty; (2). It having been done outside of Charleston county; (3). By a person not subject to the State laws.

2. "Because the proper interpretation of the statute of 1878 does not apply to masters of their own vessels.

3. "Because the statute of 1878 is in violation of section 4237, U. S. Rev. Stat. [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 7893], in discriminating between vessels of this State and those of other States.

4. "Because the act of 1878 is unconstitutional, being forbidden by article I., section 9 of the United States constitution as an 'impost duty'; (2). Because it does not come within the purview of the laws regulating pilotage, as permitted by congress, no pilot being pre-supposed in the question; (3). Because it is a restriction on trade and commerce; and (4). Because it is contrary to the law of nations.

5. "Because the indictment does not allege that the schooner Herrick was not a vessel regularly trading between ports of this State."

The first exception, with its three specifications, is based upon the assumed fact that it is apparent upon the record that the venue is laid outside of Charleston county, the county in which the defendant was put upon trial. If the record sustained this allegation then this exception would be fatal, but an inspection *of the indictment shows the contrary. The offense is distinctly and in express terms charged to have been committed in Charleston county; not only so, but that being one of the essential facts involved in the issue, the verdict of guilty rendered by the jury has found this as one of the established facts of the case, and we must take this fact as settled, as under the law regulating the powers of this court we cannot go behind a verdict as to the facts of a case. This view disposes of the first exception with its incidents.

* 220

It is urged in the second exception that the act of 1878, under which the defendant has been convicted, does not apply to masters of vessels bringing in their own vessels without a pilot, but to parties who shall presume to act as pilots without regular license. I was much impressed with this position during the argument, for several reasons not now necessary to be adverted to, but upon a careful examination of the act I am satisfied that it cannot be sustained. It is in direct conflict with the express terms of the act, inconsistent with the proviso to the section under which the defendant was indicted, and out of harmony with the evident intent and purpose of the act.

The sixteenth section of the act now found in section 1275 of General Statutes, provides first, that no person shall be authorized to conduct * * * except a duly licensed pilot, and then provides further, that every person not having such license who shall presume to bring in * * * shall be entitled to no fee or reward, and besides shall be liable to fine of $100 ad valorem or be suspended. The words "ad valorem" or "be suspended" are not found in the original act of 1878, but have been added in General Statutes, for what purpose it is impossible to conceive, especially the words "ad valorem." The proviso to this section declares that the foregoing prohibition shall not extend to prevent any person from assisting a vessel in distress without a pilot on board, if such person shall deliver up such vessel to the first pilot who shall afterwards come on board and offer to conduct such vessel, and also that the captain and crew of the vessel shall be exempt from the fine for conducting her over the bar without a pilot, if in either of the two last-mentioned cases a signal for a pilot is worn.

*Now it can not be doubted that the terms "no persons" in that portion of the act which forbids authority to act except by licensed pilots is universal and without exception in its application. Nothing could be broader or more comprehensive. It prohibits all persons except those expressly authorized and licensed. And the terms "every person" in that portion where the consequences of a violation of the act are affixed, are equally comprehensive. "Every" includes all the separate individuals which constitute the whole, regarded one by one. There can be no exception. In this part of the act the penalty for its violation, is not only the fine of $100, but a forfeiture of all fees, gratuities and rewards for the service rendered is also imposed. Now this part of the penalty could not apply to masters of their own vessels, and the proviso as to these would seem to have been added expressly to show that they were to be included at least as to the fine, because that proviso in terms makes the captain and crew liable to this fine unless a signal for a pilot is worn.

This interpretation of the act is in harmony with its object and purpose. Upon an examination of the whole act regulating the pilotage of the port, its provisions will be found quite stringent and somewhat onerous on the pilots, the intent of the act being that an experienced and perfectly reliable body of pilots shall always be on hand ready and prepared to discharge the important duty of aiding vessels to cross the bar and be conducted with safety into port. The evil to be remedied was the danger resulting from inexperienced and unreliable parties engaged in this work. The remedy was to secure this work to persons who, upon examination * * * furnished the necessary evidence that they were qualified, and to this end it was thought best to subject every vessel coming in or going out to pilotage, except in the cases mentioned and where the signal is worn, as the pilots would then know the precise field within which they were allowed to operate, and could, therefore, the better prepare themselves for the discharge of their responsible duties. The rule that the evil should be suppressed and the remedy advanced we think sustains the construction hereinabove.

*We fail to see the discrimination which is the foundation of the third exception as in violation of the act of congress (section 4237, U. S. Rev. Stat.). The discrimination referred to, if any exists, is found in the thirteenth section of the act which describes a prompt civil remedy for failure to receive on board a pilot. The defendant was not indicted under this section, nor is this a civil proceeding against him. This section is, therefore, not under consideration, and we are not called upon to pass judgment upon the question raised in this exception.

It is urged under the fourth exception that the act of 1878 is unconstitutional, being in violation of sections 9 and 10, article I. of the constitution of the United States, as an impost duty. It is hardly necessary to do more in reference to this exception than to refer to the well-considered case of Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. 299 [13 L. Ed. 996], where a similar law in the State of Pennsylvania was discussed in all the phases of "impost duty," "discrimination" and "regulating commerce." In that case the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania had pronounced judgment sustaining the pilotage act then under consideration, holding that it was not, in any of its provisions involved in the cause, at variance with any provision of the constitution or laws of the United States, but was a constitutional and legal enactment. This judgment was affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States.

There is nothing in the sixteenth section of the act which made it necessary that it should be alleged in the indictment that schooner Herriek was not a vessel regularly trading between the ports of this State. This discrimination is found, as we have already stated, in the thirteenth section, which refers to a different matter.

This disposes of all the questions raised in the exceptions as to the judgment below, and if there was nothing else in the case that judgment should be affirmed. But the appellant in the argument before this court, in his sixth and last ground, interposed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, claiming that under section 22, article IV. of the constitution, trial justices had exclusive jurisdiction in such cases, it being less than felony and punishable by fine not exceeding $100. Under article I., section 19 of the constitution, also the act of the general assembly

*giving jurisdiction to trial justices' courts

(Gen. Stat. 1872, p. 195,) in criminal matters, construed in State v. McKettrick, 14 S. C. 346, we think this objection must prevail. It is true that this question was not passed upon by the Circuit judge, but it involves a question of jurisdiction and may be raised at any time. The court below, in our opinion, not having jurisdiction its judgment cannot be enforced.

And it is the judgment of this court that, for the want of jurisdiction in the court below, the judgment below be reversed.

LIVINGSTON v. EXUM.

[1. Injunction ⇨241.]

A plaintiff having failed in his action for damages for trespass, alleged to have been committed by defendants on his lands, under subsequent proceedings to ascertain the damages to which the defendants were entitled under the injunction bond given by the plaintiff, he cannot raise the question of his title to such lands.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 550; Dec. Dig. ⇨241.]

[2. Damages ⇨40; Injunction ⇨252.]

L. obtained a preliminary injunction to restrain P. and E. from getting crude turpentine on lands which he claimed, and gave an injunction bond; final judgment was rendered for defendants and the injunction was dissolved. E. was not engaged in getting crude turpentine, but P. was, and was under contract to furnish to E. for distillation all that he (P.) got. Held, that the loss to P. was sustained by reason of the injunction, but that the loss to E. was not the natural and proximate effect of the injunction, and, therefore, could not be recovered by him as damages. But the counsel fee paid by E. for procuring a dissolution of the injunction was properly recoverable under plaintiff's bond.

[3. Injunction ⇨252.]

Counsel fees allowed by the master, assumed, in the absence of a contrary statement in the brief, to have been incurred by defendants in having the injunction dissolved; and such fees may be allowed as damages, recoverable under the injunction bond.

[4. Appeal and Error ⇨805, 879.]

Parties failing to perfect their appeal taken from an order refusing to refer to the master their claim for damages under an injunction bond, are not entitled to a hearing of their appeal by this court when the cause is subsequently brought up by other appellants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3174, 3582; Dec. Dig. ⇨805, 879.]

tice in actions for damages under injunction bonds, and in Horres v. Berkeley Chemical Co., 57 S. C. 189, 35 S. E. 500, 52 L. R. A. 36, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Mackey, J., Orangeburg, January, 1881.

Action by John H. Livingston against the defendants named in the opinion of this court. The opinion fully states the case.

*224

*Messrs. M. I. Browning and S. Dibble, for appellants.

Messrs. A. Lathrop and J. F. Izlar, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, respondent, claiming to be seized and possessed of certain lands situate in Orangeburg county, brought the action below to recover damages for an alleged trespass by defendants in cutting, hacking and boxing the pine trees growing thereon for crude turpentine, which gave the land its principal value. An injunction was obtained at the beginning of the action, restraining the defendants from further trespass, upon the plaintiff giving an injunction bond in the sum of $500. Before the trial the amount of this bond was enlarged by order from Judge Fraser.

At the trial, which took place at the January Term, 1880, of the Court of Common Pleas for Orangeburg county, upon the close of the plaintiff's testimony the presiding judge granted a non-suit as to the defendant Kennedy, and it appearing from the evidence that there was no community of acts between the other defendants, Phillips and Davis, the plaintiff was required to elect which he would proceed against. He elected to proceed against Phillips and Exum, whereupon the complaint was dismissed as to Davis and the trial was had against these two defendants, in whose favor the jury rendered a verdict.

At the time the action below was commenced the defendant Phillips was engaged in getting crude turpentine from the trees upon the land in dispute, and he was under contract to furnish defendants Exum and Kennedy, who were running a turpentine still near by, all such crude material as he could make during the year from February, 1879, to March, 1880. The plaintiff was also running a still in the neighborhood.

The verdict having been rendered for the defendants, Exum and Phillips, judgment was ordered in accordance therewith. The injunction was vacated and set aside and an order was passed referring the matter to Thomas W. Glover, Esq., the master, to ascertain the damages to these defendants by reason of the injunction. The defendants

Kennedy and Davis moved *at the same time for a similar order as to their damages.

This was refused on the ground that the decision in their cases was not on the merits, a non-suit having been granted as to one and the case dismissed as to the other because the plaintiff had elected not to proceed against him. These defendants excepted and gave notice of appeal, but, as it seems, took no further steps to perfect their appeal except that their names are embraced in this appeal of the other defendants taken as to subsequent matters hereinafter.

The master reported as to the damages of Phillips and Exum, to wit: as to Phillips, the sum of $976. This estimate was based upon the quantity and value of the crude turpentine collected by Phillips, and which the plaintiff, after obtaining the injunction, appropriated to his own use. It also included a fee of $75 to his counsel. Exum claimed damages on account of the fact that Phillips had failed, by reason of the injunction, to furnish his distillery with the crude turpentine agreed upon, and also a fee of $65 paid to his counsel. The master allowed the fee but reported against the claim as to the other damage, because, in his opinion, this was too remote and uncertain, resting entirely upon the question of net profits which Exum might have made had Phillips furnished the crude material which the master thought was speculative, uncertain and dependent upon various contingencies impossible to be determined with any certainty. The master declined to consider the question of title to the premises set up by the plaintiff and made no report in reference thereto.

To this report both plaintiff and the defendants excepted. The exceptions of plaintiff are: 1. Because the master failed to allow to him certain items connected with collecting the crude turpentine after he took possession under the injunction. 2. Because the counsel fee was allowed. And 3. Because the master did not report that plaintiff, at the time the injunction was granted, was the owner in fee of the premises. Exum excepted: Because his claim for damages as to the profits was rejected; and Phillips, Because certain other items were not included in the damages reported for him.

*The report of the master, with these exceptions, was heard by Judge Mackey at the January Term of the court, 1881, the attorneys having stipulated with each other that, if the report of the master as to Phillips should be affirmed, the damages should be set down at $757; and if Exum should be allowed damages because of profits lost by him, the amount should be $661.84; and, further, if the court should consider the question of title as a matter of defense to the damages, that then the report should be recommitted so as to give Exum and Phillips an opportunity of being heard before the master on that subject with their evidence. These stipulations were brought to the attention of the judge in connection with the report of the master.

Judge Mackey filed his decree in April, 1881, in which he held: First. That at the time and before the injunction, and during the whole time it was of force, the plaintiff was the owner in fee of all the lands and premises mentioned in said injunction. And second. That the defendants, Exum and Phillips, had sustained no damages by reason of the granting and continuance of said injunction. He, therefore, overruled the exceptions of the defendants, and, sustaining those of the plaintiff, set aside and vacated the master's report in so far as it awarded damages to said defendants, or either of them, ordering judgment to be entered with costs for the plaintiff.

Exum and Phillips appealed: First. Because it was error in his Honor to consider the question of title. And second. Because the report of the master as to Phillips' damages should have been confirmed, and that Exum, also, should have been allowed the damages claimed by him. The real questions arising upon these exceptions and presented for our consideration are: 1st. Whether the question of title to the premises should have been considered by the judge; 2d. Whether the counsel fees of the defendants, reported by the master, should have been allowed as part of the damages sustained by them; and 3d. Whether Exum was entitled to have damages on account of profits lost in the contract with Phillips as to furnishing crude turpentine from the premises in dispute.

We do not see how the question of title was involved in the report of the master, upon which the Circuit judge was called *to pass. The plaintiff's original action may or may not have involved it, but the matter referred to the master was solely the question of damages growing out of this injunction, the verdict of the jury having determined that the plaintiff had no cause of action against these defendants, and, therefore, that the injunction by which they had been restrained from pursuing their legitimate work was improper and illegal. Such being the fact, we think that the plaintiff could not interpose his title in this issue of damages.

The question as to his right to bring an action against the defendants for trespass upon the land, of which he claimed that he was seized and possessed, had been tried and adjudicated against him; from the judgment entered he had not appealed. He had given an injunction bond to be responsible for such damages as might be incurred by the defendants by this action in the event of failure to establish his right to the premises. He had failed, and a new issue arose between himself and the defendants, the issue of damages alone, which was a question of fact to be determined by the testimony pertinent to such issue without regard to the title.

The master could not, under the order of reference, have considered the question of title, and it was not involved in his report made to the Circuit Court. As we understand the decree of the Circuit judge, he held that the defendants were not entitled to damages, not because of the fact that the testimony before the master failed to show damages, but because, as a matter of law, the plaintiff was the owner of the premises and was entitled to the turpentine grown and collected therefrom. We think it was error to permit the title to be thus interposed.

It is contended, however, in argument of respondent, that the Circuit judge, although he did hold that the respondent was the owner in fee of the land, yet it was not upon that ground that he overruled the master's report as to the damages, but that he found, as matter of fact in the testimony, that no damages had been sustained by the defendants; and it is urged that, under the repeated decisions of this court, this finding of the Circuit judge cannot be reversed unless the manifest weight of the evidence is against it. Admit this, and how does the case stand?

*As to Phillips, there is certainly no evidence in the case opposed to the findings of fact by the master that a certain quantity of crude turpentine had been taken from him by the plaintiff, and that he had paid or was responsible for a fee to his counsel of $75, the value of which turpentine, including the fee, by agreement, was estimated at $757—all this resulting from the injunction.

As to Exum, if the loss of profits could legally be regarded as damages by agreement also, this was to be set down at $661.84, and there was no doubt as to the fee. As to the facts of the case, then, the findings of the judge on the question of damages were without any testimony to sustain them. Upon the most important the parties have agreed, so that the matter before the Circuit judge involved entirely questions of law, to wit: whether in law the counsel fees were proper claims of damages in such cases, and whether Exum's profits were too remote to be brought in, or otherwise disallowable. These seem to us to be the only questions in the case, and to these we will now direct our attention.

As to the general damages claimed by Exum, we concur with the master. His reasoning upon that subject is full and to the point, and sustained not only by the authorities cited by him, but by many others. He had no contract with the plaintiff, as to furnishing to his distillery crude turpentine, which the plaintiff had broken. His contract was with his co-defendant, and if he sustained any damages in connection with said contract, it was at the hands of his co-defendant, and not from the plaintiff. His damages, if any, arose from the breach of contract by Phillips; that this breach was caused by plaintiff's injunction, can not transfer Exum's claim over Phillips upon the plaintiff. Besides, his claim for damages being dependent as a matter of fact upon the further fact whether he would have realized any profits out of the contract with Phillips, even had it been complied with, makes the whole claim so uncertain, doubtful and remote as properly demanded its exclusion in the estimate made by the master. See the cases of La Amistad de Rues, 5 Wheaton 385 [5 L. Ed. 115]; The Lively, 1 Gallison 324 [Fed. Cas. No. 8,403]; Home Machine Co. v. Bryan.

*24 Am. Rep. 735; Fuller v. Edings, 11 Rich. 239, relied on by the master.

It is exceedingly difficult, in fact almost impossible, to define with precision any general rule by which it can be determined with absolute certainty how far liability extends as to the consequences of an act. In general terms it has been frequently said that this liability ceases with its natural and proximate consequences, but facts and their incidents are so frequently the result of combined causes and become in their turn so productive of other events and consequences so clearly interwoven with each other, that it is not always possible to say when they are natural and proximate and when they are too remote and doubtful. Therefore each case must in a great measure be determined by its own facts as compared to other analogous cases where the principle has been applied without referring to the numerous cases in detail where this subject has been discussed.

We think that an examination of the case of Harrison v. Berkley, 1 Strobb. 544 [47 Am. Dec. 578], where the principle was carried as far perhaps as it well could be, and the numerous cases cited in the argument of that case by Mr. Gregg, will show that the master here did not err in excluding the claim of Exum. This claim did not belong to the class of loss sustained as the natural and proximate effect of the injunction upon him, but of gains prevented as the result of the injunction upon another party, Phillips, with whom it is alleged he had a certain contract, which the injunction caused him to violate. Here is one cause superinducing in its effects another cause, the effects of which last, and of which Exum complains, being in the highest degree contingent and doubtful to wit: gains prevented. We have found no case where such a claim has been established.

Next, as to the counsel fees. Mr. High, in his work on Injunctions, at section 973-4, page 562, lays down the rule extracted from numerous cases cited in the notes, to be that reasonable compensation as counsel fees in procuring the dissolution may be allowed as damages to be recovered in an action on the injunction bond, but fees paid for defending the entire action to which the injunction was merely ancillary, can not. This seems to be the true rule. There is nothing said in the brief *showing that the fees allowed by the master here, were for the entire action, and not for resisting the injunction. In the absence of any statement by the parties on that subject, it is fair to presume that the master allowed them as expenses incurred in dissolving the injunction, and, if so, under the authority of Mr. High and the cases cited by him, they were legitimate.

We do not find the appeal of Davis and Kennedy before us in such shape as to be considered. It seems that these parties took no steps to perfect their appeal from the order of Judge Pressley refusing to refer their claim to the master, except simply giving notice of appeal. They filed no return nor did they prepare any case. The order of Judge Pressley was not an intermediate order as to them, but was final, and from that order they should have prosecuted their appeal within the time and under the regulations prescribed by the rules of this court. Having failed to do so they must be regarded as having waived their right.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remitted so that Phillips may be adjudged to be entitled to damages to the amount of $757, the amount stipulated by the parties, and Exum to the amount of $65.

HILL v. THOMAS.

[1. Injunction ⇨241.]

After dissolution of an injunction, the damages sustained by the defendants and recoverable under an injunction bond wherein the parties obligated themselves "pursuant to the statute," may be ascertained by reference under section 243 of the code, and the assessment thus reached may be enforced by order of the court, and by execution against all the obligors, provided they have all been notified of the reference, and thus made parties to such proceeding.

Under proceedings to ascertain the damages sustained by defendants properly recoverable under an injunction bond, and wherein such damages were ascertained to be in excess of the penalty of the bond, the judgment should be for the penalty of the bond and also for the costs † of such proceedings.

Before Aldrich, J., Union, October, 1881. The opinion states the case.

Mr. D. A. Townsend, for appellant.
Mr. C. C. Culp, contra.

April 19th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Judgment creditors of G. W. Hill levied upon his interest in a tract of land and were proceeding to sell it, when he instituted an action claiming that his children were joint tenants with him in the land, praying partition, and also that a homestead should be set off to him in his part; and in order that the questions might be considered before the land was sold, procured an injunction January 3d, 1878, restraining the sale until the further order of the court. As a condition of getting the injunction, he entered into an undertaking with W. K. Thomas and M. S. Thomas as sureties, in which they undertook, "pursuant to the statute," to pay the defendants "Such damages, not exceeding two hundred dollars, as they may sustain by reason of the injunction, if the court shall finally decide that the plaintiff is not entitled thereto."

*232

*The creditors were numerous, and being represented, generally, by two law firms, filed separate answers making the same points, denying the right to partition, and some of them denying the right to homestead as against their debts which antedated the constitution. Hill's homestead was laid off January 2d, 1878, but was excepted to.

The case was first heard by Judge Hudson, who decided that Hill, the plaintiff, was not a joint tenant with his children, but had a life-estate with limitation over, refused the partition prayed for, but held that he was entitled to homestead, except as to debts which were older than the constitution—said homestead to end with his life-estate—and referring the matter of dates of the different debts to Joseph F. Gist, Esq., as referee; continued the existing injunction "until the further order of the court." On appeal this decree was affirmed (11 S. C. 346) and the life-interest of G. W. Hill in the land was sold in January, 1879, and the costs were taxed, the clerk giving full costs for all the answers to the amount of $295.50, for which execution was issued against him.

The referee, Gist, reported that the debts of S. M. Dawkins as executor, and of Glenn & Austin as executors, amounting to about $800, were older than the constitution, and the report coming up before Judge Wallace, April 23d, 1880, he confirmed it, authorizing the creditors above named to enforce their executions against the homestead, "vacated and set aside the injunction heretofore granted," and ordered "that it be referred to D. Johnson, Jr., to ascertain the damages sustained by the creditors by reason of the injunction granted January 8th, 1878," &c.

Under this order to assess the damages against the plaintiff, G. W. Hill, and his sureties, W. K. Thomas and M. S. Thomas, the creditors claimed that they should be allowed as damages: First. The interest on the sum realized from the sale of the land for one year (1878), $211.57. Second. The whole costs taxed in the case against G. W. Hill, $295.50. Third. All the counsel fees paid by the creditors in the defense of the case, $453.30, aggregating $880.37; and, in addition, the value of one year's use of the life-estate, not reduced to figures. The sureties on *the undertaking denied that they could be made liable at all, except by action at law on their undertaking and the verdict of a jury. But, if the form of proceeding by reference was legal, they denied that the creditors had been damaged by reason of the injunction; that they could not be charged with the costs or counsel fees incurred in the general case; and that, as to the delay in the sale of the land, which was the result of the injunction, the creditors were actually benefited by it, as in the meantime the lands appreciated in value.

†After remittitur issued to the Circuit Court of Union, the clerk of that court taxed the costs of this proceeding, allowing to the attorney for the creditors, Mr. Culp, the usual attorney's costs. Upon appeal to the Circuit Court from that taxation, it was held by Judge Kershaw, (June, 1883,) under the authority of Columbia Water Power Company v. Columbia, 4 S. C. 388, and Lawton v. Green, 64 N. Y. 326 and other cases, that this was a special proceeding, and that therefore the attorney was not entitled to costs.—REPORTER.

The referee disallowed the counsel fees but allowed the whole tax costs ($295.50) and the interest on the sum realized from the sale for one year ($211.57), in the aggregate $507.07. To this report both the creditors and the obligors on the undertaking excepted, and the case coming on before Judge Aldrich, he confirmed the report as to the tax costs ($295.50), but overruled it as to the interest ($211.57) and counsel fees ($453.30), disallowing the interest but allowing the tax costs and counsel fees, amounting to $748.80, but limiting his decree to $200, the amount of the undertaking, ordered "that the defendant creditors have judgment against the plaintiff, G. W. Hill, and his sureties, W. K. Thomas and Margaret S. Thomas, for the sum of two hundred dollars and for the costs of this proceeding, and that the said defendant creditors have leave to issue their execution therefor."

From this order the obligors on the undertaking appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor overruled all the exceptions of M. S. Thomas, W. K. Thomas and G. W. Hill to the report of the referee, except the second exception, which related to interest on the fund realized from the sale of G. W. Hill's land.

2. Because his Honor erred in confirming said report in so far as it allows as damages sustained by reason of the injunction the sum of two hundred and ninety-five dollars and fifty cents ($295.50), the whole of the taxed costs in the action in which the injunction was granted.

3. Because his Honor erred in allowing as such damages the counsel fees paid by the judgment creditors in said suit.

4. Because his Honor erred in not holding that only the costs *and counsel fees incurred in a motion to dissolve the temporary injunction are proper items of damages sustained by reason of the injunction, and not the costs and fees of the main suit.

5. Because his Honor should have held that the increase of twenty-five per centum in the value of G. W. Hill's land during the continuance of the injunction, as shown by the testimony before the referee, should be set off against or deducted from any damages assessed in favor of the judgment creditors.

6. Because his Honor erred in adjudging that G. W. Hill and his sureties on the injunction bond shall pay the whole amount for which said bond was given, to wit: two hundred dollars, in addition to the costs of proceedings to assess damages, two hundred dollars being the greatest amount for which said sureties can be held liable.

7. Because his Honor erred in ordering judgment for any amount at all, one of the said sureties, to wit: W. K. Thomas, not having been a party to the original action, and the proper course in regard to both the principal on said bond and his sureties being an action on said bond for the amount assessed.

We will not follow the exceptions, but endeavor to consider the questions as they arise in order; and first, Whether the damages could be ascertained by a mere reference, without regular suit at law upon the undertaking, making the obligors parties, and having the question of damages submitted to a jury? This was an equity suit, and although the undertaking sprung from the suit, it was in form a legal obligation. The general rule is, that all questions of damage should be referred to a jury.

We cannot recall a case under the practice of the old Court of Equity in which that court undertook by mere reference to ascertain damages upon an injunction bond against persons who were not parties to the principal action, in which the order was made. The case of Gadsden v. The Bank of Georgetown, 5 Rich. 337, was an action at law upon an injunction bond given in an equity suit, and so were the cases of Norris v. Williams, 8 Rich. 58; Aldrich v. Kirkland, Id. 351, and Fant v. Martin, 10 Rich. 428.

But section 243 of the code of civil procedure provides that, "when no provision is made by statute as to security upon an *injunction, the court or judge shall require a written undertaking on the part of the plaintiff, with or without sureties, to the effect that the plaintiff will pay to the party injured such damages, not exceeding an amount to be specified, as he may sustain by reason of the injunction, if the court shall finally decide that the plaintiff was not entitled thereto. The damages may be ascertained by a reference or otherwise, as the court shall direct," &c. Since the adoption of this provision, we have had no case involving the precise point; but the New York code has one precisely similar, and the practice there seems to be, that upon the dissolution of the injunction by order of court, a reference under the code to ascertain the damages follows as a matter of course. Voorhees Annotated Code (10th Ed.) 325.

But there is some conflict in the authorities as to how the amount so ascertained shall be enforced—by execution or order—and whether, upon the confirmation of the report, the judge may at once order the amount paid or the parties must resort to an action at law upon the undertaking. In the cases of Fitzpatrick v. Flagg, 12 Abb. 189, and of Patterson v. Bloomer, 37 How. Pr. 450, it was held that, in order to enforce the amount ascertained against the sureties it was necessary that an action should be brought on the undertaking. But it would seem that the most approved authorities there hold that another action is unnecessary, and that the judge may order the amount paid at once. If, as seems to be conceded, the ascertainment of the amount by the referee takes the place of a trial by jury, we do not see why another action on the undertaking should be necessary. The summary mode of enforcing it is in conformity with the familiar principle that the court of equity having jurisdiction, in order to prevent delays, expenses and circuity of action, will in certain circumstances provide for the assessment and payment of damages. Adams Equity 219.

It is true that this court has held in the case of Earle v. Cureton, 13 S. C. 19, that a judgment for costs entered against one who was surety for costs, without any proceeding against him to charge him upon his obligation, is wholly void; but that was where no proceeding of any kind had been taken against the surety. By signing the undertaking under the law as it now stands, in which the parties obligated themselves "pursuant to the statute," it may be considered that the surety waived a trial by jury in assessing damages, and that the summary proceeding by reference is somewhat analogous to that by which, under the old rule of court, the collection of costs was enforced against a surety whose obligation in terms acknowledged his liability, if the plaintiff failed to recover. It seems to us that there can be no great objection to the summary mode of enforcing the assessment found under reference, by order, without the delay and expense of another action; provided always that the surety is regularly notified, and thus made a party to the proceeding to assess the damages.

Second. Assuming, then, that the issue was made in a manner authorized by law, and that all the obligors were represented, was it error to exclude the counsel fees paid by the creditors as an element of damage done them by the injunction? There may be cases, as in Livingston v. Exum, ante p. 223, in which counsel fees for the single act of dissolving the injunction should be allowed; but we think, as a rule, the fees paid for general services in the case are not allowable. The charges made did not distinguish as to how much was for general services in defending the case, and how much was for dissolving the injunction; and we think the referee was right in excluding them. Without going fully into the subject, it is enough to say that this seems to be the settled doctrine not only of this State, but of the Supreme Court of the United States. Ferguson & Dangerfield v. Dehay, 2 McMull. 228; Jeter v. Glenn, 9 Rich. 374; Welch v. N. E. Railroad Co., 12 Rich. 290; Oelrichs v. Spain, 15 Wall. 211 [21 L. Ed. 43]; Sedgw. on Damages 99.

In our own case of Welch v. The Railroad, supra, which was an action on the case to recover damages for a trunk lost, Judge O'Neill said speaking of counsel fees: "Such an item has never been allowed in this State. It cannot be said to be a necessary result of the act done by or negligence of the defendant." And in the case from Wallace, the Supreme Court gives the rule, and also the reasons for it, thus: "In debt, covenant and assumpsit, damages are recovered, but counsel fees are never included. So, in equity cases where there is no injunction bond, only the taxable costs are allowed to the complainants. The same rule is applied to the defendant, however unjust the litigation on the other side, and however large the expensa litis to which he may have been subjected. There is no fixed standard by which the honorarium can be measured. Some counsel demand much more than others. Some clients are willing to pay more than others. More counsel may be employed than necessary. A reference to a master, or an issue to a jury might be necessary to ascertain the proper amount, and this grafted litigation might possibly be more animated and protracted than that in the original cause. It would be an office of some delicacy on the part of the court to scale down the charges, as might sometimes be necessary. We think the principle of disallowance rests on a solid foundation, and that the opposite rule is forbidden by the analogies of the law and sound public policy."

Third. As to the costs taxed in the case against the plaintiff, G. W. Hill. In considering this question here, we cannot correct any error which may have been made in the taxation of the costs against G. W. Hill. If any such error was made, it should have been corrected on appeal from the clerk's taxation. We think it by no means clear, however, that all the tax costs should be considered as damages sustained by the defendants by reason of the injunction. This was not an action exclusively for injunction, but to determine the rights of parties in reference to a tract of land, and the injunction was ancillary thereto. Hovey v. Rubber Tip Pencil Company, 50 N. Y. 335; Disbrow v. Garcia, 52 N. Y. 654. But, from the views which we take of another of the items of alleged damage, it is unnecessary to determine how much, if any, of the costs taxed against Hill, and not yet paid by any party, should be considered as damages sustained by the defendants by reason of the injunction.

Fourth. In regard to the other item claimed as damages, viz.: the interest on the sum realized from the sale of the land for one year, $211.57; that is to say, the interest lost on the purchase-money by receiving it when the injunction was dissolved, instead of a year sooner, when it was granted.

It appears to us that the loss of this interest by the delay in the sale of the land was the direct result of the injunction, and, *assuming that the court decided that the injunction should not have been granted, was correctly charged by the referee. In opposition to this view, it is argued that during this delay, lands in Union county, including these, appreciated in value twenty-five per cent., and, therefore, the defendants were not injured, but, as a matter of fact, were actually benefited by the delay. This fact is not conceded. There was evidence tending to show that the creditors would have given as much in 1868 as in 1869. But suppose the fact was as claimed, it could not alter the case. Such a change in the salable value of land must be merely conjectural, and, so far as these parties are concerned, purely accidental. We are obliged to assume that the land would have brought the same price when the sale was enjoined as it did afterwards when actually sold.

The amount of the undertaking, two hundred dollars, must limit the right of recovery, and as the interest on the purchase-money of the land for a year was more than that sum, the judgment of the Circuit Court should substantially be affirmed. But, whilst that is the limit of the right of recovery upon the part of the creditors, the obligors on the undertaking are liable, in addition, for the costs of the proceedings to ascertain and collect that sum. "In all recoveries upon warranties, where the law has prescribed the purchase-money and interest as the measure of damage, the tax costs of the eviction are added," Jeter v. Glenn, supra; and see [Furman v. Elmore] 2 N. & McC. 190, note.

With these explanations and qualifications, the judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, ordering the obligors of the undertaking to pay two hundred dollars and the costs of the proceeding to assess the same, be affirmed.

*240

Mr. Justice McIVER. On May 9th, 1877, R. J. McCarley obtained judgment against the defendant, John C. Mackorell, for the sum of $1,136.26, and, under the execution issued to enforce this judgment, the tract of land which is the subject-matter of the present action was levied on by the sheriff. Appraisers were appointed to set off the homestead of the judgment debtor, who certified that they valued the premises levied upon at the sum of $2,275, and that, in their judgment, the premises could not be divided so as to set off the homestead without injury to the remainder. The judgment debtor, John C. Mackorell, waived the sixty days' time allowed him by the act to pay the difference between the appraised value and the amount of the homestead exemption, and, accordingly, the premises were sold by the sheriff on September 3d, 1877, for the sum of $2,232.04 to R. J. McCarley, who complied with his bid by paying to the sheriff $1,000 and the costs, in cash, and receipting on his execution for the balance of his bid, whereupon the sheriff made titles to him in the usual form.

On October 25th, 1877, upon the application of John C. Mackorell, the court ordered "that the said sum of one thousand dollars be applied by the said sheriff to the purchase of a homestead for the said defendant, under the direction of the defendant, and that the defendant have leave to take title for the same in the name of his wife and in trust for the children of the said defendant." On December 17th, 1877, R. J. McCarley sold and conveyed to John C. Mackorell the premises in question for $2,200, receiving from the sheriff $1,000 in cash, and receipting to him for said sum, as the "amount of defendant's homestead invested by order of the court"; and, to secure the balance of the purchase-money, Mackorell gave to McCarley his bond as trustee for his wife and children, secured by a mortgage of the premises—the title having been made to Mackorell as trustee for his wife and children—the deed, bond and mortgage having been executed simultaneously.

This action is now brought by the plaintiff, who had been appointed receiver of the estate of R. J. McCarley, to foreclose said mortgage, and John C. Mackorell and his wife and children *are made parties defendant to the action. The Circuit judge held that the sum of $1,000, held by the sheriff, was a trust fund, and that it was a breach of trust to invest such fund in land which was to be encumbered by a mortgage to secure the credit portion of the purchase-money; that McCarley had notice of such breach of trust, and that the plaintiff, as receiver, was bound to the same extent that McCarley would be; and therefore, that the plaintiff is not entitled to receive any portion of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises until the said trust fund is replaced. He, therefore, rendered judgment for foreclosure, but provided in the order that the mortgaged premises should be withdrawn from sale unless they brought more than $1,000 and costs; and, if they brought more than that amount, then that the sum of $1,000 should be retained by the clerk, subject to the further order of the court, and that the plaintiff should only be entitled to so much of the excess over said sum of $1,000 and costs as might be necessary to pay the amount due him.

From this judgment the plaintiff appeals upon various grounds which, under the view we take of the case, need not be set out here. The substantial question made by the appeal, and the one upon which the case must turn, is as to the character of the fund of $1,000 in the hands of the sheriff, representing the homestead of the judgment debtor, John C. Mackorell. If that fund had been impressed with a trust before the purchase of the land from McCarley by Mackorell on December 17th, 1877, when the deed and bond and mortgage were contemporaneously executed, then upon the authority of Mathews v. Heyward, 2 S. C. 239, it was a breach of trust to invest the same in land to be encumbered with a mortgage to secure the payment of a portion of the purchase-money, and the mortgagee, McCarley, who must be regarded as having notice, took his mortgage subject to such trust, and cannot enforce it until provision is made for replacing such fund, and the plaintiff who stands in his shoes has no higher right than he has.

But if, on the other hand, such fund was not impressed with any trust until it was created by the deed contemporaneous with the mortgage, then the lien of the mortgage is not impaired by *the trust, and the plaintiff is entitled to his judgment of foreclosure in the usual form. Barrett v. Cochran, 8 S. C. 49; same case in 11 S. C. 35. For in that event, as is said in Barrett v. Cochran, where first reported, "The trust must be considered as created by the deed to Barrett [Mackorell], which must be construed together with the mortgage as contemporary acts. The burden on the trust estate was, under this view, created by the very act calling the trust into existence, and its imposition must be deemed consistent with the purposes of the trust."

*242

The practical question, therefore, in this case is, whether the fund of $1,000 had been impressed with any trust before the execution of the deed from McCarley to Mackorell. To determine this question it is necessary to ascertain what is the nature of the homestead right as created by the constitution and the laws passed in pursuance thereof. It is derived from section 20, article I., and section 32, article II. of the constitution, and is regulated by such acts of the general assembly as have been passed in conformity to these constitutional provisions. Looking to these sections we find nothing indicating a purpose to create or provide for any new kind of estate, as an estate of homestead, but the manifest purpose and declared object is simply to protect a certain amount of property from levy and sale, under mesne or final process; the language of the one section being: "A reasonable amount of property as a homestead, shall be exempted from seizure or sale for the payment of any debts or liabilities except for the payment of such obligations as are provided for in the constitution," while that of the other section, which goes more into detail as to the amount and character of the property to be exempted, and to the class of debts constituting the exceptions, is, that the property mentioned "Shall be exempt from attachment, levy or sale on any mesne or final process issued from any court."

The purpose then was not to create any new estate, or to invest estates already existing with any new qualities, or to subject them to any restrictions, but to secure a right of exemption by forbidding the use of the process of the court to sell certain property for the payment of debts. It is true that it has not been uncommon to find, even in acts of the legislature and *judicial opinions, the right of homestead spoken of as an estate, but such a characterization of the right of homestead is not warranted by anything contained in the fundamental law. Indeed it would be altogether beyond the competency of the legislature to divest one man of his estate and vest it in another, even though such other might be his wife or child; nor would it be competent for the legislature to change the character of the estate which the citizen has in his property without his consent, by declaring that in a certain event he shall hold such property in trust for his wife or child. As is said in Cooley on Const. Lim. 357, "There is no rule or principle known to our system under which private property can be taken from one person and transferred to another, for the private use and benefit of such other person, whether by general law or special enactment." And again, at page 530, "It is conceded on all hands, that the legislature has no power in any case to take the property of one individual and pass it over to another, without reference to some use to which it is to be applied for the public benefit." It is clear, therefore, that the right of homestead is not an estate, but a mere right of exemption by which the estate of a person recognized as already existing is protected from seizure and sale for the payment of debt. If, therefore, the legislature had undertaken to declare in express terms that the homestead should be held by the head of the family in trust for his wife and children, such legislation would have been clearly unconstitutional and void, and the head of the family would continue to hold the property constituting the homestead by the same right as before, and would have the power to use and dispose of it in the same way as he could of any other property which belongs to him absolutely, either by sale or mortgage. Homestead Association v. Enslow, 7 S. C. 1; Rosenberg v. Lewi, 7 S. C. 344.

It is true that in these cases the mortgages, the lien of which was held to be superior to the right of exemption claimed under the homestead laws, were executed before the homestead had been assigned or set off to the debtor, but it is difficult to conceive what difference that could make. The right would be the same after as well as before the assignment, the only effect of which would be to designate specifically what was before *unascertained—the metes and bounds of the land exempted. The laying off of the homestead could not possibly affect, or in any way change the nature of the estate which the debtor held in the property exempted; and even if the legislature had undertaken to declare, in the most explicit terms—as they have not—that after the homestead has been laid off, the debtor shall not have the power to sell or mortgage the property so laid off, or that he shall thereafter hold it in trust for his wife and children, or in any other way undertake to interfere with the owner's right of dominion, they would not have had the power so to do, as it would be an attempt to interfere with vested rights which, as Judge Cooley says, cannot be done under any rule or principle known to our system of law.

The legislature undoubtedly has the power, by virtue of its control over the remedies provided for the collection of debts, to prescribe the mode and manner in which the process of the courts may be used, and place limitations upon such use, provided they keep within the limits of the constitutional provision which forbids them passing a law impairing the obligation of a contract, but should they undertake to divest vested rights and declare that one man's property shall be transferred to another, or shall be held in trust for another, it would become a very different matter, and it would be impossible to see how such an exercise of legislative power could be vindicated. So, too, the legislature, by virtue of their power to prescribe the laws of descent and inheritance, may declare what disposition shall be made of a person's estate after his death, and, in so doing, may declare that the property exempted under the homestead laws shall vest in his wife for life, or his wife and minor children, or make any other provision they see fit as to the disposition to be made of such property, but that is a very different thing from requiring a person while living to make any particular disposition of his property, or any part thereof, without his consent.

When, therefore, the fund of $1,000, which had been exempted from liability for the debts of John C. Mackorell, by virtue of the homestead provisions, went into the hands of the sheriff, it went there as Mackorell's property, to which he had the same right as he had before the sheriff's sale. He had the *right, therefore, to use and dispose of it as he pleased. He might, by a declaration of trust in writing, impress upon it any trust that he might see fit to create, or he might invest it in land and take the conveyance to himself, or to another upon such trusts as he chose to impress upon it, but, until he did so, the fund remained his own absolutely, to do with as he pleased.

The inquiry then presents itself: Did John C. Mackorell impress any trust whatever upon this fund before he invested it in the land and took the title in which the trust was created contemporaneously with the lien of the mortgage. There is certainly no evidence that he executed any declaration of trust in writing, signed by him, which is required by chapter XCIII., § 5, p. 466, Gen. Stat. of 1872, which was the law in force at the time these transactions occurred, by which the rights of the parties were fixed, and is yet the law, (Gen. Stat. of 1882, § 1961,) if this fund is to be regarded in equity as land, as was contended for with much force by respondent's counsel. But even if a writing is not necessary, where is the evidence that Mackorell, in any way, imparted a trust character to this fund before investing it in the land covered by the mortgage sought to be foreclosed by these proceedings.

The order of the court, which, indeed, was wholly unnecessary, is not such a dedication of the fund as would impart to it a trust character, for, even if the court had undertaken, in express terms, to impress a trust upon the fund, it would have had no power to do so without the consent of Mackorell. But the court did not even attempt to do anything of the kind. The very terms of the order, which has hereinbefore been set out, show that the court recognized the right of Mackorell (referred to in the order as "the defendant") to the fund, for the sheriff was directed to apply the money to the purchase of a homestead "for the defendant and under his directions," and that the defendant should "have leave to take title"—not that he should take title—"in the name of his wife and in trust for his children." It is plain that the order of the court not only could not impress any trust upon the fund, but that it did not even purport so to do.

Even if the application for this order by

Mackorell should be regarded as an indication of his intention to impress a trust upon the fund, that would not be sufficient, for entertaining and even expressing an intention to do a thing and actually doing it are two very distinct and different matters, attended by wholly different consequences. Indeed, as matter of fact, the intention of Mackorell, as indicated by the order, was never carried into effect, for the leave given was to take title "in the name of his wife and in trust for the children of the said defendant," while the act done by Mackorell was to take title in his own name in trust for his wife and children; and this illustrates the difference between a mere intention and an act.

Again, if a trust was created on the day the order was passed, what were the terms of such trust? Would it be possible for any one to say? Was the property to be held in trust for the sole and separate use of the wife during her life, and after her death for the children? Or was it to be held in trust for the wife and children jointly? Or what were the terms of the trust? It must be manifest that no trust was then created. Nor can it be said that the trusts declared by the deed must be connected with the direction given in the order, so as to make the latter the mere formal execution of the purpose declared in the order for, as we have seen, the title was not taken as contemplated by the order.

But, suppose it is regarded as being a substantial compliance with the terms of the order, then how can it be said that the investment of trust funds, under the order of the court, was a breach of trust? We are unable to see how the fund of $1,000, in the hands of the sheriff, can be regarded as having been impressed with any trust until such trust was created by the deed from McCarley to Mackorell, which must be construed with the mortgage as contemporaneous acts. The encumbrance, having been created by the same act which brought the trust into existence, it must be deemed consistent with the purposes of the trust, (Barrett v. Cochran, supra,) and hence the plaintiff is entitled to have his mortgage debt paid before any portion of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises can be reserved to meet the purposes of the trust.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the *Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry into effect the views herein announced.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred and Mr. Justice MCGOWAN dissented.

19 S. C. 247
TRIMMIER v. THOMSON.
(November Term, 1882.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⚡453.]

Executors sued upon the debt of their testator plead, inter alia, plene administravit, and verdict was rendered for the plaintiff generally. Judgment and execution were entered against the executors for the amount so found, "to be levied of the goods, &c., of testator in the hands of defendants to be administered, or which may hereafter come into their hands to be administered." After second action brought to recover this debt from the executors, individually, they made a motion to set aside the former judgment, or to make the same conform to the verdict and the facts proven, alleging by affidavit that no evidence was taken on the plea of plene administravit, and that the case was heard solely on the question of testator's indebtedness. Held, that the judgment was responsive to the issues involved and to the verdict, and could not be disturbed except as to the words, "or which may hereafter come, &c." which were unauthorized and mere surplusage.

[2. Judgment ⚡287.]

A judgment record, which is responsive to the issues necessarily involved, cannot be contradicted by proof of what was or was not tried.

A judgment generally against executors who do not plead plene administravit, is conclusive evidence of assets then in hand, in a second action of debt suggesting a devastavit; a fortiori, where such plea has been interposed and not found by the verdict.

An action against defendants to recover a debt established by a former judgment against them as executors, and alleging a devastavit, instituted within a year after the termination of the former action, is not barred by the statute of limitations.

Before Fraser, J., Spartanburg, July, 1881. This was an action by F. M. Trimmer, administrator cum testamento annexo of Peyton Simmons, against H. H. Thomson and J. S. R. Thomson, and also a motion by defendants in a former action of the same plaintiff against the same defendants, *as executors of H. H. Thomson, deceased. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

Messrs. Duncan & Cleveland, for appellants.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. It will simplify the many points made in these cases to make a short statement of facts. The first case named in the title was brought on a judgment previously obtained against the defendants as the surviving executors of H. H. Thomson, deceased, suggesting a devastavit by the executors. It appeared that in 1858 H. H. Thomson, Sr., died, leaving a handsome estate, which he disposed of by will, of which Mildred E. Thomson, Joseph W. Thomson, H. H. Thomson, Jr., and J. S. R. Thomson were named as executors; the two latter were minors at the time, and did not qualify until afterwards. At the beginning only the first two qualified, and, in administering the estate, paid the debts (except the one in controversy here), assented to legacies, and, to a large extent, settled the estate. They published no notice for creditors to present their demands, but had actual notice of the annuity debt to Simmons (of which, more hereafter), and had paid annually the amounts falling due on it—certainly until 1863—when the present defendants qualified.

In 1867, Peyton Simmons, to whom the debt above mentioned was payable, sued all the executors, including the present defendants. This debt of the testator had, as stated, been recognized certainly by the executors who first qualified, but no provision had been made for it, and they resisted the action, pleading that the bond had been given for slaves, who were emancipated, but not pleading plene administravit. In this suit payments were claimed to have been made on the Simmons debt, after the present defendants qualified. This suit abated by the death of Simmons in 1871, who left the claim to his wife by his will.

In 1873, F. M. Trimmer bought the bond, took out letters of administration, with the will annexed, on the estate of Simmons, and brought another action against the present defendants as surviving executors (those first qualified having died in 1868). In this action the defendant executors admitted the cause of action against their testator, and set up as defenses failure of consideration and counter-claim, and pleaded plene administravit. The case was stoutly resisted and submitted to a jury, which found a general verdict for the amount of the debt ($3,000) against the defendants. Upon this verdict judgment and execution were regularly entered by order, "to be levied and collected of the goods and chattles, rights and credits, lands and tenements of said H. H. Thomson, deceased, in the hands of said defendants to be administered, or which may hereafter come into their hands to be administered," together with costs, &c. An appeal from this judgment was taken, in which no objection was made to its form, and the Supreme Court affirmed it. 10 S. C. 164.

In 1879, the execution having been returned nulla bona, the plaintiff commenced this action against the executors, suggesting a devastavit. The executors answered, denying that they had assets of the testator in their hands at the time of the rendition of the former judgment, or since, or had committed any devastavit, pleading the statute of limitations, and setting up as a bar to recovery the long possession of the legatees and devisees under the will.

Pending this action, (October, 1880,) the defendants made a motion for an order setting aside the former judgment on which the action was brought, "or making the same conform to the verdict and the facts proved," &c. Along with this motion were filed affidavits of the defendants, and their lawyers in the former case, stating that no evidence was offered "on the plea of plene administravit, and the case was heard solely on the question as to whether defendants' testator owed the debt; that conforming to what was considered the usage of the bar and the understanding in the matter, no issue was made on the question as to indebtedness of defendants to the estate of their testator." Counter statement was made "that before the trial of the case, at the suggestion of J. S. R. Thomson (one of the counsel for defendants), plaintiff consented that defendants need not file *copies of the inventory returns, &c., as required by the rule, but that the original might be used, instead of said copies. That this was the only agreement made by deponent, or to his knowledge," &c. This constitutes the case second above stated.

The whole matter was referred to John E. Bomar, Esq., as referee, to take the testimony and state the same with his conclusions of fact. He did take the testimony, and made a very long and carefully prepared report, stating the complicated condition of the property in the hands of the legatees and devisees, and closing his report with the following conclusion of fact: "That neither of the defendants had assets in their hands at the rendition of judgment in favor of plaintiff, or have had since that time, except the sum of $350, received by the defendant, H. H. Thomson, Jr., on account of rent of the residuary real estate, and paid to his sisters, Mrs. Scaife and Mrs. Nowell, in 1878, and a bond of Jesse Cooper, given to their testator to indemnify him against the aforesaid claim of Peyton Simmons, which was put in suit promptly upon the dismissal of the appeal."

The cases were submitted to Judge Fraser, on written arguments, who refused to set aside or materially modify the judgment on the motion, and held that it was too late for the defendants now to show that, at the time the former judgment was rendered, they had no assets of their testator; and if it was not too late to make such question, that they had failed to show that they were not liable for the judgment debt of plaintiff, and therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff to the amount of his debt, interest and costs, with leave to issue execution for the same. The defendants appeal to this court upon various grounds, contained in twenty-eight exceptions, but, from the view which this court takes, it is unnecessary to state them at length here. They are in the "Case."

First. As to the motion to set aside the former judgment, or make it conform to the facts proved. For several reasons this can not be considered as an application, under section 195 of the code, to set aside the judgment taken against the defendants through their "mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect." It is, in terms, a motion to make the judgment conform to the facts proved, which cannot be done. It is not clearly *perceived what change is desired. No particular form of judgment is proposed, and we cannot conceive what form could be given to it so as precisely to meet the view suggested. It could not be made a judgment against the testator alone, for he is dead, and his executors are before the court. It could not be made a judgment against the executors individually, for that is the very thing that is denied. It could not be a judgment for the plaintiff on the question of debt, and for the defendants as to assets, or, as it is called, quando acciderint, for the claim is that that question was not considered. It could hardly be proposed that the judgment should be for the plaintiff on the question of debt, with a statement that the question of assets was left undecided. Such seems to be the object of the motion.

But uncertainty is not the main difficulty. The judgment, as entered, was substantially right, because in conformity with the verdict. Under the rules of pleading applicable to cases where executors are sued, only one of three verdicts is possible: either for the defendant generally, for the plaintiff quando acciderint, or for the plaintiff generally. The latter was rendered here, and the only judgment that could have been entered was the one which was entered de bonis testatoris, &c. A judgment must be entered in conformity to the verdict, speaking from the record and the issues in the case, and it is not admissible to contradict the record and make a new verdict by showing what was or what was not actually proved. A verdict is the result of a trial, and if regular and free from impropriety, cannot in turn be subjected to trial, except by appeal. In considering the form of a judgment to be entered on it, we cannot hear what was or what was not proved, but what should have been proved—what, under the issues in the case, must be taken to have been proved, whether, as matter of fact, it was so proved or not. If the court could, at any subsequent time, change a judgment so as to make it conform to what might appear to have been proved or omitted at the trial, without regard to the verdict rendered, there never would be an end of litigation, but each successive struggle would be directed to the point that the judgment immediately preceding had not been entered according to the actual proof made.

*There is no doubt that the court has the power in a proper case, as in Carroll v. Tompkins, 14 S. C. 223, to correct a mistake or clerical error in its own process in order to make it conform to the record; but that does not authorize an alteration which would contradict the record and change the whole scope and effect of the judgment. The judgment here was in conformity to the verdict. It was regularly entered by order in 1877. It was appealed from, but no exception taken as to its form, and it was expressly affirmed by this court. We agree with the Circuit judge that the motion to change its form could not be granted; but we may say that in considering the effect of the judgment, it will be taken to be in form, such as should have been entered on the verdict, that is to say, a judgment de bonis testatoris vel si non de bonis propriis as to costs. The verdict which alone must govern, did not authorize the additional words "or which may hereafter come into their hands to be administered," and they will be disregarded as surplusage. Such phrase could only be inserted properly on a verdict quando acciderint, which was not rendered by the jury, and it is not competent to show that it was the understanding of the parties that such should be considered the import of the verdict.

"When the defendant in the previous recovery had neglected to plead plene administravit, a motion to open the judgment and for leave to file the plea, on an affidavit of instructions to the attorney in the former suit, was refused on the trial of the action of devastavit on the judgment." Caldwell v. Micheau, 1 Speers 276. In delivering the judgment of the court, Judge Wardlaw said: "This court is satisfied that the motion to set aside or open the former judgment was properly refused. There could be no end to litigation, if the judgment in such circumstances should be liable to disturbance."

Second. As to the force and effect that should be given to the first judgment against the executors upon the question of assets.

We think it must be regarded as settled in this State, that a general judgment against an executor who does not plead plene administravit or praeter, is conclusive evidence of assets in a second action of debt suggesting a devastavit; the only qualification being that a matter arising subsequent to the former action, *showing a destruction of the assets or removal of them from the hands of the executor without his fault, may be set up. Ford v. Rouse, Rice 220; Young v. Kennedy, 2 McMull. 81; Caldwell v. Micheau, 1 Speers 276; Lowndes v. Pinckney, 2 Strobb. Eq. 44; Ewing's Ex. v. Peters, 3 T. R. 685; 2 Wms. Ex. 1201, 1225; Stark. Evid. 562.

As we understand it, this proceeds on the ground that the action being against the executor for a debt of the testator, has embraced in it two distinct allegations, both of which are necessary to his recovery: first, that the testator owed the debt; and second, that the executor has assets to pay it, whether this latter is or is not expressly alleged in the complaint. The executor has the right to resist both allegations. He may plead plene administravit, indeed must do so, at the peril of having it concluded against him by default or confession that he has assets.

This conclusion rests upon the doctrine of that kind of estoppel known as res adjudicata; that a party having the opportunity in an action to make a defense and does not do so, is precluded from doing so afterwards. Maxwell v. Connor, 1 Hill Eq. 22. It seems to us that the doctrine of res adjudicata should apply with increased force, when the plea of plene administravit is put in, and there is notwithstanding a general verdict for the plaintiff. In such case it would seem to be the irresistible conclusion that the defense was made and failed.

But to this view it is earnestly replied, that nothing can be properly held to be adjudged which was never considered, and that in the former action, as a matter of fact, no evidence was offered or considered upon the question of assets, but by the agreement and stipulations of counsel it was intentionally omitted. The statements do not agree as to the alleged stipulations, but if they did we cannot listen to affidavits as to what was or was not agreed to be tried. The case furnishes a good illustration of the rule which forbids the court to consider stipulations not in writing. Besides we can only look to the record, which shows that plene administravit was put in, and that there was a general verdict for the plaintiff. The issue was an entirety and indivisible by agreement. Wells Res Adjud. §§ 228, 248. We need not inquire whether the onus of proof was on the *plaintiff or defendants on the question of assets. We incline to think that the plea was a mere matter of defense, but in either case, whether new matter to be proved or mere matter of defense, the result would be the same; that having an opportunity to make the defense, indeed being bound to make it at their peril, they put in the proper pleas, and there was a general verdict against them, either from failure to offer proof or from insufficient proof.

This court has lately, in the case of Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 42, attempted to define the doctrine of res adjudicata as follows:

"It seems to be now settled that, though the proceeding is in another jurisdiction, the judgment will be conclusive provided the court had jurisdiction and the judgment was directly on the point. * * * It is claimed, however, as a sequence of this rule, that the defense of res adjudicata extends to every question which could have been made, whether it was considered or not. There are cases which seem to go to that extent, but we think the decided preponderance of authority sustains the more reasonable doctrine. 'That a judgment is not, technically, conclusive of any matter, if the matter is not such that it had, of necessity, to be determined before the judgment could have been given; that it was not merely collateral nor to be inferred by argument from the judgment.' 6 Wait Ac. & Def. 785, citing Hunter v. Davis, 19 Geo. 413, and other cases. Or, in the language of Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States: 'The rule is, that when a former judgment is relied on it must appear from the record that the point in controversy was necessarily decided in the former suit, or be made to appear by extrinsic proof that it was in fact decided.'"

Let us apply this rule here. Does it appear from the record that the point in controversy was necessarily decided in the former suit? If so, then parol proof upon the subject is inadmissible to contradict the record. It is very true that there are cases in which parol proof was admitted to show that the point was actually considered or not considered, but never when the record shows that the point was necessarily involved. Otherwise records would stand for nothing, and everything would be set afloat. The point here is, as to whether there were assets in *the hands of the executors at the time the first judgment was rendered. Was that precise point (disregarding alleged stipulations) necessarily involved and decided in the former suit? The plaintiff sued the executors for a debt of their testator. The executors denied that the testator owed the debt, or, if so, that they had assets to pay it. Upon this record appears a general verdict for the plaintiff, upon which judgment and execution were issued. We cannot resist the conclusion that both points made were directly involved, and that the verdict necessarily decided both.

It is admitted that such would have been the import of the verdict if the plea of plene administravit had not been filed at all, and how can its import be less when the verdict was rendered notwithstanding the plea? The defendants had an opportunity to make the defense, and either made it and failed, or, what is the same thing, omitted to make it. If no assets had been shown the verdict would have been clean for the defendants, unless the plaintiff had chosen to take a verdict quando acciderint. If the executors at that time could have made the proof that they had in hand no assets of their testator, and that the estate had been distributed before the executors or some of them had notice of the claim on the Simmons bond, it was a fatal mistake not to have made that proof at that time, when they had an opportunity to do so.

According to this view, the former judgment was conclusive evidence of assets in the hands of the executors at that time, and this, with the return of nulla bona on the execution, makes it unnecessary to consider the many other minor questions made in the case. We do not see how the statute of limitations can apply. The debt, having gone into judgment against the estate of the testator, must be paid. It may be matter of regret that it cannot fall equally upon all those who are enjoying the property of the testator, in common with those who happen to be executors; but the fault was in undertaking to assent to legacies and devise and distribute the estate before the debts were paid or even ascertained. Creditors are required by law to look for payment to executors, whose first duty is to ascertain and provide for their payment, and, therefore, the burden of this debt must, at least in the first instance, fall upon the executors.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

A petition was filed in this case for a rehearing of so much of the foregoing opinion, or rather of the judgment of the court, as affirmed the judgment of the Circuit Court, entered by the clerk, under Judge Fraser's decree, in which Circuit judgment costs of the first case—Trimmier v. Thomson's Executors—were taxed against the executors individually. The matter here complained of was the ground of one of the exceptions upon which the appeal was taken.

May 20th, 1883. The following order was passed:

PER CURIAM. We have carefully considered this petition for a rehearing of the case, so far as regards the costs of the first case against the executors of H. H. Thomson, deceased, viz.: $156.50, which, it seems, the clerk of the court, in taxing the costs of the second case against the same parties for a dévastavit, added to the proper costs of that case—making the judgment against the defendants, individually, amount to the sum of $4,000 and $304.35 costs. (This latter item including the tax costs of the first case—$156.50.)

As to the costs of the first case, no complaint is made against the decision of Judge Fraser, who ordered that "The plaintiff should have judgment against the defendants for the sum of $3,000, with interest from April 6th, 1877; and for costs, with leave to issue execution for the same." The judgment of this court was intended simply to affirm the judgment of Judge Fraser, which, as we understand, only adjudged that the defendants should pay the costs proper in the second case for a devastavit, in which he was then announcing judgment. No other matter was properly before us on appeal. This being the case, we do not see that it is necessary or proper that the point as to the costs in the first case should be re-argued in this court, which has made no order upon the subject. We see no authority, either in the decision of Judge Fraser or the judgment of this court, *for adding into the last judgment against the defendants, individually, the tax costs in the first case. These costs are not properly taxable in the last case for devastavit, and they must stand as they were left at the termination of the first case, which was appealed to this court and affirmed. By whom they are to be paid, and in what character—whether individually or out of the assets of the estate—must be ruled by some proper authority before this court can have a right to consider the subject.

The motion for a rehearing is refused.

April 20th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for the double purpose of recovering the balance due upon a note of both the defendants and to foreclose a mortgage upon a tract of land, executed by R. Elliott, the principal in the note, to secure the same debt. The note was in the following terms:

"$703.80.—Twelve months after date we or either of us promise to pay P. M. Plyler, or bearer, Seven Hundred and Three Dollars and eighty cents, for value received of him. Witness our hands and seals, this December 23d, 1874.

Bearing interest at 15 per cent.†

R. Elliott, [L. S.]

C. A. Plyler, [L. S.]"

The mortgage was executed by Elliott at the same time. Two hundred dollars had †These words, "Bearing interest at 15 per cent.," were added by the payee after the execution of the note, and when the note was produced at the trial had been erased. The erasure was made, the plaintiff testified, "with a knife a short time before the suit was commenced."—REPORTER.

been paid on the note January 24th, 1878, and $30 on January 25th, 1879, leaving due the balance of $583.41, for which the plaintiff prayed judgment and foreclosure of the mortgage. The defendants answered, alleging that after the making and issue of said note, upon which said mortgage as security is based, and before this action, the said note was materially altered by the said plaintiff without the consent of the defendants, by adding the words, "bearing interest at 15 per cent.," wherefore they demand judgment. On June 16th, 1881, Judge Aldrich ordered an issue upon the following points:

1. "Were the words, 'bearing interest at 15 per cent.,' added to the note described in the complaint, by the plaintiff, or with his knowledge and consent, as alleged in the answer?"

*2. "If yea, was the same done with a view to alter the terms of the note and with intent to defraud the defendants?"

3. "Have the defendants, or either of them, made any payments on the said note after notice of such alleged change? and have they, or either of them, ratified such change by word or deed?"

4. "What rate of interest was agreed to be paid on the money secured by the note, at the time the note was given? and what interest, if any, have the defendants at any time agreed to pay?"

At the October Term of the court for 1881, Judge Pressley made an order, giving the plaintiff leave to amend his complaint by adding the common counts for money loaned, &c., and mortgage given, which was done. On October 5th, 1881, the defendants answered the amended complaint, alleging that any indebtedness which may have existed on the day the note was given "was extinguished by the acceptance of the sealed note, which, since its execution, had been materially altered without the consent of the defendants, by inserting therein and adding thereto the words, 'bearing interest at 15 per cent.,'" &c. To this answer the plaintiff demurred upon the grounds: 1. That it did not state that the alleged alteration was made with fraudulent intent or added to the liability of the defendants. 2. That it did not state that the alleged alteration was made by the plaintiff, or with his knowledge and consent, &c. 3. That it did not charge that the alleged alteration rendered the sealed note void. The judge overruled the demurrer upon the ground that all supposed defects in the answer were cured by the order directing the issues aforesaid, which had been heard and decided before the demurrer was filed.

The jury found against the plaintiff on all the issues, and Judge Pressley decided as follows: "The question of the alleged alteration of the note by adding thereto, after its execution, the words, 'bearing interest at 15 per cent.,' was referred to a jury by Judge Aldrich, and on trial before me the verdict was that said note had been so changed. On subsequent hearing before me I sustain the verdict and adjudge that the said alteration materially changed the said note, with intent to make defendants liable for more interest than was borne by the original note.

That addition was *erased by plaintiff before the commencement of this suit, and he claimed herein only the balance of principal and interest, which would have been his right if the note had never been changed. My decision is, that the change of said note was such as entirely to destroy its validity, which could not be restored by the subsequent erasure.

"I also regard it as settled that the taking of a sealed note, with or without security, for a debt due only on account or simple contract, merges the debt into the note; and if that be rendered invalid by act of the holder, he cannot maintain suit on the previous debt or consideration of the note.

"The difficult question is, whether the mortgage executed on the same day with the note can be so separated from it as to stand valid of itself and prevent the merger of the original consideration into the note. In Gillett v. Powell, Speers Eq. 142, a mortgage and bond were executed for the same debt, but did not refer to each other as forming together one security. The bond was rendered invalid by alteration by the holder, and it was decided that the mortgage was a separate security for the debt, and would keep it alive as a valid claim, though the bond was made invalid by alteration. The difference in this case is, that the mortgage in its condition expressly refers to the note; also, the consideration stated in the mortgage is the exact amount of the note, and is not the amount of the debt as it stood before the note was made. That was only $612, which was increased to $703.80 by adding the interest for twelve months at 15 per cent. But, under the law then existing, that rate of interest could only be maintained by contract in writing, and in this case the note was the only such contract. It is, therefore, plain that the sum of $703.80, stated as the consideration in the mortgage, had reference to that amount provided for by the note. It is, therefore, adjudged that the plaintiff cannot maintain his action, either upon the said note or mortgage, and his complaint is dismissed with costs."

The plaintiff appealed, both from the order overruling the demurrer (but the exceptions on this subject need not be set out), and from the decree, on the following grounds:

1. "That the Circuit judge erred in holding that the writing *at the bottom of the note, these words, viz.: 'Bearing interest at 15 per cent.,' was a material alteration of the note.

2. "That he erred in not finding, as a matter of fact, from the position of these words, their beginning with a capital letter, the absence of any specific amount and of any point of time from which to run, from all the testimony in the case, and, especially, from the explanation of plaintiff himself, that the plaintiff had simply added these words to remind him at what rate of interest he had loaned his money, and what rate of interest the interest-bearing demand in the note was bearing the first year.

3. "That he erred in finding that plaintiff, by adding the said words at the bottom of the note, intended to make defendants liable for more interest than the note originally bore, when there was no evidence to show such intention, and the added words themselves do not bear such interpretation.

4. "That he erred after the issues of fact had been referred to a jury, in charging the jury on the facts of the case, and suggesting further, that there was fraud in the transaction because the words were written below on a crease of the paper where it was difficult to write.

5. "That he erred in failing to find that the defendants, after the words were so added, had promised to pay the debt, thus ratifying the same and waiving the supposed irregularity.

6. "That he erred therein in assuming that the sealed note, referred to in the answer as being altered, was the debt itself; whereas, the same was only one evidence of the debt, and the mortgage might, in the light of equity and good conscience, be considered another distinct evidence of the same debt as well as a lien for the payment of the same.

7. "That he erred therein in concluding that the mortgage could not be so separated from the said sealed note, as signed by both defendants, as to stand valid of itself and to prevent the merger of the original consideration into the said note.

8. "In that he therein failed to recognize that the said sealed note was one security for the payment of the debt, or original consideration, and that the mortgage was another security for the same purpose, and, being of a higher grade, might stand without said sealed note.

*9. "That he erred in concluding that the consideration of the debt had merged into that particular sealed note, and that the alleged alteration in said note had entirely destroyed the mortgage as well as the said note.

10. "That he erred in failing to recognize the fact that the said sealed note was a separate contract between the plaintiff and both the defendants, whilst the mortgage was another separate and distinct contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant Elliott, alone, and not affecting the defendant Plyler.

11. "That he erred in overlooking the fact that the mortgage does not refer to any note at all for its consideration; and that it refers in its condition clause to Elliott's promissory note of same date, and not to the sealed note in question at all.

12. "Because the money due by Elliott to plaintiff on account, for loaned money, to wit: Six hundred and twelve dollars, before sealed note was given, was a sufficient consideration for the mortgage.

13. "Because the promissory note of defendant Elliott, referred to in the condition clause of the mortgage, was a sufficient consideration without the sealed note of both defendants for the mortgage; no objection being made to the proof of the mortgage without the production of the promissory note therein referred to on the trial, and the judge erred in not enforcing the lien of the mortgage."

There is no doubt that in the beginning the debt to the plaintiff was upon a valuable consideration, money due before and then borrowed, with interest for a year included, making the amount of $703.80; and both the note and mortgage, with seals and of equal dignity, were legal and binding and remained so for two or three years—certainly down to the time when the alteration was made in the note. Although the note when sued had been restored to its original form and no actual injury had resulted to the defendants by the alleged alteration, we must consider it as established by the verdict of the jury, and the approval of the Circuit judge, that at one time before action brought there was an addition to or memorandum on the note of the words about interest, which were afterwards erased. Assuming the correctness of this finding, we agree with the Circuit *judge, that it is well settled that "any material alteration of a written security in a material part renders it void." Vaughan v. Fowler, 14 S. C. 356 [37 Am. Rep. 731]. In the language of Mr. Greenleaf, (volume I., section 565,) "written instruments which are altered, in the legal sense of that term, are thereby made void."

The note and the mortgage—both securities under seal—one or both—absorbed the simple obligation for the money due, and thereby destroyed the right to sue upon an indebitatus assumpsit. The plaintiff is not at liberty to say, "I have made two contracts, and if one of them is made void for fraud, I will set up the other." Mills v. Starr, 2 Bail. 360; McCorkle v. Doby, 1 Strobb. 399 [47 Am. Dec. 560]. So that the judge was right in dismissing the complaint as to C. A. Plyler, who seems not to have received any of the consideration or to have had any connection with the transaction, except as a surety for Elliott, the principal debtor on the note.

But considering the note as not recoverable either against the principal debtor or his surety on it, the more difficult question still remains, whether the plaintiff can enforce the mortgage, which was not altered, against the principal debtor for the balance of his debt as a separate security unaffected by the alleged alteration of the note. This court has recently held in the case of Nichols v. Briggs, 18 S. C. 484, that when a note and mortgage are both given to secure the same debt, the mortgage may be enforced although the note was barred by the statute of limitations. That case went on the ground that the debt itself is something different from either the note or mortgage, which are both mere securities for and evidences of the debt, and as a consequence the loss of the right to enforce one does not necessarily take away the right to enforce the other. The courts say: "It must be kept in mind that there is a difference between the debt itself and the securities for it. The debt is one, but there may be a number of securities of different kinds, personal, real, pledge, mortgage, &c. The note given is only evidence of the debt and one of the means of collecting it, and if there is a mortgage, that is only another security for the same debt. * * * The bond undoubtedly is the most common assurance, and for this reason possibly it may be regarded as the primary security and a mortgage as cumulative, *but in no proper sense can the mortgage be regarded as a security merely for the bond, which, being only the evidence of the debt, may be displaced by substitutes or lost or destroyed, leaving the mortgage as a subsisting security for the debt in a new form. Gibbes v. R. R. Company, 13 S. C. 253, and authorities. 'A mortgage being given as a security for a debt, the general rule is that no mere change in the mode or time of payment, nothing short of an actual payment of the debt or an express release, will operate as a discharge of the mortgage. The lien lasts as long as the debt.' 1 Hill. Mort., § 3."

This decision and the principle announced must dispose of this case, unless, in respect to its effect upon the debt itself, there is an essential difference between the case of a note barred by the statute and that of one made void by alteration. In the case of the statutory bar we know that only the remedy is taken away. The inquiry then is, what is the effect of avoiding, by the act of the plaintiff himself, a note given as one of the securities for a debt to him? Does it simply take from him all remedy upon that security, or does it in its effects reach further and touch and taint the debt itself? If the latter, then all the securities of course fall with the debt, as it is well established that payment or anything else that reaches to the debt itself and discharges it, ipso facto discharges all the securities of every kind. We have not been able to find any case upon the precise point except that of Gillett v. Powell, Speers Eq. 144, cited and commented on in the Circuit decree. That case is referred to by Mr. Herman in his work on Mortgages (section 293) in the following words: "A mortgage being a mere security, is an evidence of debt, being an instrument the purpose of which is to secure a debt. No other written evidence of the debt than that furnished by the instrument itself is necessary to sustain a mortgage. Thus where a bond secured by mortgage containing no allusion to the bond, was fraudulently altered and rendered void, the mortgage was held valid, and that it was evidence of the debt. Gillett v. Powell, Speers Eq. 142."

We are unable to discover any principle upon which we can distinguish this case from that of Gillett v. Powell. In that case, one James Higginbottom purchased property at an administrator's sale to the amount of $2,337.75, and gave his bond for the same, and on the same day executed a mortgage of the property purchased to the same person to whom he gave the bond, and for identically the same amount. The mortgage made no reference in express terms to the bond, but there cannot possibly be a doubt that it was given to secure the same debt for which the bond was given. When the bond was produced in court it was discovered that it had been altered. The court held that, although the alteration in the bond rendered it void, yet that did not affect the mortgage, which must be taken to be the evidence of the debt, and recoverable. In delivering the judgment of the court, Chancellor Harper said: "But I am of opinion that the alteration of the bond does not affect the mortgage, and that it must be taken as the evidence of the debt. If the mortgage alone had been taken, there can be no doubt but that it would have constituted a specialty debt. * * * If he had taken a single bill and a bond with a penalty, or a bond with and one without security, though there might have been an equity to restrain the enforcement of both, I do not see how the alteration of one could vitiate the other."

It is stated that the mortgage, in Gillett v. Powell, made no allusion to the bond, and it is insisted that in this case the mortgage does mention the note, and that makes the difference. It will be observed that the mortgage in the case before us does not, in the conveying part, make the least reference to any note, but directly to the debt itself, as follows: "That the said Richard Elliott, in consideration of the sum of seven hundred and three dollars and eighty cents, lawful money of the United States, to him in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have granted, bargained, conveyed," &c., &c. This was a distinct and independent acknowledgment of the debt under seal, and a deed of land to secure this amount of money.

We do not take the view that this amount of money, including the fifteen per cent. interest for one year, had to be first fixed by the note—"provided for by the note"—and then transferred to the mortgage. Neither the note nor the mortgage, as they stood originally, mentioned the fifteen per cent. interest for a *year, and the consolidated amount, including the interest for one year, could be as well "provided for" in writing by the mortgage as by the note, and, as matter of fact, was so "provided for." The note was "not the only contract" in writing covering and making legal the fifteen per cent. It was embraced in the mortgage as well as in the note. The mortgage was a security at least as high and original in its character as the sealed note, and as capable of containing the original agreement, which it did. The mortgage would have been good and recoverable for the amount of money distinctly stated in it, if the note had never been given at all. McCaughrin & Co. v. Williams, 15 S. C. 505.

It is true that in the defeasance of the mortgage it is stated as follows: "Provided always and these presents are upon this condition: that if the said Richard Elliott shall well and truly pay his certain promissory note, having even date herewith, given to the said P. M. Plyler, then these presents shall become void," &c. The note altered was not in fact the promissory note of Elliott, but a sealed note of Elliott and C. A. Plyler, and it is therefore claimed that the note referred to is not the sealed note that was altered; and the whole doctrine being merely technical, it is insisted that the greatest certainty should be required. We, however, suppose that reference was intended to be made to the sealed note, that day given by Elliott and C. A. Plyler, for the sum of $703.80, and think that the reference thus made was precisely equivalent to and only another form of saying "well and truly pay the amount hereinbefore stated," to wit, the sum of $703.80 (the precise amount of the note referred to).

Even disregarding the mistake in the description of the note, it does not seem to us that such an erroneous reference in the defeasance of the mortgage should be allowed to have the great effect claimed for it; that is to say, in contradiction to the first and most important part of the mortgage, to change the whole structure and effect of the instrument, and, from being an original security for the debt expressly named in it, to make it merely a collateral security for the note itself, a security of no higher grade than the mortgage.

*Besides, Elliott, who got and retains the money of plaintiff, and executed the mortgage to secure it, has never claimed that he should be exonerated from the debt. On the contrary, there is evidence tending to show that after he had notice of the alteration of the note, he declared to Walter, Conner and Duffie that, while he intended to prosecute the alleged forgery, he owed plaintiff the debt; that it was a just debt, and he expected to pay the principal and interest, but not pay any more. See McCorkle v. Doby, 1 Strobb. 396 [47 Am. Dec. 560].

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified: that it be affirmed in so far as it dismissed the complaint against C. A. Plyler, as surety, and that in so far as it refused an order to foreclose the mortgage against Richard Elliott, it be reversed and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for such orders as may be necessary to carry out the conclusion herein indicated.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, concurred.

Mr. Justice McIVER, dissenting. It appears to me that the question as to what effect the alteration of a note, secured by a mortgage, has upon the right to foreclose a mortgage, depends altogether upon whether such alteration was fraudulently made by the plaintiff. If it was, then the plaintiff not only loses his right of action on the note, but also his right to the aid of the court in enforcing the collection of his debt in any form. This is the penalty which he incurs for his fraud. The court withholds the use of its process to enforce the collection of a debt which may be due to a person who has, for the purpose of committing a fraud upon his debtor, made an alteration in any one of the evidences of such debt. If, however, the alteration is not shown to have been done fraudulently by the plaintiff, then the only effect is to deprive the plaintiff of the right of action upon the note or other evidence of debt which has been altered, but does not affect his right of action for the debt, if he can establish it by any other evidence. He cannot sue upon the altered note, because that is not the contract into which the defendant entered, but he still may sue for the debt and will be permitted *to establish such debt by any other evidence than that afforded by the altered note, which it may be in his power to produce. These views, it seems to me, are fully supported by the authorities. Masters v. Miller, 4 T. R. 320; Mills v. Starr, 2 Bailey 359; McCorkle v. Doby, 1 Strobb. 396 [47 Am. Dec. 560].

As is said by Lord Kenyon, in Masters v. Miller, supra, "No man shall be permitted to take the chance of committing a fraud, without running any risk of losing by the event when it is detected," so in Mills v. Starr, supra, Johnson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, after laying down the rule that the alteration of a note by the party claiming under it, for the purpose of fraud, renders it void, uses this language: "To prevent fraud was the obvious policy of the rule which avoids a written contract on account of a fraudulent alteration in a material part, and a forfeiture of the benefit to be derived from it is the means used to enforce it. It is apparent that if the party guilty of the fraud may found a claim upon the original consideration, the rule itself would be defeated, and that he cannot is demonstrable from various considerations. * * * The forfeiture of the benefit to be derived from the contract is a just retribution for the fraudulent intent." And in McCorkle v. Doby, supra, it is said: "A person is not at liberty to say, 'I have made two contracts, and if one of them is avoided for fraud I will set up the other.' Selway v. Fogg, 5 Mees. & W. 83; 9 Car. & P. 59; 1 Adolph. & E. 40."

It seems to me that any other rule would destroy the distinction between a fraudulent and an innocent alteration of a note. The latter destroys the right of action on the note, but does not impair the right of action on the original consideration for which such note was given (Hunt v. Gray, 35 N. J. 227; S. C., 10 Am. Rep. 232), and if the former did no more it would be placing the guilty in no worse position than the innocent. Upon the same principle, it seems to me that where a note secured by a mortgage has been fraudulently altered by the plaintiff, he not only loses his right of action on the note, but also on the mortgage. To apply the principle announced in McCorkle v. Doby, quoted above, he is not at liberty to say: "I have made two contracts to secure my debt; one evidenced by *a note and the other by a mortgage, and, although the contract evidenced by the note has been avoided by my own fraud, yet I will set up the other."

It seems to be supposed that this case is concluded by the decision in Gillett v. Powell, Speers Eq. 155, but I do not so understand that case. There are at least three distinctions between that case and the one now under consideration: First. There the mortgage was of personal property, and it is well settled that in such case the mortgagee becomes the legal owner of the mortgage property after condition broken, while here the mortgage is of real estate where that rule does not obtain. Second. In that case the mortgage did not in any way refer to the bond which had been altered, and, although I must confess that I have never been able to appreciate the force of this circumstance, as I suppose there can be no doubt that the bond and mortgage were given to secure the payment of the same debt, yet, as this seems to be one of the circumstances relied upon by the distinguished chancellor who delivered the Circuit decree, it may be proper to mention it. Third. But the material distinction is that in Gillett v. Powell there was no evidence tending to show that the alteration was made with any fraudulent intent, while here the jury have found, and their finding is approved and concurred in by the Circuit judge, that the alteration was fraudulently made by the plaintiff.

Again, in Gillett v. Powell, the case of Mills v. Starr, upon which I, in large measure, base my conclusion, is distinctly recognized, and the court disavows any disposition to call it in question. This case, therefore, in my judgment, stands upon an entirely different footing from Gillett v. Powell, for, as we have seen, the fact that the alteration was fraudulently made by the plaintiff, is the fact upon which the principle I am contending for rests; and, as that fact did not appear in Gillett v. Powell, the decision in that case is in no way inconsistent with the view which I take of the case now under consideration.

So, too, the recent decision in Nichols v. Briggs rests upon a totally different foundation. In that case no element of fraud entered. It simply decided, and properly decided, that a plaintiff did not lose his right of action to foreclose a mortgage by *reason of the fact that his right of action on the note given for the same debt was barred by the statute of limitations. It is well settled that the statute affects the remedy only, and does not extinguish the debt. That still remains, and if a creditor is so fortunate as to have his debt secured by a mortgage as well as by note, I can conceive of no reason why he should be deprived of his right of action upon the mortgage simply because his right of action on the note is barred. If a creditor holds two securities for the same debt, he may sue upon the one or the other as he pleases. If he sues upon the one on which his right of action is barred by the statute, of course the action cannot be maintained; but if he sued upon the other before the expiration of the statutory period which applies to it, he meets with no such obstacle and therefore may recover. But this matter has been so fully and satisfactorily discussed by Mr. Justice McGowan in Nichols v. Briggs, that it is needless for me to pursue the subject.

I am, therefore, unable to concur in so much of the opinion of the majority of this court as holds that the action may proceed for the foreclosure of the mortgage notwithstanding the fraudulent alteration by the plaintiff of the note given for the same debt which the mortgage was given to secure, and, on the contrary, think that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

Judgment modified.

LAIN v. SIMON.

(November Term, 1882.)

[1. Action ⇨2.]

Where a mortgagee assigned his chattel mortgage to a stranger after giving consent to a purchase of the chattel by another party, and a guaranty that the mortgage should never be used against the purchaser, who was afterwards compelled to pay a second time for such property, the purchaser has a just claim against the mortgagee for the damages to which he (the purchaser) has been subjected by reason of the assignment of the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. ⇨2.]

[2. Chattel Mortgages ⇨208.]

Even if the purchaser could by legal proceedings have prevented a sale of the chattel under the mortgage, he nevertheless would be entitled to recover for the damages caused him by the fraudulent act of the mortgagee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 462; Dec. Dig. ⇨208.]

[3. Chattel Mortgages ⇨208.]

Under the plaintiff's action for damages for fraud, he might recover damages for the breach of defendant's guaranty, especially so, as the breach was caused by defendant's fraudulent transfer of his mortgage.

*Before Hudson, J., Barnwell, March, 1882. The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. L. B. O'Bryan, for appellant.

Mr. J. J. Brown, contra.

April 20th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant, Nathan Simon, held a mortgage on a horse given to secure a note for $75, payable October 1st, 1879. The mortgagor desiring to trade the horse to O. A. Lain, the plaintiff, for a mule, obtained authority from Simon to do so. The terms having been agreed upon, Lain went to Simon to obtain his consent, and Simon told him "that the mortgage should never be used against him." On October 29th, 1879, Simon, for valuable consideration, "assigned all his right, title and interest in the within mortgage to Mantoue & Co.", who, in December, 1879, seized the horse while in the possession of a third party, to whom it had been sold by Lain, and sold it under the mortgage, the plaintiff, Lain, knowing of the sale. Lain then "had to return the purchase-money" to the person to whom he had sold the horse, and from whom it had been taken under the mortgage, and on January 8th, 1880, commenced this action against Simon for damages for fraud."

The case was submitted to the Circuit judge for trial, without a jury, who, after finding the facts substantially as above stated, held that Simon was estopped from any use of the mortgage, and that the transfer to Mantoue & Co., and subsequent sale of the horse by them under the mortgage, was a palpable fraud on the rights of the plaintiff, on the part of Simon, for which he is responsible. He, therefore, rendered judgment for the plaintiff for $100, the value of the horse, and for the costs of the action.

From this judgment the defendant appeals upon the following grounds: "1. Because the action by the assignees, Mantoue & Co., could not have prejudiced any set-off or other defense of the plaintiff existing at the time of the assignment. 2. Because the plaintiff not having been prejudiced in any defense he had at the time of the assignment, has not been damaged or deprived of his *rights by the said assignment to Mantoue & Co. 3. Because Simon having released his claim over the horse, the subsequent assignment to Mantoue & Co. carried only Simon's interest, which was nothing, and could not damage plaintiff. 4. Because plaintiff had a good and valid title to the horse, and not having objected to the sale of him under the said mortgage, he cannot now bring his action against the assignor, who is only responsible to the assignee for consideration of assignment. 5. Because the debt was unpaid, and there being no consent to discharge the same, the mortgagor had a right to assign the mortgage, and was not responsible for the action of Mantoue & Co., who only held the interest of assignor."

We do not see how there can be a doubt that Simon perpetrated a fraud in assigning the mortgage after giving plaintiff a guaranty that it should not be used against him, and thereby inducing the plaintiff to part with his property. And there is as little doubt that one of the results of that fraud was to cause a loss to the plaintiff of the value of the horse sold under the mortgage, which was thus fraudulently assigned; and it would seem to follow necessarily that the party injured had a just claim for damages against the party whose fraud caused the injury. The defense seems to be based upon the idea that, inasmuch as the plaintiff had it in his power to prevent the sale of the horse under the mortgage, and thereby avoid the injury thus done him, and having failed to exercise it, he cannot now complain of a result which he had the means of preventing. This is an attempt to apply the doctrine of contributory negligence to a case in which we do not think it applicable. That doctrine applies where the action is based upon the negligence of the defendant, and not where it is based upon his fraud.

There are many cases in which a person who has sustained an injury from the fraud or other misconduct of another, where he might have taken measures to prevent such injury, and yet his failure to do so would not deprive him of the right to recover damages from the party whose fraud or other misconduct has caused the injury. It would scarcely do to say that a party who has been beaten lost his right to recover damages for such a trespass upon his person because it was made to appear that by a *proper use of his physical powers, or by taking advantage of an opportunity to escape from his assailant, he might have entirely protected himself from such injury. So, too, if a person should be induced to buy property by the false representations of another as to its quality or title, it would hardly be a defense to an action for damages sustained by reason of such fraudulent misrepresentations to show that the party injured might, if he had used proper diligence, instead of relying upon such representations, have been able to ascertain that they were false and fraudulent, and thus have escaped the injury of which he complains. A party injured oftentimes has a choice of remedies—a right to make his own selection of the manner in which he shall seek redress for a wrong done to him, and when he does so the wrong-doer cannot say to him, "You have failed to make use of the most effective remedy which the law afforded you, and therefore you cannot avail yourself of the one which you have selected."

In this case, Mantoue & Co., by the assignment of the mortgage, acquired no higher right than Simon, their assignor, had; they may be regarded as standing in his shoes, and, in selling the horse under the mortgage, exerted only the power which Simon had conferred upon them. They were, so to speak, his agents, and their act was his. Now, if Simon had himself seized and sold the horse under the mortgage, in violation of his express assurance to Lain, "that the mortgage should never be used against him," there can be no doubt but that he would have been liable to Lain for any damages which he might thereby have sustained, even though Lain may have had the right to prevent the sale by instituting proper proceedings for that purpose. Lain would have had a choice of remedies, and it might be that to institute proper proceedings to enjoin the sale would involve more trouble and expense than he was willing to encounter, and that he preferred to fall back upon his action for damages, as he undoubtedly would have the right to do. If this be so, then, as Mantoue & Co. stood in the shoes of Simon and could only exercise such power as he had conferred upon them, their act was practically his act, and the same principle *would apply as if the seizure and sale had been made directly by Simon.

There is another view of this case, which must be conclusive. Simon gave to Lain an express guaranty, not merely that he would not use the mortgage against him, but "that the mortgage should never be used against him," and, upon the faith of such guaranty, Lain parted with his mule, and took in exchange therefor the horse, covered by the mortgage. At the time this guaranty was made, Simon had the means of making it good, as he then had the control of the mortgage, and, of course, no one could use it without his consent. But the mortgage was used by a third party, who was empowered to do so by the fraudulent act of Simon, and the use thus wrongfully made of the mortgage, in violation of Simon's express guaranty to Lain, has resulted in damage to Lain, and we are unable to see any reason why he cannot recover the amount of such damages. For, although the action is for damages for fraud, and is not based upon the breach of the guaranty, yet, under the liberal principles of the code, the plaintiff may, if necessary, fall back upon the violation of the guaranty, especially when such violation was caused by, and accompanied with, the fraudulent act of the defendant in transferring a mortgage which he knew at the time he had no right to transfer.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*Before Pressley, J., Newberry, February, 1882.

Action by Jane Scruggs, and Richard M. Scruggs, by his guardian ad litem, against Michael Foot. The opinion states the case.

Mr. F. Werber, Jr., for appellant.

Messrs. W. H. Wallace, J. K. P. Goggans, contra.

April 21st, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Robert Scruggs, late of Newberry county, died in 1873, intestate, leaving as his heirs-at-law his widow, Jane Scruggs, and Elizabeth F. Fallow, Columbus C. Scruggs, Mary J. Summers, Sallie Scruggs and Richard Scruggs, his children, all of whom were of age, except Richard. In addition to a small personalty, he died seized and possessed of a small lot of land situate in the town of Helena, near Newberry C. H. William A. Fallow administered on his estate. The children, a short time after the death of their father, conveyed their interest in the aforesaid lot to their mother, so that she became the owner of the entire tract, including the interest of Richard, until his deed is avoided on account of infancy.

In 1878, one Nellie Jones, holding a debt against the estate, commenced action in the Probate Court in her own behalf, and in behalf of other creditors of Robert Scruggs, deceased, against Fallow, the administrator, and the heirs-at-law, alleging the insufficiency of personal assets, and praying that the land be sold in aid thereof to pay debts. The defendants were all served with summons, but it seems that no guardian ad litem was appointed for Richard, the minor. This fact is admitted as one of the facts of the case. No answer having been put in, and it appearing that the personal assets were insufficient, the Probate judge ordered the land to be sold, the proceeds to be applied to the payment of the claim of Nellie Jones, the sole creditor, to wit: $138.70, and to the costs, amounting to $110.05, the balance to await the further order of the court. At the sale the defendant became the purchaser. This sale was in December, 1878, and the defendant, appellant, has been in possession ever since.

The present action was commenced in January, 1881, by Jane Scruggs, and Richard, through his guardian ad litem, James K. P. Goggans, Esq., alleging the above facts and praying judgment that a homestead be assigned to plaintiffs; that the proceedings in the Probate Court be set aside, and the sale thereunder annulled; that the defendant be adjudged to account for rents and profits, and for costs and disbursements, &c. The case was referred to the master, Silas Johnstone, Esq., who reported the testimony. Upon the hearing of this report in February, 1882, Judge Pressley adjudged and decreed that the deed of conveyance to the defendant (appellant), under the Probate Court sale, be set aside, on the ground that said court was without jurisdiction, and further, that the plaintiffs have homestead, and that commissioners be appointed and directed to set apart such homestead to said plaintiffs. From this decree the defendant has appealed.

There are two questions presented in the appeal: First. Did the Probate Court have jurisdiction in the proceeding ordered by Judge Pressley to be vacated? Second. If not, can the decree below ordering homestead be sustained?

In McNamee v. Waterbury, 4 S. C. 156, this court sustained a judgment of the Probate Court ordering real estate to be sold to aid personalty in the payment of debts, obtained upon the application of the administrator of the intestate. This settles the abstract question as to the jurisdiction of the Probate Court to order the sale of realty to aid personalty in payment of debts, but it does not determine in terms whether this jurisdiction can be invoked by creditors as well as the administrator. In that case, as has been stated, the administrator of the debtor instituted the proceeding, and it was upheld. If the administrator in this case had been the actor, then the two cases would have been precisely parallel, and McNamee v. Waterbury being exactly in point both as to its facts and the legal principle involved, nothing more would be necessary except simply to cite that case.

In the present case, however, a creditor, not the administrator, instituted the proceeding. Can this make any difference as to *the jurisdiction of the Probate Court over the subject-matter? Does that jurisdiction depend upon the mode in which this subject is brought before the court, or does it depend upon the subject itself? In the opinion in McNamee v. Waterbury, the court based the jurisdiction upon that clause of the constitution which confers jurisdiction upon the Probate Court in "matters of administration," (article IV., section 20,) and it held under 2 Stat. 570, if the exigency of the estate required it, the lands of a decedent might be regarded as assets for the payment of his debts, in cases of insufficiency of personal property, to be enforced through sale by order of the Probate Court; the fact upon which the jurisdiction depends being the insufficiency of the personal assets and the necessity of using the realty in the administration arising from such insufficiency.

Now it is well understood that lands in the hands of the heir may be reached by creditors of the ancestor by action directly against the heir; or rather judgment may be obtained against the heir to the extent of lands descended or devised, and in this way the lands of a decedent may be substantially made liable for his debts without any direct action on the part of the administrator. If this can be done by a creditor in the Circuit Court without the co-operation of the administrator, where can be the objection in permitting him to do the same thing in the Probate Court, when it is admitted that the constitution has invested that court with jurisdiction necessary to meet just such an exigency, when it is invoked by the administrator upon facts established by him, to wit: the insufficiency of the personal estate, and the necessity for the application of the realty. Of course in such a proceeding both the heir and the administrator should be made parties, and the heir should have all the right of defense which he would have in an ordinary action against him to subject lands descended to the payment of the debts of an ancestor, including the right to require that the debt shall be established by such tribunal as its character may demand.

To hold that, under the section of the constitution referred to, the Probate Court only has jurisdiction in such cases when the administrator chooses to invoke it, would, it seems to us, be a very narrow construction. It would be placing a provision of the constitution, intended for the benefit of creditors, quite beyond their reach, making them entirely dependent upon the administrator, (who, perhaps, might be hostile to their interests), whether or not they could ever avail themselves of it. The other construction would be more liberal, would prevent circuity of action, and would more certainly meet the end and purpose of the constitution in conferring such jurisdiction upon the Probate Court "in matters of administration," and, when accompanied with the right of the heir to be made a party, privileged to make all the defenses which he could, if sued directly on account of lands descended or devised, would in no way be hurtful to him.

We think the principle of McNamee v. Waterbury goes to the extent of sustaining the judgment of the Probate Court herein as to the parties legally before that court. Now, who was before the court? It is admitted that all the heirs were legally summoned, but it is also admitted that Richard was a minor, and that no guardian ad litem was appointed for him. As to the adults, even if they were necessary parties, having been summoned and failing to appear and answer, they would be bound by the judgment; but, under our view of the case, they were not necessary parties. It appears that before the commencement of the proceeding by Nellie Jones, they had conveyed their interest in the land to their mother, and at that time they had no legal interest whatever in the litigation. This applies, too, to Richard. True, his deed to his mother was executed while he was a minor, but this fact did not render the deed absolutely void; it only made it voidable, and, until avoided, the title of his mother was good. So that neither the adults nor Richard were necessary parties to the proceeding before the Probate Court. The objection, then, to the want of parties, cannot avail. Mrs. Scruggs, being the sole owner of the land, was the only party legally interested, and, she having been made a party, the court had complete jurisdiction.

Our conclusion, therefore, is, that the judgment of the Probate Court should have been conclusive on the plaintiff. It was certainly so as to her interest as an heir-at-law of her deceased husband, which was one-third. In regard to the interest derived from her children, had the question as to the liability of so much of the *land as had been bona fide aliened before suit brought been made before the Probate Court, upon proof of conveyance by the heirs-at-law to Mrs. Scruggs before action by Nellie Jones, doubtless a different judgment would have been rendered in that court as to the land thus conveyed by the heirs-at-law. But Mrs. Scruggs failed to answer, and the fact of such alienation, with its legal consequences, was not made or claimed before the Probate Court, and, no appeal having been taken from its judgment, it is res adjudicata as to all defenses made, or which could have been made thereto.

As to the homestead: This court held in Ex parte Lewie, 17 S. C. 153, that the Circuit Court had no original jurisdiction in the matter of homestead. At the time the petition was filed in that case the power to set off homestead to widows and children belonged, under the acts upon that subject, to the Probate Court, and Mrs. Lewie, having filed her petition in the Circuit Court, under the principle laid down in Howze v. Howze, 2 S. C. 232, to wit: "That where rights are created by statute, to be obtained and protected in a special manner, specified in the act and by a special tribunal, no other court can assume jurisdiction," this court, in effect, dismissed the petition.

Since the petition in Ex parte Lewie a subsequent act has been passed, substituting the masters, and in such counties where no masters have been appointed, the clerk of the court in the place of the Probate Court, in such matters. Gen. Stat. 1882, § 2002. But there is no provision in this act authorizing the initiation of an original proceeding for homestead in the Circuit Court.

The question of the right of the plaintiff to the homestead claimed, notwithstanding the sale of the land under the decree of the Probate Court, is not before us, and, therefore, no opinion is expressed in reference thereto. We desire to be understood as holding, simply, that the mode adopted here to have the homestead set off was not the legal mode, as prescribed by the statute, leaving the parties to pursue such course hereafter as they may be advised.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed.

*STATE v. MINTON.

(November Term, 1882.)

[Bail  $\hookrightarrow$  75.]

The defendant having failed to appear and plead to an indictment for misdemeanor, his recognizance may then be estreated, before trial, sentence and issue of bench warrant. Mr. Justice McIver dissenting.

For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig.  $\hookrightarrow$  75.]

Before Fraser, J., Charleston, February, 1882.

The report of the presiding judge was as follows:

This case was heard by me at the term of the Court of Sessions for Charleston county in February, 1882, and by consent of counsel the decision was reserved, to be rendered after the adjournment of the court. Ben Tomkins was arrested on a warrant duly issued, charged with larceny of live stock, under the value of $20, and conceded by the State to be a charge of misdemeanor and not felony. He was released on the usual recognizance, and Warren Minton, the respondent, was surety for his appearance to answer. It was admitted that Ben Tomkins was duly called and failed to answer when the case was called for trial. The rule in this case was issued and duly served on Warren Minton, requiring him to show cause why the recognizance should not be estreated and adjudged forfeited, and execution issued for the penalty of the same—the sum of $200. The respondent shows, for cause, that there has been no bench warrant issued for the arrest of Ben Tomkins, for sentence, and no return of non est inventus on the same by the sheriff or other proper officer.

The only question in the case submitted to me is, whether the liability of the surety on the recognizance has been fixed by the failure to appear and answer when called, or whether it is necessary to issue a bench warrant and have a return of non est inventus before the surety becomes liable. In cases of felony there is no doubt that the liability is fixed by the failure to appear and answer when called, because there can be no trial without the presence of the accused, at least in those cases where an arraignment is necessary. In cases of misdemeanor I think that the rule is the same, *with this modification: "If the accused once appears and pleads, it is not necessary to be present de die in diem until the case is disposed of, but he may absent himself, and his surety will be discharged if he should be arrested on a bench warrant or is delivered up by his surety to receive sentence." This view, I think, is in accord with the doctrine as laid down by Hawkins; the book not being accessible I cannot give the page. In State v. Rowe, 8 Rich. 21, we find the following language: "In misdemeanors the defendant's obligation compels his appearance on the first day of the term and de die in diem until he has been discharged or has pleaded." It is also here said "that after he has pleaded that it is sufficient if he is present to receive sentence."

The absence of defendants and witnesses, when called in the Court of Sessions, has become a very great evil, and some means must be found to check it. If I had any doubt on a subject like this, it is my duty to put it in a position to be passed on by a tribunal which alone can settle the law in this State. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the rule in this case be made absolute, and that the said recognizance be estreated, and is hereby adjudged forfeited, and that judgment be entered and execution be issued for the sum of $200, the penalty thereof, and costs, against Warren Minton, the respondent.

In the brief appears the statement, agreed to by counsel, "that the name of the appellant's attorney, S. J. Lee, appears as counsel for the defendant, Ben Tomkins, on the judge's docket."

Respondent appealed upon the following ground:

"Because the defendant, Ben Tomkins, being under recognizance to answer to an indictment for a misdemeanor, there was no legal impediment to his being tried, and his recognizance cannot be forfeited until he has been tried, convicted, and fails to appear for sentence of the court; and his Honor erred in not so holding."

Mr. S. J. Lee, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

*282

*April 21st, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. [Omitting the statement.] It is conceded that in misdemeanors, unlike felonies, the defendant may be tried in some cases in his absence, and as the object of the recognizance is to secure his presence so as to receive sentence, it has been unusual, if not unknown in this State before this case, for the bond to be adjudged forfeited till after conviction and failure to appear for sentence evidenced by bench warrant and a return of non est inventus. The question, however, is not what has been the custom and practice, but what is the law on the subject. We have been unable to find any case in our own reports bearing directly on this point. In the case of State v. Rowe, 8 Rich. 21, Judge Glover, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In misdemeanors, the defendant's obligation compels appearance on the first day of the term, and de die in diem until he has been discharged or until he has pleaded. After he has pleaded he appears by his attorney, and his recognizance will not be estreated, although he should fail to appear at each succeeding term, provided, that after conviction he be present to receive the sentence."

But that question was not directly involved in the case then before the court, as that was a case of felony. These remarks, therefore, though falling from the lips of a learned judge, can not be recognized as controlling authority, as they were merely obiter. Nor have we been able to find any decisions in our sister States, except in the State of Kentucky. In that State, in a recent case referred to in 2 Crim. L. Mag. 411, the case of Walker v. Commonwealth, 2 Ken. Law Rep., March, 1881, p. 197, the precise question was made and adjudged, the court holding that trial and conviction was not necessary in order to forfeit bail in a misdemeanor, and that the liability of the surety was fixed when the defendant failed to appear. As the volume of the Kentucky Reports in which this case is found is not in the library, we have not had opportunity of reading it in full, and of ascertaining the grounds upon which the decision rests; whether upon statute regulations, the terms of the recognizance or otherwise; but as reported in the magazine referred to, it is *full and direct to the point, and in accordance with the remarks of Judge Glover above.

The condition of the recognizance is stated to be the same in misdemeanor as in felony, it being that the accused "shall personally appear * * * to answer to a bill of indictment to be preferred against him, and to do and receive what shall be enjoined by the court, and not to depart without leave." This according to its literal terms, would seem to require personal appearance both to answer (that is, to plead,) and to receive what shall be enjoined by the court, the sentence. We think that it is a sufficient indulgence to a defendant in misdemeanor that he should not be required to remain in court de die in diem after appearing and pleading, but his recognizance demands that he shall do that much in the first instance, and we can see no good reason why the court should relax his obligation and make a new contract for him. Besides, the weight of authority is against such ruling.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur. A copy of the recognizance is not before us, but it is taken as a matter of course that its tenor was in express terms that the accused would "personally appear" and answer the offense charged at the next ensuing term of the Court of General Sessions. That was his express obligation, which was broken by his non-appearance. In regard to misdemeanors which may be tried without the presence of the accused, it may, as a rule, be unnecessary to enforce the appearance of the accused until after conviction. Upon this view probably has grown up the practice said to exist, not to ask that the recognizance should be declared forfeited until after conviction. I do not see that any particular harm can come from such practice, which may be generally the most convenient, especially as the party accused may not be convicted. But when the Circuit judge, for reason satisfactory to himself, has thought it proper to estreat the recognizance for default before trial, I am unable to affirm that such order is error of law.

*Mr. Justice McIVER dissenting. [Omitting the statement.] I am unable to perceive any sufficient reason for departing from what I have always understood to be the universal practice in this State, in regard to estreating recognizances of defendants charged with misdemeanors only. According to that practice the recognizance was never estreated until the defendant had been convicted and had failed to appear to receive sentence, for the reason that until that time there was no occasion for his personal appearance. When the court had once obtained jurisdiction of the person of the defendant by his arrest, the trial could proceed in his absence, and there was no reason why his personal presence should be required. If he chose to absent himself at the trial, that was his own affair; and if he sustained any injury by such absence, he alone was responsible for it. It was not even necessary that he should appear in person and plead to the indictment, for in misdemeanors the defendant could appear and plead by attorney. As is said in 1 Chit. Crim. Law 411: "Although we have seen that no one can be convicted of a felony in his absence, and at the assizes and sessions the defendant must appear in person before plea, it is otherwise in the King's Bench in the case of misdemeanors, for the defendant may in that court, when the crime is inferior to felony, appear by attorney." To same effect see 1 Bac. Abr., tit. Attorney, B., and 1 Com. Dig., tit. Attorney, B. 5, p. 623.

In this case it appears from the agreed statement of facts, that Tomkins had appeared by attorney, for it is admitted that the name of appellant's attorney appears on the docket as counsel for said Tomkins. It seems to me, therefore, that there was no sufficient ground for estreating the recognizance in this case, and that the Circuit judge erred in ruling otherwise, and that he should have held that the recognizance was not liable to be estreated until Tomkins had been tried and convicted and failed to appear when called for sentence.

The argument drawn from the phraseology of the condition of the recognizance seems to me to be without support. There is nothing in the "Case," as presented here, which shows what was the language used in the condition of the recognizance, and I am not aware of any statute prescribing the form of such *instruments, from which it could be inferred that any particular form was used in this case. If we are to take the form of the instrument from usage, then it seems to me that we should adhere to the construction which usage has given to such form, as exhibited in the universal practice hereinbefore alluded to. But, even supposing that it be conceded, as stated in the argument of the solicitor, that the form of the recognizance in misdemeanors is the same as in felony, requiring that the accused "personally appear * * * to answer to a bill of indictment to be preferred against him, and to do and receive what shall be enjoined by the court, and not depart without leave," I do not see how that helps the argument. It is conceded that, though the form of the recognizance is the same in felony and in misdemeanor, yet the rule is different as to the obligations imposed in the two classes of cases, and this is sufficient to show that the form is not controlling.

The argument is that, according to what is claimed to be the form of this recognizance, the defendant is not only required "to do and receive what shall be enjoined by the court," but that he is also required to "personally appear * * * to answer to a bill of indictment;" and, therefore, a failure to do either one of these two things operates a forfeiture of the recognizance. It will be observed, however, that there is a third requirement in the language used, to wit: "and not depart without leave;" and yet no one has ever contended that a failure to observe this third requirement would operate as a forfeiture of the recognizance. Indeed, it seems to me plain that the language relied upon affords only one of the numerous instances of that verbosity and tautology so frequently found in old acts of parliament and statutes and legal instruments, as to furnish no little foundation for the reproaches, not to say ridicule of laymen; and all that it really means is that the accused shall not put himself beyond the reach of the court when he is needed. At all events, this is the construction which has always been given, and I am quite satisfied to adhere to it.

I have not been able to obtain access to the case from Kentucky, relied upon by the solicitor, and, therefore, do not know whether it is in point or whether it rests upon some statutory *provision or practice adopted in that State. But, even if it is directly in point, though entitled to great respect, it is not authority here; at least not sufficient to warrant the reversal of a practice which has long, if not always, been followed in this State, and which, so far as my experience and observation goes, has worked very well.

For these reasons I cannot concur in the conclusions reached by a majority of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

DeWALT v. KINARD.

(November Term, 1882.)

[1. Jury ⇨25.]

Action was brought for recovery of real property and for injunction, and the answer denied the plaintiff's title. Motion was then made by plaintiff, on the pleadings alone, for the payment of rent into court, the leasing of the land pending litigation, and for a reference to the master to take the testimony, and the motion was granted. Held, that the issue of title was a legal demand, triable by jury, and defendant's failure to demand such a trial was not a waiver of this right.

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, November, 1880.

*Action by George DeWalt, commenced in September, 1880. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, for appellant.

Messrs. Moorman & Simkins, J. Y. Culbreath, contra.

April 21st, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff in his complaint alleges that the defendant Andrew Kinard executed a note to him for $650, which note was secured by a mortgage of a tract of land, described in the complaint, bearing date March 8th, 1876, containing a power of sale; that default being made in the payment of the note, the defendant Andrew Kinard went out of possession of the land, and that thereby the title became vested in the plaintiff; that under the said power of sale the plaintiff, on January 5th, 1880, exposed the land for sale at public outcry, with the knowledge and consent of Andrew Kinard, and the same was bid off by O. B. Mayer, Jr.; that a deed was accordingly made to said Mayer, who, on the same day, executed a deed for said land to the plaintiff; that the defendant George A. Kinard, and the defendants Cannon and Ruff, who claim to be his tenants, are in unlawful possession of said land, and have refused upon demand to surrender possession to the plaintiff; that the defendant Cannon has agreed to pay defendant George A. Kinard three bales of cotton as rent for the land for the year 1880; that both George A. Kinard and Cannon are insolvent, and that there is danger that the rents will be lost unless some provision is made to prevent such a result. Wherefore, the plaintiff demands judgment: 1st. For the recovery of possession of said land. 2d. Declaring the rents to be the property of plaintiff, and restraining defendant Cannon from paying same to defendant George A. Kinard. 3d. For costs and disbursements. 4th. For other and further relief.

Before any answer was filed, an order was obtained by the plaintiff restraining and enjoining defendant Cannon from paying the rent to George A. Kinard, and restraining said George A. Kinard from receiving or in any wise interfering with the rents until the further order of the court.

*After this order was granted, the defendant George A. Kinard filed his answer, in which he admits the execution of the note and mortgage, referred to in the complaint, by Andrew Kinard, but alleges that the real intention of Andrew Kinard was to mortgage only his interest in the land, which was one undivided half; that at the time the mortgage was executed, Andrew Kinard held the legal title to said land; that default was made in the payment of said note, but he denies that subsequent to such default the said Andrew Kinard went out of possession of said land, and, on the contrary, avers that he remained in possession by himself or by his tenants; that the land was offered for sale by plaintiff, under the power contained in the mortgage, and bid off by O. B. Mayer, Jr.; that Andrew Kinard had consented to said sale; that plaintiff executed a deed for the land to said Mayer, but he denies that Mayer was a bona fide purchaser of said land, and, on the contrary, avers that he bid it off at the instance and for the benefit of plaintiff; that said Mayer did on the same day execute a deed to plaintiff for said land, but he denies that the title passed thereby; that Cannon and Ruff are his tenants in possession of said land; that he refused to surrender possession, upon the demand of plaintiff, of more than one-half of said land; that Cannon has agreed to pay him three bales of cotton, as rent for the year 1880, and that he denies that he is insolvent. As an affirmative defense, he alleges that he was entitled to a one-half interest in said land, under an instrument in writing executed by Andrew Kinard on December 28th, 1865, long before the execution of the mortgage, a copy of which instrument was filed as an exhibit to the answer, and set out in the "Case"; that plaintiff was aware that defendant George A. Kinard had this interest before he took the mortgage from Andrew Kinard; that to carry out the purpose of this instrument, the said Andrew Kinard, on December 18th, 1877, executed a deed to defendant George A. Kinard, for one undivided half of said land; that after plaintiff had obtained his mortgage from Andrew Kinard, he undertook, as the attorney of defendant George A. Kinard, to procure from Andrew Kinard payment for the interest of the said George A. Kinard in the land, and in violation of his instructions, and *imposing upon the said George A. Kinard while under the influence of liquor, he took from Andrew Kinard a mortgage junior to his own, well knowing at the time that the same would be worthless, as the said Andrew Kinard was hopelessly insolvent; and that upon discovering these facts, defendant George A. Kinard procured from said Andrew Kinard the deed of December 18th, 1877, for one undivided half of the land; that plaintiff, by the betrayal of the confidence of defendant George A. Kinard, has seriously damaged said defendant. Wherefore, he demands judgment: 1st. For a partition of said land; 2d. That he is entitled to the rent, the payment of which has been enjoined; 3d. For damages; 4th. For costs and disbursements.

To this answer the plaintiff replied, "reiterating many of the allegations of his complaint, and denying all the charges of the answer." The defendant Andrew Kinard did not answer, and the answer of defendants Cannon and Ruff state nothing material to this appeal.

The case was docketed by the plaintiff on calendar No. 2, and, before it came on for trial, he served notice on the defendants that he would move for an order, 1st. Requiring the rent for the year 1880 to be paid into court to await its order; 2d. Requiring the land to be leased by the master for the year 1881 to the highest bidder, and this rent, when due, to be paid into court, subject to its further orders; 3d. That it be referred to the master to take the testimony in the case and report the same to the court. This motion was heard by the Circuit judge upon the pleadings alone, no affidavits or oral evidence having been submitted, and he held that the admissions of the answer were "sufficient to establish plaintiff's title prima facie and only qualify their effect by allegations of fraud without proof," and that the allegation of the insolvency of George A. Kinard, though denied by him, is shown to be prima facie true by the terms of the paper set up as an exhibit to the answer of George A. Kinard, and that, therefore, irreparable injury would ensue unless some order is made to preserve the rents during the pendency of the suit. Accordingly, he ordered: 1st. That the rent, from January 1st, 1880, be paid to the master; 2d. That *the master let the premises from year to year, until the final determination of this action or the further order of the court; 3d. That all obligations held by the defendant, George A. Kinard, or his agents, for the rent of said premises for the year 1880, be delivered up to the master; 4th. That the master hold all money and securities which may come into his hands under this order, subject to the further order of the court; 5th. That it be referred to the master to take testimony upon the issues of fact made by the pleadings herein, and report the same to the court.

From this order defendant George A. Kinard appeals upon the following grounds, to wit: "1st. Because there was not before his Honor evidence sufficient to show that the said George A. Kinard is not entitled to retain the use and control of the lands involved in this action: 2d. Because there was not before his Honor any affidavits or oral testimony to show the necessity of the intervention of the court pending the action to secure the rights of the plaintiff: 3d. Because the issues in the case, it being an action for the recovery of specific real property, are properly triable before a jury, which trial has not been waived, and, therefore, the testimony could not be compelled to be taken before a referee; 4th. Because this is not a case in which the court is authorized to appoint a receiver of any character; 5th. Because his Honor's order does not require of George G. DeWalt any bond or other indemnification of the appellant for expenses or losses that may befall him in consequence of the order; 6th. Because his Honor, in ordering the land to be rented out by the master for the year 1882 and thereafter, ordered what the plaintiff never applied for or gave notice of."

For a proper understanding of the questions raised by this appeal, it will be necessary to determine the nature and objects of the action and the nature of the defenses pleaded thereto. It was undoubtedly an action of a two-fold character, legal and equitable, and the defenses were of the same character. The main purpose was to recover possession of real property upon the allegation that plaintiff had title thereto, and unless this allegation was admitted an issue was presented which the defendant had the right to have tried by a jury, unless he waived that right, and there is no evidence of any such waiver. There was *no necessity for the defendant to make a formal demand for that mode of trial, for, if the issue was triable in that way, he had the right to assume that the court would, without such demand, accord to him a right expressly guaranteed to him by statute. Lynch's Code, § 276. But even if a formal demand was necessary, inasmuch as the case had never been called for trial, the time for making such demand had not arrived. So that we see no force in the argument urged by respondent that the appellant, by failing to demand a trial by jury, had waived his right to such a mode of trial.

The Circuit judge seems to have assumed that the defendant admitted the plaintiff's title, but we do not so understand the pleadings, and it must be remembered that the motion was heard upon the pleadings alone, no evidence whatever having been submitted. Hence no facts should have been assumed except such as were alleged in the complaint and admitted in the answer. Now the plaintiff alleged that he had title to the premises in question and went on to state particularly how he derived his title; but the defendant in his answer, while admitting certain facts set out in the complaint, distinctly denied that plaintiff had title, and thus an issue was presented properly triable by a jury. The plaintiff seems to have rested his claim of title upon two grounds: First. Upon the allegation that his mortgagor having gone out of possession of the mortgaged premises, the title thereby vested in him as mortgagee under the proviso to the second section of the act of 1791; but the essential fact upon which such a claim must rest, to wit, that the mortgagor had gone out of possession, was distinctly denied in the answer, and therefore it is quite clear that it could not be said that the plaintiff had established even prima facie that source of title. Second. The plaintiff rested his claim of title upon the ~~sae~~ same under the power contained in the mortgage.

Now while it is true that the defendant admitted the allegations that the land was offered for sale under that power and bid off by Mayer; that plaintiff executed a deed to Mayer, and that on the same day Mayer executed a deed to plaintiff, he distinctly denied that plaintiff thereby acquired title, because he says that the sale to Mayer was merely sham and pretensive, and *thus an issue was presented as to whether the plaintiff had established his title through the second source from which he claimed to derive title, which issue was properly triable by a jury. For it is well settled that even though a defendant might admit the execution of a deed relied upon by the plaintiff as one of the links in his chain of title, such admission did not preclude him from showing in a court of law, when the jurisdictions were distinct and separate and exercised by different tribunals, that title did not pass thereby because of fraud or some other sufficient reason; courts of law having had concurrent jurisdiction with courts of equity in some cases of fraud.

Again, it will be observed that, after stating that the land was offered for sale under the power contained in the mortgage and bid off by Mayer, the plaintiff alleges that "he executed and delivered to the said O. B. Mayer, Jr., his deed in fee-simple of said land, a copy of which deed is herewith exhibited," and this allegation is admitted in the answer in this form, that the "said George G. DeWalt executed his deed to said land to the said O. B. Mayer, Jr., and that said deed is correctly exhibited with the complaint." Now if this allegation be taken as strictly true in the form in which it is made, it is very clear that no title passed to Mayer; and, if so, none from Mayer to the plaintiff; for it is well settled that in making a deed under a power of attorney, it must be in the name of the principal and not in the name of the attorney, (Webster v. Brown and Hammett, 2 S. C. 428,) and, therefore, in order to pass the title of the mortgagor, Andrew Kinard, it must be done by his deed through his attorney, and not by the deed of George G. DeWalt. If the plaintiff made "his deed," as he alleges, and not the deed of Andrew Kinard by George G. DeWalt as his attorney in fact, no title passed thereby to Mayer, and of course Mayer could convey none to the plaintiff. We are not, however, disposed to rest the case upon this point, as there is no copy of the deed before us, for although exhibited with the complaint it is not embraced in the "Case," and it may be that if we had the deed before us, we would find that the language used in the pleadings was a loose and inaccurate statement of the form of the deed.

It seems to us, therefore, that whether the plaintiff relied *upon the one source of title or the other, an issue was presented which the defendant had a right to have tried by a jury.

It is true that the complaint, besides demanding judgment for the recovery of the possession of the land, which was strictly legal relief, also demanded relief of an equitable character, by injunction, but there was no prayer for the appointment of a receiver, which was in effect done by requiring the rents then due to be paid to the master, and directing that officer to take possession of the land and lease it from year to year during the pendency of the litigation; and, of course, any issues arising on this branch of the case could be either tried by the court or referred to the master. The absence of any prayer for the appointment of a receiver would not prevent the court from granting that mode of relief, provided the case made properly warranted the granting of such relief. But we do not think that such a case was made by the pleadings, and the motion was heard only on the pleadings. The case made was that of a plaintiff, under claim of title, seeking to recover real property alleged to be in the possession of another, by himself and by his tenants, with an allegation that defendant was insolvent, and "that there is danger that the said rental will be lost to the plaintiff unless the same is protected by this honorable court until the judgment herein be rendered," while the defendant denies that title is in the plaintiff, denies that he is insolvent, and denies that there is any danger of loss of the rents. This certainly does not make a case warranting the appointment of a receiver, depriving the defendant of the possession of the land and impounding the rents.

A person in possession of real property is presumed to have title until the contrary appears, and we do not see by what authority he can be deprived of such possession until the question of title has been tried, even though it should be made to appear, prima facie, that he was insolvent. But we cannot agree that the pleadings made any such prima facie showing. As we have said, the allegation of insolvency was distinctly denied, and the inference drawn by the Circuit judge from the contents of paper filed as Exhibit A. to the answer of George A. Kinard, that said Kinard was insolvent at the date of that paper—fifteen years before—was not sufficient, in our judgment, to rebut the *positive denial of the answer, especially when the inference drawn from the paper, that George A. Kinard was insolvent because he was then burdened with obligations which rendered it unsafe for him to hold property in his own name, was met by the fact that on December 18th, 1877, he did take title in his own name for an undivided half of this land. For, although George A. Kinard may have been insolvent in 1865, just at the close of a disastrous war, it by no means followed that he was in the same condition fifteen years afterwards, especially when he swears he was not insolvent, and when it appears that the fact upon which the inference of insolvency in 1865 was based, to wit: his inability to hold property in his own name, had ceased to exist nearly three years before this action was commenced. We think, therefore, that the conclusion of the Circuit judge, that the insolvency of George A. Kinard was made to appear prima facie, if not without any evidence to sustain it, was certainly against the manifest weight of the evidence.

The fifth ground of appeal cannot be sustained. While it is undoubtedly proper that when a receiver is appointed he should be required to give bond, we are not aware of any statute or rule of law which requires that a bond should be exacted from a plaintiff before granting an order for the appointment of a receiver. Inasmuch as the master, a bonded officer of this court, was in the case made practically, though not nominally, receiver, we see no necessity for requiring a special bond from him.

We think, however, that the sixth ground of appeal is well taken, for, while it is true that when a case has been heard upon the merits, the judge before whom it is heard may grant such relief as in his judgment the plaintiff has shown himself legally or equitably entitled to demand, whether such relief is formally demanded or not, yet when a motion is made preliminary to the hearing of a case upon the merits, it seems to us that there is error in going beyond what the party is notified will be asked for, as it may be that he would not desire to oppose the granting of that, but would be disposed to contest the granting of anything more unless it appeared, as it does not in this case, that the party was present at the hearing and decision of the motion *and had an opportunity of being heard upon the question of granting such further relief.

From what we have said, it follows that there was error in referring the whole case to the master to take the testimony and report the same to the court, for on all the legal issues the defendant has a right to have the witnesses examined before a jury, except such witnesses as under statutory provisions may be examined by commission; for, even when testimony is taken by the clerk, under the act of 1872 (15 Stat. 41), the statute secures to either party the right to require the personal attendance and viva voce examination at the trial of the witnesses so examined.

It is true that the affirmative defense set up by the defendant George A. Kinard, that his equitable title arising out of the terms of the paper filed with his answer as Exhibit A., connected with his legal title arising out of the deed of December 18th, 1877, was superior to the lien of the mortgage through which the plaintiff claimed, as one of his sources of title, was a defense of an equitable character, and any testimony for or against that defense could properly be taken by the master even without the consent of the defendant.

The plaintiff, at the conclusion of his argument, takes the position that "this appeal cannot be sustained because none of the points involved were presented to or considered by the court below." If this position could be established, then it would for-low that a party who, from any cause, was prevented from being heard in the Circuit Court and presenting his views before that court, could not be heard here, no matter what might be the errors in the judgment which he desired to appeal from. In this case the appellant has taken his exceptions to the judgment below in the manner prescribed by law, and upon such exceptions he has a right to be heard here even though the points made by such exceptions were not made before the Circuit Court. What we are called upon to do is to review the judgment or order appealed from, and if the appellant, by exceptions properly taken, is able to show any error therein, he is entitled to have such error corrected.

This case differs from the case of Kaminer

v. Hope, 18 S. C. *561, in this respect: There the exceptions pointed only to errors of omission on the part of the Circuit judge, while here the exceptions relate solely to errors of commission. They do not complain, as in Kaminer v. Hope, that the Circuit judge overlooked or omitted any point which should have been considered, but they allege errors in deciding the points presented by the pleadings, and are, in fact, exceptions to the rulings of the Circuit judge, taken in proper time and in proper form.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for such further proceedings, in conformity to the views herein announced, as may be necessary.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur in this judgment in so far as it gives to the defendant George A. Kinard the right of trial by jury. But I am unable to concur in so much of it as sets aside the order of the Circuit judge, requiring the master to let the premises from year to year, and hold the money and securities arising therefrom until the final determination of the action. That order was in the nature of one appointing a receiver for the purpose of preserving the rents and profits during the litigation. Such orders are generally salutary in their operation. The judge who was present on the Circuit and heard the case decided that the prima facie showing made for such an order was sufficient, and it seems to me that it should not be reversed as error of law, as it could only have the salutary effect of preserving the issues of the property pending litigation, then to be delivered to that party who may finally be decided to be entitled to the same.

Judgment reversed.

Before Pressley, J., Laurens, February, 1882.

The opinion states the case. The order of the Circuit judge was as follows:

In this case defendant Charles Jones demurs, and assigns for grounds that the complaint does not set forth a cause of action, and that if plaintiffs have a cause of action, the proceedings should be in partition. The cause of action rests on the will of William Canedy, wherein he gave to Nancy Canedy all his real and personal estate of every description, and all the money due him, to use and dispose of as she may think proper during her natural life. She sold to Charles Jones eighty acres of the land so bequeathed to her, and having since died, her estate in said land is supposed to be ended, and plaintiffs, as heirs-at-law of William Canedy, seek in this action to recover it.

On the first question raised by the demurrer, my judgment is: That Nancy Canedy took only a life-estate in the said land. The words of the will do not make a general gift with power of disposition or appointment. The clause, "during her natural life," qualifies the whole sentence, and the words, "to use and dispose of as she may think proper," were only intended to prevent all interference with her management and use of the property whilst *her estate lasted. I see nothing in said will which indicated that the words "during her natural life" were intended to limit only the "money due." In Moon v. Moon, 2 Strobh. Eq. 327, a limitation somewhat like this was held to apply only to the negroes, not the land. But in that will the negroes were bequeathed to others after the life-estate, and no such disposition was made of the land, either by particular devise or residuary clause. The court held that this difference between the disposition of the land and the negroes indicated an intent to sever the land, from the words "during life." No such intent being indicated in this case, I regard said words as attached to the whole gift.

On the second question my judgment is: That Nancy Canedy, as one of the heirs-at-law of William Canedy, had a share in remainder in said land after the ending of her life-estate, and that her conveyance to Charles Jones gave him title to all she could then claim, or to which she might become entitled in case any of the other heirs of William Canedy should die before her, leaving no issue. This view of the case entitles Charles Jones to have the case proceed in equity, so that out of the eighty acres sold to him by Nancy Canedy her share or shares in the whole tract may be set apart to him. The case is therefore referred to the master to take the testimony, and report who are the heirs-at-law of William Canedy; whether any of them died in the life-time of Nancy Canedy without issue; what are the shares of each in the said land, and any special matter necessary to the final partition of the whole tract of land bequeathed by William Canedy, or the proceeds of the same if it cannot be fairly divided.

Mr. Justice McIVER. These two cases, resting upon the same facts and involving the same legal principles, were heard together on Circuit, and were heard and will be considered together here.

The plaintiffs, as heirs-at-law of William

Canedy, deceased, seek to recover two tracts of land—one in the possession of defendant Jones, and the other in the possession of the defendant Riddle—which had been conveyed to them by Nancy Canedy upon the theory that she had only a life-estate therein, and that upon her death (which occurred prior to the commencement of these actions), the tracts of land in question reverted to the heirs-at-law of said William Canedy. It was conceded that the land belonged to William Canedy at the time of his death, and that he died leaving a will, of which the following is a copy: "In the name of God Amen I William Canedy * * * being desirous to dispose of all such wordly estate as it hath pleased God to bless me with do make and ordain this my last will in manner following I desire that all my just debts and funeral expenses be paid then I give to my daughter Nancy Canedy all my real and personal estate of every description and all the money due me to use and dispose of as she may think proper during her natural life provided she maintains and supports her mother Elizabeth Canedy decently during her life and lastly I do constitute and appoint my daughter Nancy Canedy executrix of this my last will and testament hereby revoking all other and former wills and testaments by me heretofore made."

The questions made turn upon the proper construction of this will. The Circuit judge held that the will conferred only a life-estate upon Nancy, and that upon her death the estate reverted to the heirs of the testator; but that Nancy, being one of the heirs, her share became vested in her alienees, the defendants, Jones and Riddle; and, therefore, that it was a proper case for *partition. He therefore granted orders for the purpose of carrying into effect that view.

The defendants, Jones and Riddle, make three points by this appeal: 1. That by a proper construction of the will of William Canedy, his daughter Nancy took an estate in fee and not a life-estate merely. 2. That if she took only a life-estate, yet she took such estate with power to dispose of the property absolutely; and that having exercised the power by conveying to Jones and Riddle the land in question, they took absolute estates therein. 3. That the plaintiffs having failed to make out the case as stated in their complaints, which were not framed with a view to partition, the complaints should have been dismissed, and it was error to order partition.

First, then, as to the nature of the estate which Nancy Canedy took under a proper construction of the will. The cardinal rule in construing a will is to look for the intention of the testator as expressed in the words of the will. With this view, let us examine carefully the terms used by the testator in this case. In the first place, it must be obvious, even to the casual reader, that the will is not artistically drawn, but is the work of one not familiar with the drawing of such papers. It is embraced in a single sentence, and counsel on both sides state in their argument that it is without punctuation marks of any kind, though the copy set out in the "Case" does exhibit such marks. We may naturally expect, therefore, to find that the testator has expressed his intention in loose and inaccurate language; and, what is most likely in such cases, that the testator would, in the effort to express his meaning, employ more words than were necessary, and, by needless repetition, raise doubts as to what was his real intention.

The next thing that must strike every one upon reading this will is, that it was the intention of the testator to dispose of his entire estate; and that he did not intend to die intestate as to any portion of it. This is clear from the language used in the introductory part of the will, "being desirous to dispose of all such worldly estate as it has pleased God to bless me with." This being so, in order to avoid an intestacy which the testator did not intend, and to make the will operate as a disposition of his entire estate which he did intend, it would be necessary to construe the devise to Nancy as creating an estate in fee instead of a life-estate only. But this is not all; the declared purpose of the testator being to dispose of all his estate, that purpose would be entirely defeated by construing the devise to Nancy as a life-estate, for there is no remainder and no residuary clause in the will, and the result would be that instead of disposing of all his estate, a large portion, perhaps the most valuable portion, of it would be left entirely undisposed of.

Again, the use of the word "estate" implies a fee, for, as is said in 2 Jarm. Wills 132: "It has been long established that a devise of a testator's estate includes not only the corpus of the property but the whole of his interest therein;" and this doctrine has been recognized in at least two of our own cases, Fraser v. Hamilton, 2 Desaus. 573, and Cruger v. Heyward, Id. 422. It being conceded that the testator owned the lands in fee-simple, when he gave all his estate to his daughter, he must be considered upon the authorities above cited to have given the fee to her.

Again, the fact that the estate which he gave to Nancy was charged with the support of her mother, is a strong indication that he intended Nancy to take an absolute estate and not an estate for life merely; for such an estate might not have proved to be of sufficient value to provide for what seemed to be the primary object of the testator—the comfortable support of his widow. Indeed if the widow survived Nancy, which was not by any means impossible, then, if the latter took only a life-estate, the scheme which the testator had provided to effect what is conceded to have been his primary object, would have been defeated. True, in such a case, the widow would have been entitled to one-third of the estate; but that was not the provision which he manifestly intended for her; and it was for him to judge; and he had seen fit to provide that his entire estate should be charged with her support. We are satisfied, therefore, that, looking at the will as a whole, the testator intended, by the words he used, to give to his daughter Nancy an estate in fee-simple and not a life-estate merely.

Is there anything in the will which imperatively demands that we should place a different construction upon the terms of *this will, and thereby defeat what seems to us, from the circumstances above mentioned, to have been in the mind of the testator when he penned his will? It is not sufficient for this purpose that we should find expressions in the will which would render the construction demanded by the general scope of the will doubtful; for, as was said by DeSausure, chancellor, in Waring v. Middleton, 3 Desaus. 251: "It is common, in cases of wills in which there is a clause in the beginning of the will declaring an intention to dispose of the whole of the estate—to infer from thence that, as the testator, avowedly, did not mean to die intestate of any part of the estate, the devise, even of a doubtful nature, should be construed favorably to extend the estate and give a fee-simple to the devisees, because a contrary construction would tend (where there was no residuary clause) to produce an intestacy as to some part of the estate against the express declaration of intent by the testator."

It will be observed that the estate is not given to Nancy for and during the term of her natural life in express terms, as would strike any one, even the most ignorant and inexperienced, as the most natural way of expressing an intention to create a life-estate, but the language used is: "I give to my daughter, Nancy Canedy all my real and personal estate of every description and all the money due me to use and dispose of as she may think proper during her natural life provided she maintains and supports her mother Elizabeth Canedy decently during her life." So that the question is whether the words, "during her natural life," relied upon to cut down Nancy's estate to one for life only, in the connection in which they are found, imperatively demand that we should override what we have seen to be the intent of the testator from the circumstances above referred to?

The words relied upon do not follow the words of gift to Nancy, as it would seem natural that they should do if the intention in using them was to qualify what would, without those words, unquestionably be a gift of the absolute estate, but they follow the words empowering her to use and dispose of the property, and, therefore, there is at least a doubt as to which member of the sentence

they were intended to qualify. It may *be true, as a general rule, that such qualifying words will apply to all the different members of the sentence to which they are annexed, and are not to be limited to that member of the sentence immediately preceding such words, but where, as in this case, there are other terms in the will which demand a different construction from that which would result from applying the qualifying words to the entire sentence, then they must be confined to that member of the sentence which immediately precedes the qualifying words; and this results from the well-settled rule that a will must be so construed as a whole, as to give effect to every part, if possible.

It is argued that if the will had not contained the words "during her natural life," there would have been no doubt that Nancy would have taken an estate in fee, and that these words must have been inserted for some purpose, and that the only purpose of inserting them was to limit the estate which the previous words would have created. There would be very great force in this view if it were not possible to conceive of any other purpose in inserting the words in question. But, is that so? Bearing in mind, as we must do throughout this discussion, that we are undertaking to construe the language of one who was manifestly not capable of expressing his intentions in apt and proper words, and that, as we have seen, there are the strongest indications in the other parts of the will that the testator intended to give to his daughter an estate in fee, let us inquire whether the words in question could not have been used for some other purpose than that of cutting down the estate to a mere life-estate. Might not the testator have supposed that, inasmuch as the estate he intended for his daughter was to be burdened with the charge of supporting her mother, she would not have the right to use and dispose of the same as she might think proper during her life, without special power so to do, and, therefore, these words were inserted for the purpose of giving her that power, provided she maintained and supported her mother? Or, might not the testator have supposed that some such provision was necessary to prevent his daughter from wasting the estate and thereby defeating his primary object—the support of his widow; and hence, the power of disposition was *given to her during her life only, on the condition that she carried out the testator's main object by providing for the support of the old lady? The location of the words in the sentence seem to point to some such conclusion, and, if so, then the insertion of the words in question cannot have the effect of cutting down the estate of Nancy to a life-estate.

It is very true that if the testator intended to give his daughter an estate in fee, there was no necessity to give her the power to use and dispose of it as she might think proper, as that would follow as a necessary incident to the estate created; but it very frequently happens that we find in a will drawn by one unskilled in the preparation of such documents, terms used which are wholly unnecessary to effect the object which the testator had in view. A striking instance of this is found in the will now under consideration, where the testator provides for the support of his widow "during her life," and when such unnecessary terms are found in a will they ought not to be allowed to defeat the manifest intent of the testator, as ascertained from an examination of the will as a whole, where it is possible to put such a construction upon those terms as will not conflict with such manifest intent, even though such construction may not be the one which such terms naturally and usually require.

We are, therefore, of opinion that under a proper construction of the will of William Canedy, his daughter, Nancy Canedy, took an estate in fee, and not a life-estate merely.

But, if it be assumed that Nancy Canedy took an estate for her life only, the next inquiry is whether she took such estate with power to dispose of the same absolutely, or only the power to dispose of it for the term of her natural life. As is said in Sugd. Pow. 459, cited with approval in Fronty v. Fronty, Bailey Eq. 518: "In considering the extent of a power, the intention of the parties must be the guide." The question, then, is, What was the intention of the testator in conferring the power here in question upon his daughter? Was it simply to authorize her to sell the life-estate, or was it for the purpose of enabling her to make an absolute disposition of the property, if she thought proper to do so? In determining this question, it must be remembered that the property did not consist of land only, but *it was all the real and personal property, of every description whatsoever, which the testator owned; and hence, if the power should be limited to the disposition of the life-estate only, then the devisee and legatee could not sell or dispose of any portion of the property absolutely. It can scarcely be supposed that the testator, in giving his entire estate to his daughter with the power to use and dispose of it as she might think proper, with the purpose, primarily, of providing a support for her mother, intended so to hamper it as to prevent his daughter from selling any greater interest than a life-estate in any portion of it, and thus materially decrease the means of accomplishing his primary object.

Again, if the estate given to the daughter was an estate for her life, there would have been no necessity whatever to invest her with power to dispose of such estate, for that she would have, as owner, without the empowering words; and it is difficult, if not impossible, to conceive of any other reason for creating the power than that of enabling the life-tenant to make an absolute disposition of such portions of the estate as she might think proper to dispose of. As is said in Sugd. Pow. 458: "A general power to a tenant for life to grant a term or estate, without specifying the duration of it, will enable him to grant a term beyond his own life, although it defeat the remainders over, for otherwise the power would be merely idle and void, as every tenant for life may alien the estate during his own life." Here the case is much stronger, as there is no remainder over to be defeated. We think it clear that, if the estate of Nancy should be construed to be a life-estate merely, then the effect of the power was to enable the life-tenant to dispose of the estate absolutely and not for her life only, provided she make such disposition "during her natural life."

The cases of Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 74 [8 L. Ed. 322]; Brant v. Virginia Coal and Iron Company, 93 U. S. 326 [23 L. Ed. 927], and Boyd v. Strahan, 36 Ill. 355, relied upon by the respondents to support a contrary view as to the extent of the power here in question, are not, in our judgment, sufficient for that purpose. In the first place we must remember that while a decided case may aid us in ascer*taining the rules of construction, unless it is in every respect like the one under consideration, which rarely happens, it cannot be allowed to have a controlling effect, inasmuch as the object should be in every case to ascertain the intention of the testator from the words which he had used, and unless the language to be construed is identical in both cases, the authority cited, though it may aid us in reaching a proper conclusion, cannot be regarded as absolutely controlling.

In Smith v. Bell, the only question made was as to the nature of the estate created—whether a fee or a life-estate merely—and there was no question raised as to the extent of the power. Therefore all that is said upon that subject was obiter dicta, and, though entitled to great consideration, is not authoritative. In that case, too, there was a remainder over, a very material matter, and was the principal ground upon which the decision was rested. But here there is no remainder over, nor is there a residuary clause.

In Brant v. Virginia Coal and Iron Company, the words of the will were: "I give * * * to my wife, Nancy Sinclair, all my estate, * * * to have and to hold during her life, and to do with as she sees proper before her death"—very different from the words used in Canedy's will. The words used were the apt and technical words by which a life-estate is created, and there could be no doubt as to the nature of the estate which the wife took. So, too, the empowering words were different from those used in the case now in hand. The wife was given a life-estate in express terms, and it was that which she was authorized "to do with as she sees proper before her death," and therefore she could only dispose of the life-estate. But here the estate is given to Nancy Canedy in terms which would carry the fee, and then follow the empowering words.

In Boyd v. Strahan there were two clauses in the will, in one of which the testator gave to his wife certain property absolutely, and in the other he gave her certain other property "to be at her own disposal, and for her own proper use and benefit during her natural life." The decision seems to have turned upon the fact that there were two clauses in which the testator used different language, thereby showing an intent to draw a distinction, and *that by the latter he only intended his wife to take a life-estate with only the incidents of such estate.

If, then, the estate given to Nancy be regarded as a life-estate, with power during her life to dispose of the same absolutely, the exercise of such power in conveying the land in question to the appellants, Jones and Riddle, conferred upon them the fee. Pulham v. Byrd, 2 Strobb. Eq. 142; Scott v. Burt, 9 Rich. Eq. 360, and the authorities cited in those cases. And such being the case, it is clear that the actions in these cases cannot be sustained, and the complaints should have been dismissed.

The judgment of this court is that the judgments of the Circuit Court in both of the cases above stated be reversed, and that the complaints be dismissed.

Before Kershaw, J., Hampton, October, 1881.

The opinion states the case. The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

From these circumstances I find, as matter of fact, that the execution of the mortgage in question was authorized by James G. Varn, Gabriel Varn, and that the same is a good, valid and satisfactory mortgage of the land and other property described therein; that Malcolm V. Wood acquired his interest therein affected by notice and subject to the encumbrance of said *mortgage. When it is considered that the mortgage was so long acted upon by all the parties concerned, and so solemnly and repeatedly recognized and affirmed as a good and valid transaction; that the steam mill, which constituted the principal effective agent of the business, was included with the land upon which it was located in the same mortgage, which was duly recorded; and that the land was then dealt with by the owners as if it were partnership property of the firm, I cannot hesitate as to these findings of fact.

When Wood purchased his interest in the mill he was affected with notice of the mortgage thereof, which was duly recorded—the recording being constructive notice. It was notice of all that the deed contained, and, therefore, notice of the mortgage of the land as the property of the firm. If made with the authority of the legal owners of the land, as presumably it was (and as it is now known to have been), it is in law a good and valid mortgage, because the owners, in that case, would be estopped to deny it. Story Eq. Jur., § 385. It purported to be a valid mortgage. It was capable of being shown to be a valid mortgage, and, therefore, Wood having taken with notice of such a mortgage, he takes subject to its encumbrances where it is shown to be a valid mortgage.

Again, the possession of the land and its use for the purposes of the partnership was notice that it was being dealt with as partnership property, for possession is notice. Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill Eq. 427. Prima facie, it was partnership property, and, but for the admission that it was not actually so, it would have been so held, in accordance with the case of Winslow v. Chiffelle, Harp. Eq. 25, where the circumstances were similar.

The general rule is, that one copartner has no power to bind his copartners by deed, but there are many exceptions. Chancellor Kent says (volume III., page 48): "An absent partner may be bound by a deed executed on behalf of the firm by his copartner, provided there be either a previous parol authority or a subsequent parol adoption of the act. Such authority need not be under seal, nor in writing, nor specially communicated for the purpose, but may be inferred from the partnership itself and from the subsequent conduct of the copartners implying *an assent to the act." Graime v. Seton, 1 Hall 262, cited in note 7. This doctrine has been affirmed by the New York Court of Appeals. Smith v. Kerr, 3 Comst. 144. Judge Story lays down the same doctrine in his work on Partnership, section 120.

Counsel at bar cited also the case of Lawrence v. Taylor, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 107, to the effect that a contract to convey lands belonging to two partners, executed in the name of the firm by one of them, is binding on the firm if done under a previous authority, or if the act be subsequently ratified by the other. In the case of Saunders v. Hughes (not reported), cited by Judge O'Neill in Fleming v. Dunbar, 2 Hill 532, and affirmed in Fant v. West, 10 Rich. 149, and the Bivingsville Man. Co. v. Bobo, 11 Id. 386, the law of the State is declared, that a deed executed by several copartners, by the authority of the others, is valid, and authority may be gathered from any circumstances which create the belief that the absent partners knew of the deed and intended to be bound by it. The law is differently stated elsewhere, but these cases show that here the principle is settled, that such a mortgage as this binds the land to the same extent as if it were the property of the firm.

It follows from this that a subsequent purchaser takes subject to the mortgage, when it has been, as here, duly recorded.

It is ordered and adjudged that it be referred to the clerk of the court to ascertain and report to the court the amount remaining due upon the note secured by the said mortgage; that the plaintiffs have judgment for the sale of said mortgaged premises in satisfaction of the amount which may be found due them, and the costs of this action and for any deficiency that may be left after applying thereto the proceeds of such sale; and that the defendants, and all persons claiming under them, be forever barred and foreclosed of any equity of redemption in the said mortgaged premises, and that plaintiffs have leave to apply at the foot of this judgment at chambers for the confirmation of the report herein directed, and for the sale of said premises, and for such other and further orders as may be necessary to carry the same into effect; that the judgment for any deficiency go only against the defendants, James G. Varn, Gabriel Varn and *Josiah Preacher, surviving partners of the late firm of Varns & Preacher.

Messrs. Howell & Murphy, for appellants.
Mr. C. J. C. Hutson, contra.

April 5th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage on a tract of land in Hampton county, known as the "Ellis land," containing 1,157 acres. It seems that L. B. Varn, James G. Varn, Gabriel Varn and Josiah G. Preacher formed a partnership in the lumber business, under the name and style of "Varns & Preacher;" that they wanted money to build a steam mill, and for that purpose contracted to borrow $2,500 from John D. Stroman, the testator of plaintiffs, and on December 8th, 1870, L. B. Varn, the active member of the concern, executed and delivered to the said Stroman a note, of which the following is a copy:

"$2,500.—By the first day of January, 1872, we promise to pay John D. Stroman the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, for value received, with interest from date, twelve per cent. per annum. Witness our hand and seal this 8th day of December, 1870.

(Signed,) "Varns & Preacher. [Seal.]"

And, in order to secure said note, the said L. B. Varn, on the same day and in the same manner, signed a mortgage of the aforesaid tract of land. At that time the title to the land was in James G. Varn and Gabriel Varn, who had given no written authority to the said L. B. Varn to execute the mortgage; but there is reason to believe that it was done with their knowledge and consent, the mortgage stating that "we, L. B. Varn, James G. Varn, Gabriel Varn and Josiah G. Preacher (under the name and style of Varns & Preacher), do grant," &c., and including other property, in these words: "together with a steam mill that we are about erecting on said land," &c. The mill was built, and the business of the firm there conducted. Preacher afterwards sold his interest in the business to one Malcolm V.

*Wood, who took his place in the firm, and on January 4th, 1872, the two partners who had legal title to the land, conveyed by deed, for valuable consideration, one-fourth interest in the same to the said Wood, and another one-fourth interest to L. B. Varn, making the four partners equal in the land, as they were in the business. In 1874 Wood died intestate, leaving as his heirs-at-law his widow, Rebecca A. Wood, and two children, James L. and Mary M. Wood, who are parties defendant, and in 1878 L. B. Varn died intestate, leaving a widow, Mary Varn, and six children, all of whom are also parties, but did not answer the complaint.

Credits appear upon the note, $500 on January 1st, 1872, and $1,600 March 2d, 1875, leaving a balance still due and unpaid. James G. Varn wrote letters to John D. Stroman in his lifetime, and after his death to his widow executrix, fully recognizing the mortgage as a valid instrument; and L. B. Varn, after Wood came into the firm, wrote many letters in the name of the new firm, Varns & Wood, asking indulgence, and otherwise recognizing the validity of the mortgage. On March 1st, 1876, L. B. Varn, James G. Varn, Gabriel Varn and Rebecca Wood joined in making a deed to plaintiff's testator, conveying to him absolutely the mortgaged premises, in consideration of $1,771.04, with the understanding that he was to sell the property and pay the balance due on the mortgage, and turn over the remainder to the said parties; but it does not appear that these papers were ever delivered or acted upon.

John D. Stroman died in 1877, leaving a will, of which the plaintiffs are executors, who brought this action to foreclose the mortgage on the afore-mentioned tract of land, for the payment of the balance due upon the note. James G. Varn and Gabriel Varn answered, claiming that the tract of land was their individual property, and not that of the firm of Varns & Preacher, when the mortgage was signed by L. B. Varn, and also denying that the act of L. B. Varn in signing the sealed note and mortgage in the name of "Varns & Preacher" was the act of the four partners, including themselves. And Rebecca A. Wood answered, denying that her husband, Malcolm V. Wood, in purchasing the share of Preacher, acquired any interest in said land, *but that he purchased one-fourth interest from James G. and Gabriel Varn after the alleged mortgage was executed, and that he was purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of any encumbrance thereon.

The cause came on to be heard by Judge Kershaw, who gave judgment of foreclosure against all the parties, and they appeal to this court upon the following grounds: "1. For that his Honor erred in holding that the mortgage mentioned and described in the plaintiff's complaint was valid and a lien upon the interest of these defendants in the premises. 2. For that his Honor erred in holding that the recording of the mortgage was constructive notice to M. V. Wood, the intestate of defendants; Rebecca A. Wood, James L. Wood and Henry M. Wood. 3. For that his Honor erred in his finding of fact in this, that he decides that the saw-mill was erected upon the mortgaged premises, there being no proof before the court to that effect, and, as a matter of fact, the mill was not so located. 4. For that his Honor's decree was otherwise contrary to the law and unsupported by the evidence."

We concur with the Circuit judge for the reasons given in his decree. We understand that the mill was built on the Ellis land, which, to that extent, at least, was used for partnership purposes, and that would seem to indicate that it was considered to be partnership property, although the legal title was at that time in two of the four partners. This view is strengthened by the fact that afterwards one-fourth of it was conveyed to L. B. Varn and the like interest to M. V. Wood. But as the third exception denies that the mill was located on the mortgaged premises, we will assume that when the note and mortgage were given, the land was the individual property of James G. and Gabriel Varn. They were, nevertheless, partners, and the land passed under the mortgage, and is bound by that instrument, if the execution of the note and mortgage by L. B. Varn alone, was, as the mortgage itself recites, the act and deed of all the partners, including the said James G. and Gabriel.

It is true that the general rule is that one partner cannot bind his copartners by a writing under seal, for the reason that such writing, importing a consideration, is considered beyond the *scope of partnership dealings, which are ordinarily carried on with negotiable paper; but there are well recognized exceptions. As we understand it, the object of the rule is to protect partners against the consequences of unauthorized acts on the part of their associates, and, if so, it would not promote, but tend to defeat that object, to apply the rule indiscriminately in all cases, whether the other partners authorized the act or not. We think it settled, in this State, that one partner may bind his copartners by deed, if the other partners are present and expressly authorize the act, or the evidence of their conduct and course of business is such as to justify the inference that such authority was given. Fleming v. Dunbar, 2 Hill 532; [Lucas v. Sanders] 1 McMull. 312; Fant v. West, 10 Rich. 151. In the case last cited, Judge Wardlaw said: "The single bill was not void, but if executed by one partner with sufficient authority from the other, bound both. The validity then depended upon evidence to be judged by the jury. The evidence may have authorized an inference that such authority had been given, and that was a question for the jury. The consideration of the single bill, beneficial to both parties, and the course of dealing shown by their conduct in reference to other such bills, were circumstances proper for the consideration of the jury," &c.

In the case before us, the Circuit judge held "as matter of fact that the execution of the mortgage in question was authorized by James G. Varn and Gabriel Varn, and that the same is a good, valid and satisfactory mortgage of the land;" and we think the finding was well sustained by the evidence. Both from the declarations and conduct of the partners, we are satisfied that the testator of the plaintiffs loaned the money on the credit of all the partners, and the faith that the mortgage, as represented, gave a lien on the land; that the partnership received the benefit of the money, and all the partners not only expressly authorized the execution of the note and mortgage by L. B. Varn, but acknowledged the validity of both at different times and in various ways for a series of years. Both James G. and Gabriel admitted, in their testimony, that they authorized the transaction. It is true that James G., upon his being recalled, stated that he had objected to two hundred acres on which *he lived being included, "but that Mr. Preacher and his brother stated on their return [we suppose from the execution of the papers] that they had forgotten, and included this in the mortgage." He afterwards made no objection, and wrote letters to Stroman, recognizing the mortgage as it stood, and not only signed the absolute deed of the land to Stroman when the compromise was attempted, but his wife relinquished her dower in the same.

It is urged, however, that this principle applies only to partnerships, and that it cannot apply to the mortgage on the land, which was not partnership property, and even an express verbal authority to give the note and mortgage for all the partners could not be legally executed by L. B. Varn in the firm name of "Varns & Preacher." It will be observed that although the mortgage was signed "Varns & Preacher," it purports to convey directly the individual shares of all the principals, as follows: "Know all men by these presents that we L. B. Varn, James G. Varn, Gabriel Varn and Josiah B. Preacher (under the name and style of Varns & Preacher), have granted, bargained, sold and released, * * * to John D. Stroman, all that plantation," &c., &c. The signature, Varns & Preacher, was the manner in which all the parties, individually, chose to convey. Varnum, Fuller & Co. v. Evans, 2 McM. 412, and authorities.

In that case it is said: "In Pryor v. Coulter, 1 Bail. 517, and Welsh v. Parish, 1 Hill 155, there was nothing on the face of the deeds which showed that the act done was 'in the name and in behalf' of the principal. Each purported to be the act of A. B., attorney of C. D., and hence the deeds could not be the deeds of the principals. The difference between those cases and this makes a plain and obvious distinction. This, although signed and sealed by the attorney, is declared to be by the authority and in the name and in behalf of the principals, which was the same as if the attorney had said, 'By the authority of the principals and in their names and stead, I sign, seal and deliver this deed,' &c. In this case the person who signed and sealed the mortgage did more, the parties named conveyed through him, under the name and style of "Varns & Preacher." Besides, the parties received the consideration, and in many ways ratified the mortgage and admitted its validity, and cannot now be heard to deny it. 3 Kent 48; State v. S. & U. R. R. Company, 8 S. C. 130.

But it is further objected that this cannot apply to the fourth of the land conveyed to M. V. Wood in 1872, after the note and mortgage were executed. The obvious answer to this is, as held by the Circuit judge, that the mortgage was recorded and Wood had at least constructive notice of it; and in addition it seems to us that it is fairly inferable from the history of the case that he had actual notice. Wood purchased the interest of Preacher, and came into the concern as his privy. Gabriel Varn, in one of his many letters to Stroman, over the signature of Varns & Wood, (October 28th, 1874,) said: "Dr. M. V. Wood bought Major J. G. Preacher's share of the mill, and we are told by three different lawyers that the mill property cannot be sold by creditors until he has been dead nine months." During the two years from 1872 until he died, in 1874, Wood most probably joined in all of the appeals which were made in the name of the new firm to Mr. Stroman for indulgence, and his widow joined in the execution of an absolute title to the land to Stroman in their effort to make a compromise.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

BOARD OF HARBOR COMMISSIONERS v. PASHLEY.

(November Term, 1882.)

[Commerce ⇨ 78.]

Under a statute which created a board of harbor commissioners for the port of Charleston, authority was given to this board to levy such fees and harbor or port charges as were necessary to pay its officers and to defray its expenses. The board imposed a scale of charges, according to kind, upon all vessels entering that port, the amount in each case being determined by the "length over all" in feet. Held, that the charge not being for services rendered to a vessel, it was a tonnage duty, which is prohibited by the constitution of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 57; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 78.]

Before Aldrich, J., Charleston, July, 1882.

*316

*This was an action commenced in April, 1882, by the Board of Harbor Commissioners of Charleston against Frank Pashley, master, and the owners of the schooner "Marcus Edwards," for the recovery of $5.90. The case seems to have been tried by the Circuit judge. He rendered the following judgment:

This is a case brought for the enforcement of certain fees charged under act of Assembly known as the Harbor Commission Act (17 Stat. 604). The allegations of the complaint are all admitted, viz.: That the schooner "Marcus Edwards" did, on the tenth day of March, 1882, arrive at the port of Charleston; that Frank Pashley, master, reported her arrival to the harbor master, and recorded her name, tonnage, length and description of the vessel; that the fee of $5.90 was demanded of said Pashley by the proper officer of the Board of Harbor Commissioners, and that payment of the same was refused.

The act provides that the Board of Harbor Commissioners "shall be and are hereby invested with full power and authority to levy and collect from all vessels entering into and trading with the port of Charleston such fees and harbor or port charges, not inconsistent with law, as in their discretion may be necessary to pay the said harbor master and port wardens for the services required of them, and to defray the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the duties devolved upon the said board under this act." In accordance with which, the said board ordained a scale of charges, in proportion to the length over all of such vessels as should become liable to port charges, the charges for fore-and-aft schooners being five cents per foot. The account sought to be collected is in conformity to this scale, and amounts to $5.90.

The defendant alleges that the said vessel was, at the time mentioned in the complaint, and now is an American vessel, owned by citizens of States of the United States other than the State of South Carolina, duly licensed for the coasting trade, and engaged in commerce and navigation between the several States of the United States, and that the said clearing tax and fee claimed are expressly prohibited by section 10, article I., constitution of the United States.

*Section 10, article I., constitution United States, or so much thereof as may be applicable to this case, is as follows:

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws.

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, levy any duty on tonnage."

Chief Justice Marshall says this constitutional prohibition is on the taxing power, not on that to regulate commerce. Hence, if the object of this act is to regulate commerce and not to raise a revenue, it does not come within the constitutional inhibition. What then is the object of the act? Clearly to establish a police for the harbor and to assist ships trading with the port of Charleston to discharge and take in freights with dispatch and safety by enforcing a system of harbor regulations. There is no provision for raising revenue, because the act expressly limits the power of the board to levy and collect "such fees and harbor or port charges * * * as may be necessary to pay the said harbor master and port wardens for the services required of them, and to defray the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the duties devolved upon the said board under the act." And the ratio of the charges indicates that it can be intended only to defray the necessary expenses of such a system.

It is objected that this is a charge without reciprocal services. But the services are sufficiently rendered by the board of commissioners holding themselves in readiness and being prepared to facilitate and promote the interests of commerce within the port, and non constat that special services were not rendered to this particular vessel.

It is further objected that the charge is a tax on tonnage. If this were so it would clearly be a violation of the letter of the constitution, and not of its spirit and intent, for we have seen that it was not the object of the act to raise revenue. But the word "tonnage" is not used in the act nor in the scale of charges, as passed by the board, but the charge is made upon the "length over all." In my judgment, length bears no direct relation to tonnage. The terms are not synonymous, so that the letter, as well as the spirit, of the constitutional provision remain intact.

*It is, therefore, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff have judgment against the defendants in the sum of $5.90, with interest from the 10th day of March, 1882, and the costs of this action.

From this judgment the defendants appealed upon the ground that the tax, fee or charge demanded and sued for in the complaint, and for which judgment was rendered by his Honor, Judge Aldrich, is prohibited by section 10, Article I., constitution of the United States.

Mr. J. P. K. Bryan, for appellant.

Mr. W. St. J. Jervey, contra.

April 19th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action to recover the amount of certain port charges imposed upon the schooner "Marcus Edwards" by the plaintiff, by virtue of authority conferred upon said board by an act of the legislature of this State of December 24th, 1880, (17 Stat. 398,) as amended by act of December 20th, 1881, (17 Stat. 604.) This vessel was admitted to be an American vessel, owned by citizens of States of the United States other than the State of South Carolina, duly licensed for the coasting trade, and engaged in commerce and navigation between the several States of the United States. The fees or charges fixed by the board were to be "charged upon all vessels arriving at this port," [Charleston, South Carolina,] and the amount of such fees or charges was to be determined by "the length over all" of the vessel, according to a certain classification fixed by the board, the rate in the case under consideration being five cents "per foot of length over all."

It will be observed that the charge was to be exacted from "all vessels arriving at this port," and that there is no intimation that such charge was to be made as a compensation for any services rendered said vessel, but, on the contrary, it appears from the terms of the act that the said board was "invested with full power and authority to levy and collect from all vessels entering into and trading with the port of Charleston, such fees *and harbor or port charges, not inconsistent with law, as, in their discretion, may be necessary to pay the harbor master and port wardens for the services required of them, and to pay the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the duties devolved upon the said board under this act."

It is conceded that the "Marcus Edwards" did enter the port of Charleston, and that demand was duly made for the charges as fixed by the resolution of the board, which was not complied with, but there was no evidence that any service was rendered such vessel for which such charges were demanded as compensation. The appellants contend that the charges thus demanded of this vessel are expressly prohibited by certain provisions of the constitution of the United States. The clauses of the constitution relied upon are as follows: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." Art. I., § 8. "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws. No State shall, without the consent of Congress, levy any duties on tonnage." Art. I., § 10. So that the question for us to determine is whether such charges as this now under consideration are prohibited by these constitutional provisions.

This being a question arising under the constitution of the United States, it is proper that we should look to and be governed by the decisions of that tribunal which has been invested with final jurisdiction of such questions—the Supreme Court of the United States. That court has had before it, upon numerous occasions, questions similar to the one now under consideration, and we think that the principles upon which the decision of the question depends have been fully settled. In Steamship Co. v. Port Wardens, 6 Wall. 31 [18 L. Ed. 749], the constitutionality of a statute of Louisiana, which provided that the master and wardens of the port of New Orleans should be entitled to demand and receive, in addition to other fees, the sum of five dollars, whether called on to perform any service or not, from every vessel arriving in that port, was brought in question. The court held the statute to be in violation of the constitution of the United States, as being not only a regulation of commerce, but, also, an attempt to impose a duty on tonnage.

Chase, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, used this language: "We think, also, that the tax imposed by the act of Louisiana is, in the fair sense of the word, a duty on tonnage. In the most obvious and general sense, it is true, these words describe a duty proportioned to the tonnage of the vessel; a certain rate on each ton. But, it seems plain that, taken in this restricted sense, the constitutional provision would not fully accomplish its intent. The general prohibition upon the States against levying duties on imports or exports would have been ineffectual if it had not been extended to duties on the ships, which serve as the vehicles of conveyance. This extension was doubtless intended by the prohibition of any duty of tonnage. It was not only a pro rata tax which was prohibited, but any duty on the ship, whether a fixed sum upon its whole tonnage, or a sum to be ascertained by comparing the amount of tonnage with the rate of duty."

From this view of the constitutional provision, we conclude that the proper construction is that it was designed to forbid the levying of any tax upon a vessel as such, whether the amount of such tax was to be ascertained by reference to the tonnage capacity of the vessel, or by any other mode of measurement. This case has been fully recognized in a number of subsequent cases. See State Tonnage Tax Cases, 12 Wall. 218 [20 L. Ed. 370]; Cannon v. New Orleans, 20 Wall. 581 [22 L. Ed. 417]; Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, 94 U. S. 245, [24 L. Ed. 118]; Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 86 [24 L. Ed. 377]. That it is wholly immaterial whether the amount of the tax is to be ascertained by reference to the tonnage of the vessel eo nomine, or in some other way, is fully shown by the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has, in several cases, held that a charge imposed upon a vessel, even though measured by its tonnage eo nomine, is not in violation of the constitution of the United States where the charge is made as a compensation for services rendered such vessel; as, for example, a charge for the use of a wharf owned by a municipal corporation, even though the amount of such charge should, in express terms, be measured by the tonnage of the vessel, because that is a matter resting in contract, and is the non v. New Orleans, supra; Packet Co. v. Keokuk, supra; Packet Co. v. St. Louis, 100 U. S. 423 [25 L. Ed. 688]; Vicksburg v. Tobin, 100 U. S. 430 [25 L. Ed. 690]; Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, 105 U. S. 559 [26 L. Ed. 1, 169].

*321

But where, as in the case of Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, 94 U. S. 238 [24 L. Ed. 118], the legislature of New York undertook to pass an act requiring all ships or vessels, with certain exceptions, entering the port of New York, or loading or unloading, or making fast to any wharf therein, to pay a certain percentage per ton, the act was held unconstitutional, not because the amount to be paid was to be measured by the tonnage of the vessel, but because the charge was exacted for simply entering the port, and not for any service rendered. As was said in the opinion of the court: "The name is immaterial; it is the substance we are to consider." And again: "The tax imposed is not merely a mode of measuring the compensation to be paid. The answer to this suggestion is that it is exacted where there is nothing to be paid for." In Peete v. Morgan, 19 Wall. 581 [22 L. Ed. 201], it was held that a State cannot, in order to defray the expenses of her quarantine regulations, impose a tonnage tax on vessels owned in foreign ports and entering her harbors in pursuit of commerce. In Alexander v. Railroad Company, 3 Strobh. 594, recognized and approved in State v. City Council of Charleston, 4 Rich. 288, the Court of Errors of this State held that an ordinance of the city council of Charleston, providing that certain vessels arriving in the port of Charleston should pay to the harbor master one cent per ton, once in every three months, was a tonnage duty, and as such prohibited by the constitution of the United States. The court, manifestly, did not base its opinion upon the fact that the amount of the charge was to be measured by the tonnage of the vessel, for O'Neill, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, used this language: "But, it is said, the imposition of tonnage in this case is merely a mode by which the plaintiff is to ascertain his fees; and it is so called in the ordinance; 'the above fees,' is its language. I should think there would be great force in this view if it were so that the harbor master rendered any service for the defendant. * * * For, in such a case, although the letter of the constitution might be violated, yet its true meaning would be untouched." This shows that Judge O'Neill took the same view which was subsequently adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States and acted upon in several cases above cited; that where the charge is for service rendered it is wholly immaterial whether the amount of compensation is to be measured by the tonnage of the vessel eo nomine, or by any other mode of measurement, as courts look to the substance and not merely to the form of words. It is clear that the court in the Alexander case did not rest its conclusion upon the fact that the charge was imposed in express terms upon the tonnage of the vessel, but upon the fact that the charge was imposed, not for any service rendered, but simply for entering the port, and that it was a tax or duty and not merely a charge for compensation for services rendered. In the same case Judge O'Neill goes on to say: "The distinction between a tax or duty and fees or charges is, that the former is imposed by the sovereign authority without any regard to a corresponding and equivalent benefit or advantage; the latter proceed upon the quid pro quo, and unless service be rendered nothing is to be paid."

Looking at the case now before the court in the light of these authorities, we do not see how it is possible to resist the conclusion that the charge in question is a violation of the constitution of the United States. It was not a charge for any service rendered, for none was rendered, but, as said by Swayne, J., in Packet Co. v. Keokuk, supra: "It was a sovereign exaction, not a charge for compensation." It was imposed by the sovereign authority, acting through the agency delegated for that purpose, without any regard to a corresponding equivalent benefit or advantage, and it was, therefore, a tax or duty and not fees or charges. Every vessel, upon entering the port, was liable to pay such charges whether it received any service or not. Its manifest object was to provide the means of paying the officers of the State and the expenses incident to the performance of their duties, and cannot be regarded as anything more or less than as a tax to raise a revenue for that purpose; and we see no reason why, with just as much reason, the

*323

State might not *levy a similar contribution upon every vessel entering the port of Charleston, for the purpose of contributing to the means necessary to pay the police who are charged with the duty of preserving order on the wharves as well as in other parts of the city; and this no one would contend for.

If, as was held in Peete v. Morgan, supra, the State cannot impose such a tax for the purpose of defraying the expenses of her quarantine regulation—a matter in which all vessels entering a port are interested—it is not easy to perceive how the authority to impose such a tax for the purpose of defraying the expenses of its harbor commission could be sustained. The fact that the amount of the charge in the case now in hand was not to be ascertained by reference to the tonnage of the vessel, but was to be measured by another mode—"the length over all," which, it seems, is not one of the elements to be considered in calculating the tonnage of a vessel under the rule prescribed by section 4153, Revised Statutes of the United States—cannot, as we have seen, affect the question. To give the word of the constitution such a narrow and restricted sense would not fully accomplish its intent. As said by Mr. Chief Justice Chase, in Steamship Co. v. Port Wardens, supra: "It was not only a pro rata tax which was prohibited, but any duty on the ship, whether a fixed sum upon its whole tonnage, or a sum to be ascertained by comparing the amount of tonnage with the rate of duty;" or by any other mode of measurement, we may add, as a necessary consequence of the language quoted.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Before Fraser, J., Spartanburg, July, 1881. The opinion states the case.

The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

The questions to be settled now, are—

1. What are the rights of the several parties under this will, under a proper construction of its terms? 2. Did the Probate judge have the right to adjust the equities of the parties and order a sale of this land for this purpose? Both questions are involved in doubt, and I approach them with misgivings.

The inquiry in all these cases is not what the testator intended to put in his will, but what intention is expressed by the will. The first is to make a will, and the second is to interpret or construe it. The testimony of Mr. Bomar, the ordinary, who drew this will, is not competent to show that a technical word in the will was used in other than a technical sense. He, of all others, ought to have known the meaning of such words. The memoranda found after testator's death, in his handwriting, are not admissible to explain the meaning of the words used in this *will, and, if admissible, could give no aid. The words must be held to their true and technical import, unless controlled by the context of the will itself, and the context may show that they have another meaning, and when this is done we find the intention of the testator, which is to govern. Words are to be construed in "their strict and primary acceptation," unless they appear, from the context of the will, to be used "in a different sense," in which case they will be so construed. Wigr. & O'H. Wills, Prop. I., p. 15.

I. In the fourth clause of the will, testator wills and bequeaths to Mrs. Thomas for life, &c., one of the parcels of land. In the seventh clause he directs that if the appraisement "heretofore directed, shows any inequality in the value of the legacies to my children, for the purpose of making them all equal the legatee or legatees receiving the larger shares shall pay in money to those receiving the smaller shares" until they are made equal, and if Mrs. Thomas shall be entitled to any money, the same to be paid to a trustee. Does the words "legatee" include Mrs. Thomas and "legacy" include the land? Now the property directed to be appraised in the will "heretofore," i. e., before the seventh clause, was the land, the slaves given to Calvin Poole, and the railroad and bank stock to Washington Poole. If, under this clause, two legatees are to pay, then to whom, unless it is to a third or fourth who gets land? It seems to me that there is no escape from the conclusion that one to whom land is given is called in this clause a legatee, because only two, Calvin and Washington Poole, get personalty out of that appraised property. This conclusion is strengthened by the proviso in this clause that if Mrs. Thomas is to get money, it must be paid to her trustee. This proviso cannot refer to the money to be received under the ninth clause out of the residue, because that clause contains a similar proviso, that the money shall go into the hands of her trustee.

I see nothing in this clause, or in any subsequent part of the will, to require the word "children" to be construed to mean or to include grandchildren. Testator seems to have been careful to say "children" when he meant it, and "grandchildren" when he was providing for them. The word "children" is used with *a qualification, however, in one clause, as we shall hereafter see. 1 Jarm. Wills, § 684-5. It is, therefore, held that in the seventh clause the word "legacy" includes the land given to Mrs. Thomas, and the word "children" includes only Mrs. Thomas, Calvin and Washington Poole, and that by its provision they are to be equalized out of the property given to them and ordered "to be appraised" in the second clause of the will.

II. The ninth clause directs a sale of the residue and the payment of debts, and then the balance to be equally divided among my children, share and share alike, according to the statute of distributions, with a proviso that any money coming to Mrs. Thomas shall be paid to her trustee. In the tenth clause of the will, it is provided that "if the value (of the land given to the two sons of Luther Poole) amounts to more than equal share, they are to pay cash in money to their brother and sisters until all are equal." Whence the doubt on the testator's mind as to the value of the land amounting to more than equal share, unless he had made some provision in the will for this brother and sisters (children of Luther Poole, and, therefore, his grandchildren)? No other clause contains any provision for them, and, it seems to me, that the qualification of children in the ninth clause, by the words "according to the statute of distributions," shows that this is the true construction of the will, and that the three children, Mrs. Thomas, Calvin and Washington Poole, and the grandchildren, children of Luther Poole, take this residuum "according to the statute" per stirpes, and it is so held. Ruff v. Rutherford, Bailey Eq. 11; Izard v. Izard, 2 Desaus. 309; 2 Wms. Ex. 802; Wigr. & O'H. Wills, Prop. 1, p. 15.

III. If these views are correct, then the proper construction of the tenth clause is that William Thomas Poole and James Buchanan Poole take the land under the third clause of the will, after the death of the widow, subject to a charge to make "their brother and sisters equal" to themselves, taking into the estimate what is received under the ninth clause out of the residuum and the value of the land, and it is so held.

The testator made a specific provision for his widow, most of which was absolute; he gave a specific legacy to John Washing*ton Thomas, a grandson; he gave his own children certain property, out of which, as amongst themselves, they were to be made equal; and he gave certain property to the children of Luther Poole, a deceased son, out of which they were to be made equal as amongst themselves, leaving only the residuum as a common fund. He intended to make them equal, but prescribed the mode in which this equality should be attained, and his will on this subject must govern, even if it fails to produce equality.

If, however, the Probate Court had jurisdiction over these matters, this court can review its judgment only on appeal and not here. The Court of Probate, by article IV., section 20 of constitution, has "jurisdiction in all matters testamentary and of administration." The court never assumed to exercise jurisdiction in partition of real estate under this section, but in pursuance of authority conferred by an act of the legislature. Davenport v. Caldwell. This act has been held by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional. The Supreme Court, however, has held that the Probate Court has jurisdiction to order the sale of real estate in aid of assets for the payment of debts, because, by law, real estate had been made assets for this purpose. McNamee v. Waterbury [4 S. C. 156]. Even on this the court was divided. The word "administration" has been always held to apply to the control of the personal estate of a deceased person, and never to realty, and the ruling of our Supreme Court is the only exception, and, perhaps, rendered necessary by the statute making real estate assets for the payment of debts, and existing when the constitution was adopted. 1 Jarm. Wills, p. 1; 4 Blacks. Com., chaps. XXIII, XXXII.

There has been the same uniform usage in reference to the word "testamentary" in English and American law. It is true that a last will and testament covers both legacies and devises and disposes of real and personal estates. If the constitution had used the words "wills" or "devises" there would have been no doubt that it would have conferred juris-isdiction over real as well as personal estates. This will, perhaps, be admitted, but it may be said that when, by the terms of a will, real estates are subjected to the payment of debts and legacies, then, by analogy to *the power to sell real estate for debts, the Probate Court can sell real estate to pay and equalize legacies. By act of the legislature under a different constitution, ordinaries had power in certain cases to sell land for division and partition and for the payment of debts, but never without such authority. The power to subject lands to the payment of debts and legacies, unless it was done in pursuance of some special power, in the will, was always a matter of special equity jurisdiction, and it is so yet. Sharsw. Bl., bk. 3, p. 95, and notes; 1 Story Eq., § 602. It is not consistent with public policy that the estates, and especially real estates of married women, minors and absent defendants, shall be subjected in the almost private way in which these proceedings are taken in the Probate Court, to the judgment of officers who, though of high integrity, have, for many reasons, very little experience in adjusting the very delicate and often very difficult questions which arise in these causes.

In the review taken by the court of this case the parties have fallen into a very common error, and Washington Poole, who has been without fault, ought to be protected as far as he can be consistently with the legal rights of the other parties, but no further.

The Court of Probate has no power to appoint a trustee, the act of the legislature giving this power being void for the same reason that it could not confer jurisdiction in partition. The payment, therefore, to John W. Thomas, as trustee for Mrs. Thomas, is void, and her share will have to be paid to a trustee appointed by this court.

William Thomas Poole and James Buchanan Poole took under the will an interest in fee in the land, subject to the payments ordered in the will "to their brother and sisters." Their interest was not of the same kind. While the two named took real estate under the will, the others took only money, though raised out of the land, and the same is true as to all the children of Calvin Poole. If, therefore, either William Thomas Poole or James Buchanan Poole has received his share of the land after coming of age, the one so receiving is estopped from claiming any further interest in the land or disputing, to that extent, the title of Washington Poole; but, if the share of *either was paid to a guardian, then such payment is void, the guardian having no authority to consent to an unauthorized sale of the minors' land. Sm. Lead Cas., p. 662; 6 Wait. Ac. & Def., p. 687. The interest of the other children of Luther Poole, and of the children of Calvin Poole, which was paid to their guardians, was properly paid and amounts to a payment pro tanto on their share. The money was paid by the administrator, and, though it was irregularly raised, I do not see how they can object to the mode. They cannot be estopped, however, from claiming an additional sum which the land may bring under a valid sale by order of this court, over and above the amount already paid. Washington Poole is entitled to their share, as of the day of the payment to the guardians.

If this is such an action for the recovery of land as to entitle Washington Poole to make his claim for betterments and improvements, such claim is more properly made after the judgment is rendered in this action, and then the sixth section, General Statutes, 1872, page 560, may affect the question of mesne profits. All these questions should be left open and parties be allowed to take such action as may be suggested to them by counsel, and the report be recommitted to the referee.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the said two parcels of land be sold by the sheriff of Spartanburg county. * * *

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, Duncan & Cleveland, for Washington Poole, appellant.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson, Ralph K. Carson, for the other appellants.

April 19th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Elisha Poole, late of Spartanburg county, died in March, 1865, leaving of force a last will and testament. He also left surviving three children, and the children of a deceased son, Luther Poole. He died possessed of certain real estate, located in said county, and, also, of personal property.

In the second clause of his will he directed his land, three slaves and his stock in the South Carolina Railroad and South *Western Railroad Bank to be appraised, after dividing his land into two tracts.

In the third clause he "bequeathed" to his wife, Harriet Poole, during her life, one of these tracts, the homestead, and, at her death, to his two grandsons, William Thomas Poole and Buchanan Poole, to be divided as nearly equally between them as practicable, both as to quality and quantity. He, also, in this clause, gave to his wife a negro boy, Ben, and, at her death, to his grandson John Washington Thomas. The two first named grandsons were two of the children of his deceased son Luther, and John Washington Thomas was the son of his daughter Martha C. Thomas, one of the plaintiffs.

In the fourth clause he devised the other half of his land to his daughter Martha C. Thomas, during her natural life, and, at her death, to be equally divided between and among her children, share and share alike; but, should his daughter die leaving no child or children or lineal descendant surviving her, he then directed that said land be sold, and the proceeds divided among his children. * * *

In the fifth clause he bequeathed to his son Calvin Poole, the three negroes he had directed previously to be appraised. In the sixth he bequeathed his railroad stock to his son Washington Poole.

In the seventh he stated "that it was his will and desire that, should the appraisement before directed show any inequality in the value of the 'legacies' to his children, for the purpose of making them all equal the legatee or legatees receiving the larger share or shares, shall pay in money to those receiving the smaller share or shares until all shall be equal, before they shall be entitled to receive these legacies; provided, that should my daughter Martha C. Thomas be entitled to any money, the same shall be paid to John B. Cleveland, whom I hereby appoint her trustee." * * *

In the ninth clause he directed that all the rest and residue of his personal estate * * * should be sold * * * and, after payment of debts, the proceeds to be equally divided between his children, share and share alike, the portion going to his daughter Martha C. Thomas, to be paid to her trustee.

*In the tenth he said: "In order to make my grandchildren, the children of my deceased son Luther Poole, equal in the distribution of my estate, I will and devise that the land bequeathed to them in the 3d clause of my will, be taken at valuation, and if the value thereof amounts to more than equal share, that they pay back in money to their brothers and sisters until all are made equal."

No executor was appointed in the will, and Washington Poole, a son of the deceased, administered with the will annexed. The appraisement of the property directed in the will to be appraised was had, and the administrator with the will annexed, finding it utterly impracticable to carry out the provisions of the will according to its terms, (because of the fact that the equalization directed could not be made, the parties being unwilling and unable to take the bequests and devises upon the conditions imposed, and because of the emancipation of the slaves,) with the knowledge and consent of most of the parties of age, if not all, and, as it seems, at the earnest solicitation of Mrs. Thomas, one of the plaintiffs herein, instituted proceedings in the Probate Court, in the nature of an action for partition, the purpose being, as stated in the petition, to have the real estate and railroad stock sold, and the estate settled according to the spirit of the will. The minors were all mentioned, and process prayed to bring all parties in, and guardians ad litem appointed for the minors to superintend and protect their interests, but no process was asked to bring in such of the plaintiffs in this action who are the children of Mrs. Thomas, it being understood that they had no such interest in the estate as entitled them to be made parties.

The Probate Court entertained jurisdiction, and finally made the following decree, to wit: "The parties in interest in this proceeding having had notice of the same and having appeared, do consent that all the land be sold. It is therefore ordered that the land, together with the railroad stock, all be sold on the first Monday in November next, or on some suitable salesday thereafter, on one and two years' credit, with interest from date, except costs, which must be in cash on day of sale. This 11th day of October, A. D.

1872." The sale took place under *this order, and a settlement of the estate was made in the Probate Court in December, 1874, by which the proceeds were divided in equal shares between Washington Poole and Mrs. Thomas, the two living children of the testator, and the heirs of Calvin Poole and the heirs of Luther Poole, the two deceased sons of the testator. In accordance with this settlement, the proceeds have been in part, if not in whole, paid to the parties, or to their guardians; the portion going to Mrs. Thomas having been paid to a trustee, John W. Thomas, her son, who, upon her petition, had been appointed her trustee by the Probate Court, and who had given a sufficient bond with justified surety. The plaintiffs, Mrs. Thomas and her husband, and John W. Thomas, the trustee, it appears, were present at the sale and at the settlement, and not only made no objections, but were active in bringing it about.

The proceeding now before the court is an action brought on June 12th, 1879, by Mrs. Thomas and her husband and their children, to set aside and vacate the Probate Court proceedings, and have a settlement de novo, on the ground that the children of Mrs. Thomas, who, with herself and husband, are the plaintiffs in this action, were not made parties to said proceedings, and, therefore, they are not bound thereby in any event; and, also, on the ground that said proceeding being for partition of real estate, the Probate Court had no jurisdiction.

The case was referred to a referee, with instructions to take the testimony and report his conclusions of fact. Upon this report the case came on for hearing before Judge Fraser, who, in August, 1881, filed a decree, in which, after adjudging the rights of the several parties, and ruling that the Probate Court was without jurisdiction, whether it was regarded as a proceeding in partition or a testamentary matter, and, also, that the Probate Court had no power to appoint a trustee for Mrs. Thomas, he ordered the judgment of the Probate Court and all actions thereunder to be annulled, the lands to be resold, a recommittal of the case to the referee to report as to the shares of the different parties, the amounts which had been paid them, and some other matters preparatory to a final settlement, including a proper trustee for Mrs. Thomas.

*From this decree all parties have appealed. The administrator, Washington Poole, appeals upon the ground mainly that the court erred in holding that the Probate Court was without jurisdiction to order the sale of the lands and to appoint a trustee for Mrs. Thomas, and, also, in holding that the payments made under the settlement to the trustee of Mrs. Thomas and the guardian of William Thomas Poole and James Buchanan Poole were void, and in not holding that the parties to the Probate Court proceeding were estopped.

The plaintiffs herein, to wit: Mrs. Thomas and her children, have appealed on the grounds: 1. Because the Circuit judge erred in construing the word "legacy" in the seventh clause of the will so as to include the land devised to Mrs. Thomas in the fourth clause. 2. In not holding that if in the seventh clause the word "legacy" includes lands devised to Mrs. Thomas, that then Mrs. Thomas should only account for the value of her life-interest therein. 3. In not holding that the children of Mrs. Thomas took a remainder in fee in the land devised to her. 4. In directing a sale of the lands without giving the plaintiffs an opportunity to pay such sum as might be necessary to equalize the defendants' interest and keep the land. 5. In directing the costs to be paid by the proceeds of the sales, instead of charging Washington Poole therewith.

William Thomas Poole and James Buchanan Poole appeal: 1. Because the Circuit judge held that if they received their share of the land after coming of age, they are now estopped from claiming any further interest therein or disputing Washington Poole's title (who was the purchaser at the Probate Court sale). 2. In not holding that the real estate should be appraised of its value immediately after the death of the testator. 3. In directing a sale of the real estate. 4. In directing the costs to be paid out of the proceeds of sale.

Mary E. Bryant and her husband, E. G. V. Bryant; Harriet M. Neighbors and her husband, Julian Neighbors; Raymoth V. Poole, Sarah H. Poole and Luther B. Poole, who are the children of Luther Poole, a deceased son of testator, and brothers and sisters of the two grandsons named in the third clause of the will as remaindermen to the widow of the testator, also have *appealed: 1. Because the judge erred in holding that the interest of any of the children of Luther Poole, which was paid to their guardians, was properly paid, and amounts to a payment pro tanto on their shares. 2. In directing the costs to be paid out of the sale instead of charging Washington Poole therewith.

The fundamental question in the appeal is as to the jurisdiction of the Probate Court, and it seems to be so regarded by the appellants on all sides. We will first consider this question as to the subject-matter involved. It has been discussed, in part, as if it was a case of ordinary partition of real estate. The Circuit judge considered it in that aspect, and, under the case of Davenport v. Caldwell, 10 S. C. 331, held that the Probate Court had no power in the premises. He also considered it under section 20, article IV., of the constitution, by which jurisdiction in "all matters testamentary" was conferred upon the Probate Court; and he ruled that this did not apply, while admitting that it covered wills and testaments disposing of personal property, yet, inasmuch as the constitution does not use the word "devise," which is the technical word as to real estate in a will, he held it did not apply to devises.

It is true, since the case of Davenport v. Caldwell, and while it stands, this court cannot hold that the act of general assembly on this subject, and which was declared unconstitutional in that case, conferred any jurisdiction upon the Probate Court; and if we were considering this question as governed by that act, we would be compelled to sustain the Circuit judge. But Caldwell and Davenport did not consider the rights of minors as protected by the Probate Court under that provision of the constitution which confers jurisdiction upon that court "in business appertaining to minors." The parties were all adults in Davenport v. Caldwell, and the rights of minors were not adjudged there. This is still an open question, as the precise powers of the Probate Court under those terms have never yet been distinctly and authoritatively adjudged by this court that we are aware of, nor is it absolutely essential to decide it now.

We think the recent cases of Herndon v. Moore and Schumpert v. Smith, 18 S. C. 339, 358, are in point here, where this court held that whatever might be the true solution of the ques*tion as to the powers of the Probate Court in a strict matter of partition, unencumbered with the other questions of "business appertaining to minors" "or matters testamentary," yet, where that court, in cases arising before Davenport v. Caldwell, assumed jurisdiction and acted without appeal, that upon the principle of communis error facit jus, the judgment must stand. We think that the doctrine established in these two late cases referred to supra, if this case is to be regarded as a partition case, must apply; and upon that doctrine the judgment below must be reversed. After the very able development and vindication of that principle as applicable to the numerous partitions by the Probate Court in every section of the State before Davenport v. Caldwell, by Mr. Justice McGowan in the cases cited, it will not be necessary for me now to do more than to refer to them as settling the question here, at least so far as this case is to be regarded as a partition case.

Was it a case of that kind? The property involved, consisting mostly of realty, belonged to Elisha Poole in his life-time. Had he died intestate this would have descended to his heirs-at-law, all of whom were before the Probate Court; but he died leaving a last will and testament, in which he disposed of this property to certain of those who were his heirs, upon certain conditions. It turned out that these conditions could not be complied with, and being conditions precedent, and not happening, the devises and legacies did not attach. The will became inoperative as to these, and the title to the lands descended as in cases of intestacy, and the proceeding in the Probate Court, though not in form strictly a partition proceeding, yet was so, substantially, and we think should be governed and controlled by the principles which have been established in such cases.

Such being our opinion, if the proper parties were before the court, it will be unnecessary to discuss the questions raised as to the rights of the parties under the different clauses of the will. Neither will it be necessary to discuss the powers of the Probate Court as to the "matters testamentary" provision of the constitution.

Next, Did the Probate Court obtain jurisdiction over the necessary parties? The following statement is found in the *judgment of the Probate Court, to wit: "The parties in interest in this proceeding, having had notice of the same, and having appeared, do consent that all the land be sold." &c. The Court of Probate is a court of record, and the record in such courts, as styled by Mr. Bigelow, is a remembrancer of what took place during the progress of the case; it is a memorial of the proceeding, and generally it imports such absolute verity that a party cannot aver as error of fact a matter contrary to the record.

The Probate Court, in its jurisdiction, is not an inferior court, but is so important that the same rule of construction is to be made in favor of its jurisdiction and the effect of its record as is applied to courts of general jurisdiction. Herm. Estop., p. 148, § 140. Besides, there is no allegation in the complaint that there was a defect of parties in the case before the Probate Court, except as to the plaintiffs, other than Mrs. Thomas and her husband. Nor did the referee or Circuit judge find, as a matter of fact, that there was such defect. Under these circumstances, we cannot but assume that all the parties named, except the children of Martha C. Thomas, who are plaintiffs here, were properly before the court.

At this stage of the case we cannot look into the irregularities, if any, of service of summons, the appointment of guardians ad litem, &c. There was no exception as to these matters to the referee's report, nor any ruling made in reference thereto by the Circuit judge. The judgment of the Probate Court having stated that all parties had notice and had consented, until this is assailed directly in a proper way we are concluded thereby and must act upon it as a fact.

As to the plaintiffs, children of Mrs. Thomas: Their interest in the land devised to their mother in the fourth clause of the will, was a contingent interest—a contingent remainder—contingent upon their survivorship of their mother. It was not necessary, therefore, that they should have been made parties in the Probate Court. Nor have they yet any such interest as can be adjudicated by the courts. It is not at all certain but what Mrs. Thomas may outlive all of her children. It may be that the action of the Court now will not bind them if they should *happen to survive, but of this we give no opinion; we only mean to say that, until they have vested rights, they are premature in asking the assistance of the court by way of protection.

We concur with the Circuit judge that the Probate Court had no power to appoint a trustee for Mrs. Thomas, but this does not affect the main question here. It only affects the question of payment of her interest to this trustee. It seems that the trustee was appointed upon the petition of Mrs. Thomas, and through her agency—her own act—he received these payments; we think she is now estopped from repudiating them, or, which is the same thing, she must account in any future settlement for what he has received.

The payments to the guardians of the minors must be sustained.

It is the opinion of this court that the proceedings in the Probate Court should have been sustained except as to the appointment of a trustee for Mrs. Thomas; and to this end it is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

In re McAFEE v. McAFEE.

[1. Mortgages ⇨436.]

Judgment was obtained in April against a party whose land was covered by two mortgages, and during the same month a levy was made, under which the land was sold in June and purchased by M., who was a surety of the defendant for this debt. In May actions were commenced to foreclose these mortgages, and notices of lis pendens were then filed. The mortgagor answered, alleging the sheriff's sale and disclaiming any further interest. M. thereupon filed his petition, charging the two mortgages to be fraudulent, and asking to be allowed to intervene as a party defendant. Held, that M. was a proper party, and that his petition should have been granted.

Mr. Chief Justice Simpson, dissenting.

Before Wallace, J., Chester, June, 1882.

*338

*The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. A. Sanders, for appellant.
Messrs. J. & J. Hemphill, contra.

June 27th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The two plaintiffs above named, Samuel M. McAfee and Ellen M. McAfee, brought these actions for foreclosure of mortgages of real estate; and this is a petition filed by Samuel W. Mobley, asking to be allowed to intervene, as a party defendant, for the purpose of contesting the validity of said mortgages. For this purpose he filed petitions in each of the cases, setting forth that he has an interest in the mortgaged premises; and that he is informed and believes that the bonds and mortgages are pretensive and fraudulent; and that they were made to hinder, delay and defeat the creditors of the mortgagor, John T. M. McAfee. The petitions were duly verified, and no answers thereto were filed. The defendant, who answered in the actions for foreclosure, says that the mortgaged premises have been sold by the sheriff under an execution against the mortgagor, and he, therefore, has no further interest therein.

The facts upon which the petitioner bases his application to intervene are stated by him, substantially as follows: Subsequent to the execution of said mortgages, some time in April, 1882, a judgment was recovered in the Court of Probate by John W. Wright and others against the said John T. M. McAfee as administrator of Thomas Wright, and, under an execution issued to enforce this judgment, the mortgaged premises were levied on by the sheriff, on April 27th, 1882, and advertised for sale on the first Monday in June following. On May 13th, 1882, the actions for foreclosure were commenced, and on the same day notice of lis pendens was duly filed in each of said cases. On June 5th, 1882, the mortgaged premises were sold by the sheriff under the execution above mentioned, and bought by the petitioner for the purpose, as is alleged, of protecting himself from liability as surety on the administration bond of the said John T. M. McAfee.

*The Circuit judge refused the motions to intervene, and this appeal alleges error on his part in so doing. In rendering his judgment, the Circuit judge has fallen into the error of saying that "pending the suit for foreclosure, and after filing of notice of lis pendens according to law, the mortgaged premises were levied on and sold under the judgment above referred to;" whereas, in fact, the levy was made before the actions for foreclosure were commenced and before the filing of the notice of lis pendens, though the sale was made afterwards.

The decision below is based upon the provisions of section 153 of the code (1882). It will be observed, however, that this section only provides that one who purchases property which is the subject of litigation, subsequent to the filing of the notice of lis pendens, shall be bound by all proceedings thereafter had to the same extent as if he were made a party to the action; but it does not forbid the making of such purchaser a party. If a person in such a situation is to be subjected to all the burdens and disadvantages of being a party, it would seem to be nothing more than right that he should, if he desires it, and can make a proper showing for that purpose, be entitled to the privileges of a party. While, therefore, under this section, a person purchasing property while it is the subject of litigation, subsequent to the filing of the notice of lis pendens, is not a necessary party, and the case may proceed to judgment without his presence, it does not necessarily follow that he may not be a proper party under certain circumstances. It sometimes happens that persons may be proper and yet not necessary parties to an action. For example, in an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage, neither prior nor subsequent encumbrancers are necessary, and yet they are proper parties. Warren, Wallace & Co. v. Burton, 9 S. C. 197; Evans v. McClucas, 12 S. C. 61, and the authorities cited in those cases.

Now, if, as is said in Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill Eq. 427, a purchaser, at an execution sale, is not only invested with all the rights of the judgment debtor, but "also clothed with all the rights of his creditor, at whose instance the land was sold," we see no reason why Wright, the execution creditor, and, as a consequence thereof, the petitioner, as purchaser at the sale under *his execution, would not be a proper party, and entitled, upon a proper showing, to be brought in as a party. When, therefore, a proper showing is made, as has been done in this case, we see no reason why a purchaser, under a judgment, not only recovered but actually levied before any notice of lis pendens has been filed, may not be allowed to come in and litigate his rights, of course at the peril of being mulcted in costs if he fails to establish his allegations.

According to the allegations of the petition, which is verified, and of which there is no denial, the petitioner is likely to suffer great injustice unless he is admitted as a party and permitted to be heard upon the issues in the actions. It appears from these allegations that the mortgages which are sought to be foreclosed in these actions, between son and father in one case, and between wife and husband in the other, are pretensive and fraudulent, and made to hinder, delay and defeat the creditors of the mortgagor; and it is very manifest that no such defenses will be set up, for the defendant in the actions for foreclosure has answered, saying that he has no further interest therein since the purchase of the mortgaged premises by the petitioner at the sheriff's sale. As the petitioner, under the section of the code above cited, will be bound by any judgments that may be rendered in these actions for foreclosure, it is very clear that unless he is made a party, and permitted to raise the question as to the bona fides or validity of these mortgages, it will never be done, and the petitioner may lose the land which he has bought without an opportunity of litigating his right thereto. For, if judgment of foreclosure and sale is rendered, as it will be, in the absence of any defense, he cannot dispute the title of the purchaser at such sale, because, being bound by the judgments of foreclosure and sale to the same extent as if he were a party to the actions, he will be concluded by such judgments.

Unless there be some way by which the petitioner could be protected against such a result, a gross fraud will be practiced upon him through the forms of law, provided the allegations in his petition be true. It is difficult to see what else he could have done to protect himself from liability as the surety of the mortgagor, who declines to make any defense to the actions for *foreclosure, brought by his wife and son, than that which he has done. As soon as the judgment was recovered in the Court of Probate, it was levied before, not after, the actions for foreclosure were commenced, and the land was sold at the earliest possible day thereafter, the levy having been made on April 27th, 1882, and the sale made on the first Monday in June thereafter, while the actions for foreclosure were commenced and the notices of lis pendens were filed on May 13th, 1882. There was, therefore, no laches on the part of the petitioner, but, on the contrary, he acted as promptly as it was possible for him to have done.

Again, in Freem. Exec., § 333, in speaking of sales under execution, the writer says: "While the title of the defendant is not, in a vast majority of the States, divested until the execution of a conveyance to the purchaser, this conveyance, when made, must, for some purposes, be given effect as though executed at some period antecedent to its date. The relation of deeds, made in pursuance of sales under execution, is very frequently spoken of in the reported cases, and yet about the only thing which we conceive to be well settled in regard to the doctrine of relation, is that such deed must be given such an effect as will preserve and make effectual the lien under which the execution sale was made."

In Jackson v. Dickenson, 15 Johns. 309, the land of A. was sold under an execution in favor of B. on the 1st of March, and on the 10th of March a bill was filed to foreclose a mortgage on the same land. On the 19th of March the sheriff executed a deed to the purchaser. Held, that his title had relation back to the day of sale, and, not being a party to the proceeding to foreclose the mortgage, he was not bound thereby, as his title was acquired previous to the lis pendens, although not consummated until afterwards.

In Jackson v. Ramsay, 3 Cow. 75, the same doctrine was recognized, and the rule as to the doctrine of relation is thus stated: "Where there are divers acts concurrent to make a conveyance, estate or other thing, the original act shall be preferred, and to this the other act shall have relation." If this be so, then the title of the petitioner may have relation back to the date of the judgment, or, at least, to the date of the levy, and this being prior to the commencement of the actions for foreclosure, he was entitled to be made a party thereto.

The judgment of this court is that the order of the Circuit Court in each of the cases above stated be reversed, and that the cases be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON dissenting. On May 13th, 1882, the plaintiffs commenced their separate actions above against the defendant for foreclosure of two mortgages executed in 1880, notice of lis pendens being filed in each case on same day.

Previous to the commencement of these actions a judgment had been obtained in the Probate Court against the defendant, as administrator in a suit for an accounting in behalf of John W. Wright et al., for $2,165. On April 27th, 1882, a short time before these actions were commenced, the real estate in controversy was levied upon by the sheriff of Chester by virtue of the judgment above referred to. The sale, however, did not take place until June 5th, some weeks after the beginning of these actions and the notice of lis pendens. At the sale by the sheriff, the petitioner, being the surety on the administration bond of the defendant, to save himself became the purchaser, whereupon he filed the petition herein in re to be made a party to said cases, his object being to contest the mortgages of the plaintiffs on the ground of fraud, having been made, as alleged by him, to "hinder, delay, defeat and defraud creditors." Judge Wallace refused the petition on the ground that petitioner having become the purchaser after suit commenced and the filing of the notice of lis pendens, there was no law which entitled him to be made a party.

The appeal involves the question, whether, under the circumstances, the appellant should have been made a party. It will be at once seen that at the time these actions were commenced the appellant could not have legally been made a party, because at that time he had no connection whatever with the matter in litigation. It is true he was a surety on the administration bond of the defendant, but there was no evidence that he had been *made liable on that account, or that he was a creditor otherwise of the defendant, nor did he have any claim to the land in controversy.

One John W. Wright and others had obtained judgment in the Probate Court against the defendant, but up to the commencement of these actions and the "notice of lis pendens," the petitioner was a stranger to the whole matter, and any other person in the community might have been made a party as well as he. Did the fact that he became a purchaser under the circumstances stated, and before judgment in the foreclosure suits, entitle him to be made a party? It is a general rule, that every person whose presence is necessary for a complete determination of the matter in controversy, may and should be made a party before final judgment, and if such person is not summoned at the beginning of the action he may be brought in afterwards. Code, § 143, Gen. Stat.

Can a complete determination of the controversy here be made in the absence of the petitioner? Section 153 of the code (Gen. Stat.) provides that in foreclosure actions lis pendens must be filed at least twenty days before judgment, and that every purchaser or encumbrancer subsequent to such filing shall be bound by all proceedings taken thereafter to the same extent as if he were made a party. This would imply that in such case a complete determination of the controversy might be made without the presence of the subsequent purchaser or encumbrancer, otherwise the provision that he should be bound to the same extent as if he had been brought in would be idle. The petitioner bought the land at sheriff's sale after the notice of lis pendens; he then occupied the position of a subsequent purchaser, and if he has no higher rights and interests than would attach to a subsequent purchaser simply, he could not intervene. He is a volunteer, having acquired his interest during the pendency of the action and after legal information that he would be bound by the proceeding already in progress, and he would have no just or legal claim to be permitted to interject his newly and voluntarily acquired interest into the action, raising new questions and difficulties, to the delay and expense of the original parties, who, perhaps, but for his interference, might have had their rights promptly adjudicated.

But it seems that the petitioner bought under a judgment which was filed and levied a few days before the foreclosure suit and the filing of notice of lis pendens, though the purchase was made afterwards. Can this fact make any difference as to his rights in the premises? We can see no reason why it should. He is still a volunteer, with all the facts before him, and he must abide the consequences. He knew when he purchased that his rights would be subject to the suits then pending to the same extent as if he were made a party. The lis pendens informed him of this fact, and he cannot now legally complain. There is no principle of law as to parties under the old practice or provision of the code under the new which would warrant the petitioner in demanding that he should be made a party. The other sections of the code, referred to in the argument, have no application.

The petitioner had no interest when the actions were commenced, and to have made him a party then would have been a misjoinder. His acquisition of interest after action could not re-act to the date of the judgment under which he bought. It has been decided that the sheriff's deed has relation back to the sale. Kingman v. Glover, 3 Rich. 27 [45 Am. Dec. 756]. But we find no authority which carries the title back to the entry of the execution or the date of the judgment, nor is there foundation for the position that petitioner's purchase created an equity having relation back to the judgment. Both his legal and equitable rights attached at the same time; this was upon his purchase. Up to that moment he had neither, and this was after the notice of lis pendens, which, under the law, made those already in court his representatives.

For the reasons given above I concur with the Circuit judge—Judge Wallace. Let this be filed as a dissenting opinion to that of the majority.

Appeal sustained.

Before Aldrich, J., Charleston, June, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

I am so well satisfied with the opinion given by Judge Fraser, while at the bar, as to the proper construction of this will, that I have adopted it as the judgment of the court.

The will of Henry Clark devises to his brother, William Clark, a lot at the corner of Hasel and Anson streets, Charleston, "for and during his natural life, and on his death to his children, and then to their children living at his death." At the date of the will, William Clark had two children living, one of whom, Mrs. Sherwood, died before the testator, and the other William J. Clark, was living at his death. At the death of William Clark, there were children of Mrs. Sherwood, and also of William J. Clark, living. Now, what is the proper construction of this will?

Before the act of 1824, words of limitation were necessary to create by will a fee-simple estate; and the devise to the children of

*346

William Clark in this will would only *have given them a life-estate; and if there had not been, as in this case, a remainder over in fee, the estate would have returned to the heirs of the testator, or to his residuary devisee.

By the act of 1824, (re-enacted, Gen. Stat., ch. LXXXVI., § 9,) no words of limitation in a will are necessary to create a gift in fee-simple "unless such construction shall be inconsistent with the will of the testator, expressed or implied." If, in this case, the will is held to give a fee-simple to William J. Clark, then his children can take nothing as purchasers under the will, but the whole estate goes in fee-simple to the father, William J. Clark. Now, this is manifestly inconsistent with the will of the testator, and, therefore, the will is to be construed so as to give William J. Clark what a common law construction before the statute could give to him, to wit, a life-estate. After his death, his children would take the fee, because there is no provision of the will inconsistent with it.

If this be the proper construction of the will as to the estate of William J. Clark, then Mrs. Sherwood's estate, if she had been named, was also a life-estate. Lesly v. Collier, 3 Rich. Eq. 128. But the remainders to the children of the children of William Clark are, by the terms of the will above quoted, contingent upon their being living at the death of William Clark. The devise, however, is not to Mrs. Sherwood by name, but is to be to the children of William Clark, and only to those who answer the description of children at the death of the testator. When a legacy is given to a class of persons in general terms, and one or more dies in the lifetime of the testator, "those of the described class who survive the testator take the whole estate." 2 Wms. Ex. 877. It thus seems to us that William J. Clark took an estate for life in the lot in Charleston, with remainder in fee to his children living at the death of William Clark.

It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed, that Rudolph Hopke do accept the title tendered under the proceedings in this case, and do pay the costs so far as this question is concerned.

August 22d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Henry Clark, of Charleston, in 1869, executed his will, by which, among other things, he devised as follows: "I devise to my brother William Clark, all that lot of land on the corner of Hasel and Anson streets, &c., for and during his natural life: and on his death to his children, and then to their children living at his death, share and share alike," &c. The testator died in October, 1871, and at that time there were living his brother William, the life-tenant, and his child, William J. Clark, who had children as follows: Eliza, wife of Louis Appelt; Samuel J. Clark, L. Inez Clark, William H. Clark, Henry D. Clark and Martha, wife of E. C. Horton, and the latter has since died, leaving an only son, Edward C. Horton. Martha A. Sherwood, another of the children of William, had died after the testator made his will, but before his death, leaving surviving her children, Ella A. Sherwood, Mary L. Sherwood, Cornelia L. Sherwood and Anne L. Sherwood (the latter since dead, without issue).

In January, 1875, William Clark, the life-tenant, died, leaving surviving him an only son, William J. Clark, and his children, and his grandchildren, the Sherwoods, as before stated; and William J. Clark, his only surviving child, instituted the principal case of W. J. Clark v. W. H. Clark et al., for partition and division of the lot between himself and his children, without making the Sherwoods, children of his deceased sister, parties. There was a decree for the sale of the property, which *was offered for sale by Master W. D. Clancy, and bid off by one Rudolph Hopke for $2,500. The said purchaser now refuses to comply with his bid, on the ground that he had received notice that the children of Mrs. Sherwood were entitled to an interest in the property and should have been made parties, and, not having been, the master is unable to make good titles; and he has filed this petition in re to have that point decided. The question submitted was whether the Sherwoods, children of a daughter of William Clark, who died before the testator, and, of course, before her father, the life-tenant, were entitled to an interest in the property, so as to make it necessary that they should have been parties to the partition proceedings.

The case was heard by Judge Aldrich, who held that the Sherwoods, whose mother died before the testator, Henry Clark, took no interest under his will, and adjudged that the titles tendered were good, and should have been accepted by Hopke, whose petition was dismissed. From this decree the petitioner, Hopke, appeals to this court upon the grounds: "1. That the presiding judge erred in holding that under the will of Henry Clark, upon the death of William Clark, William J. Clark took a life-estate, and his children then living alone took the fee to the property in question, as this construction is clearly inconsistent with the intention and will of the testator. 2. That the presiding judge erred in holding that the purchaser, Rudolph Hopke, was bound to accept the title tendered."

What is the proper construction of the will of Henry Clark in respect to the rights of the children of Mrs. Sherwood? All the interest which William J. Clark and his children have under the will was covered by the decree of sale, and passed to the purchaser; so that it will be unnecessary to consider the rights of these parties as between themselves. The only matter which touches the alleged insufficiency of the title is the question whether the Sherwoods should have been before the court as parties having an interest in the property when the order for sale was made.

In the construction of a will, of course the main object should be to ascertain the intention of the testator; but that intention must be gathered from the will itself, assisted by the light of *the circumstances surrounding the testator at the time of its execution. At the time this will was written, William Clark had two children, Mrs. Martha A. Sherwood and William J. Clark, and it is reasonable to assume that the testator, Henry Clark, in giving the property to his brother William for life, with remainder over "to his children," intended as great a benefit to Mrs. Sherwood as to her brother William J. Clark. Indeed, if the will had disposed only of personalty, and had been made by William Clark, the father, instead of Henry Clark, the uncle, the law would have intervened in behalf of the children of Mrs. Sherwood, (Gen. Stat., § 1865,) notwithstanding she died in the life-time of the testator. But, as the will disposed of land, and was not made by the father, the terms of that law do not cover the case. The intention, which is so manifest, must, however, be carried into effect, unless, in the events which have occurred, there is some controlling principle of law which interdicts it.

In the first place, we do not consider the doctrine of lapse as involved in the case. The testator disposed of his whole interest to certain persons in a particular manner, viz.: to his brother William for life, with first remainder to William's children as a class for life, and with a second remainder to their children. Both the children of William have children now living, and the fact that one of them (Mrs. Sherwood) died in the life-time of the testator, cannot reach to and cause to lapse the ulterior limitation to her children. "However much it may have been once doubted, it is now clearly settled, that when an interest in property is given by will to one person with a limitation over of the same interest, either to his children or to any other persons upon the death of the first devisee or legatee before the time appointed for such interest to vest in possession, the death of the first devisee or legatee, although in the life-time of the testator, does not produce a lapse of the limitation over of that interest to the substituted object of the testator's bounty," &c. Mowatt v. Carow, 7 Paige 328; Johnson v. Harrelson, 6 S. C. 340. There is nothing decided in the case of Lesly v. Collier, 3 Rich. Eq. 129, inconsistent with this doctrine.

Again, if, as contended, there is no good limitation over of the *half of the lot intended for Mrs. Sherwood, then another rule of construction intervenes. In that case, the share intended for Mrs. Sherwood, being given to her as one of a class—"children of William"—would pass to her brother, William J. Clark, as the only surviving member of the class, to which the property was given, so that in either view the doctrine of lapse does not touch the case. The whole interest was effectually given, and the only question is, whether the share intended for Mrs. Sherwood, (according to the event, one-half interest) who died leaving children before the testator, Henry Clark, shall go to the children of her brother, William J., or to her own children. "A gift to a class implies an intention to benefit those who constitute the class and to exclude all others; but a gift to individuals, described by their several names and descriptions, though they may together constitute a class, implies an intent to benefit the individuals named. In a gift to a class you look at the description and inquire what individuals answer to it, and those who do answer to it are the legatees described."

* * * If a testator gives a legacy to be divided among the children of A., at a particular time, those who constitute the class at the time will take." De Veaux v. De Veaux, 1 Strobb. Eq. 283; Cole v. Creyon, 1 Hill Eq. 311 [26 Am. Dec. 208]; Swinton v. Legare, 2 McC. Eq. 444.

Does the will create a good limitation over of the share of Mrs. Sherwood to her children by way of executory devise or otherwise? For the sake of clearness, the clause under construction may be divided into three parts: First, a life-estate was clearly given to William, the brother, and to this we will not have occasion again to refer. Second, "and on his death to his children." If this were all of it, and no other words had been added, there would be no serious difficulty. Mrs. Sherwood having died before the testator, the whole interest, upon the death of William, would have gone to William J. in fee, according to the authorities above cited, as to the survivor of a class. William J. would have been the only person living at the time fixed for distribution answering the description of "children." There are, however, other significant words in the clause which we think indicate and express a different intention. Third, "and then to their children living at his death, share and *share alike." This sentence is very condensed, and in consequence is somewhat obscure, but it seems to us that there is no great difficulty in ascertaining with reasonable certainty the intention of the testator.

It must be kept in mind that he was mounting a second limitation over upon the second life-estate to the children of William, who were more than one when he wrote the will, and, therefore, he used the pronoun in the plural number—"their children." And "then," that is, after the termination of this second life-estate respectively to Mrs. Sherwood and William J. Clark, to "their children." Whose children? Most manifestly the children of both of them, who were alive when the will was written, and for whom the provision was made, that is to say, the share of each child of William to his or her children. Putting ourselves in the place of the testator, it will appear that he could not have foreseen that Mrs. Sherwood would die before him, and it is, therefore, impossible that he could have used expressions only applicable to the event which has happened. To suppose that in writing his will he had reference alone to the children of William J. Clark in using the words "their children," would be to ascribe to him the gift of prescience, which cannot be accepted. So, too, as to the words "his death." They cannot refer to the death of William Clark, for that would fix the termination of the second life-estate upon the same event as that of the first, thus annihilating the very life-estate which he was in the act of constructing. The words "his death" follow the words "their children living at," and it is plain that to make sense it is absolutely necessary to supply or understand the words "or her"—"their children living at his (or her) death."

It seems clear to us that the testator had reference to the children of both Mrs. Sherwood and William J. Clark, and that the sentence properly understood should be read as follows: "and then to the children of each respectively, living at his or her death, share and share alike." This construction seems to be required by the terms used, and is the only one in harmony with the facts which are known to have existed at the time the will was written, and the manifest intention of the testator. As was said by Chief *3 Pet. 377 [7 L. Ed. 701]: "The intent of the testator is the cardinal rule in the construction of wills, and if that intent can be clearly perceived, and is not contrary to some positive rule of law, it must prevail, although in giving effect to it some words should be rejected or so restrained in their application as to change their literal meaning in the particular instance." See Duncan v. Harper, 4 S. C. 76.

Thus interpreted, the doctrine of gifts to a class does not apply, and the case becomes the simple one of a testator (leaving out the first life-estate to William) devising to his nephew and niece, under the designation of "the children of William," a life-estate to each in a house and lot, with limitation over to their children respectively, living at his or her death, which was, in effect, giving one-half to Martha A. Sherwood during her life, and then to her children living at her death. The niece died before the testator, never having been vested with any interest in the property, but she left children, who, after her death, had an interest, and were entitled to the share intended for the mother, not from or through her, but as purchasers by substitution, as a substantive and original devise to them under the will of Henry Clark, the testator.

"Whether the remainder is vested or contingent, if the event has happened on the occurrence of which it is to take effect, and there are those alive at the death of the testator who, by the words of the bequest, can be held to be the objects of the testator's bounty in substitution of the prior legatee, who may have died in his life-time, they take the share of such legatee. The intention must be express, or satisfactorily implied from the language employed by the testator. When the gift is absolute, and the object of it dies in the life-time of the testator, it must, necessarily, fall into the residue of his estate, for there would be no one to claim it by substitution, though a limitation over." Johnson v. Harrelson, 6 S. C. 338; Reeder v. Spearman, 6 Rich. Eq. 92; Mathis v. Hammond, Id. 124, and authorities there referred to. In the case last cited, Chancellor Johnston states clearly the reason for the rule: "Upon general principles, it would seem that where a testator gives property in succession to two persons, there is evidence of *such a state of his affections as would warrant the inference of an intention on his part that the secondary object of his bounty would have induced a direct gift to him if the primary object had never existed or were out of the way. The difference made between them exhibits a mere preference of the one over the other, but both are preferred over the heirs or distributees, otherwise there is no motive to make the will," &c.

The will of Henry Clark, in the state of facts which have occurred, gave to his niece, Mrs. Sherwood, one-half interest in the property in question, and if she had survived the time fixed for her right to be reduced to possession, it is difficult to doubt that such interest, at her death, would have gone to her children. We cannot think that her death before that of the testator either transferred that interest to her brother, William J. Clark, as the survivor of a class to whom it was given for life, or lapsed it, so as to prejudice and destroy the limitations of that interest over to her children. Upon the death of William Clark the children of Mrs. Sherwood (she having previously died) were entitled to take among them, as purchasers, the interest (one-half) originally intended for their mother for life, with limitation over to them as remaindermen under the will.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed; that the question submitted be decided in the affirmative; that the Sherwoods, children of a predeceased sister of William J. Clark, have an interest in the property described, under the will of Henry Clark, so that they must be parties to the proceedings for a sale of the same and participate in the proceeds; and that the petitioner, Hopke, is not bound to accept the titles tendered to him, the Sherwoods not having been parties to the proceedings.

Mr. Justice McGowan, dissenting.

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, April, 1882. In his dissenting opinion Mr. Justice McGOWAN makes a full statement of the case, as follows:

In the case first named in the title, the plaintiff corporation brought an action against the defendant corporation for $240, the value of three bales of domestics, shipped by the former at their factory in Greenville, upon the railroad of the defendant, to be carried by its own and connecting lines to Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, and there safely delivered to Woodward, Baldwin & Norris, for freight, at the rate of fifty-six cents per one hundred pounds. The allegation was that the defendant corporation did not safely carry and deliver the goods pursuant to agreement, but, on the contrary, the defendant and connecting lines so negligently acted in regard to the same, in their calling as carriers, that said goods were lost and never delivered. The defendant corporation made several defenses: First, they denied the contract as alleged. Second, that there was any negligence on their part, as they delivered the goods to the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad at Columbia, and that their liability ended with such delivery. And third, that they received the goods under a special contract, exempting them and all connecting lines from liability from loss by fire, and if there was any liability it should fall only on that line in whose actual custody the property was at the time of the loss; and that the said three bales of domestics were destroyed by fire while in transit, viz.: at West Point, Virginia, on board the steamer Shirley, belonging to the Baltimore, Richmond and Chesapeake Steamboat Company.

The second case named was for $1,600, the value of twenty bales of domestics, shipped at the same time and under the same circumstances to Woodward, Baldwin & Co., New York. These bales were destroyed at the same time and place and by the same fire, there being no difference in the facts except that the three bales were actually on board the steamer, and the other twenty were on the wharf when destroyed. The cases on the Circuit were considered as similar, and the result in one determined the other. It appeared that Mr. Hammet, president of the Piedmont Manufacturing Company, wishing to ship his fabrics North, met in Columbia the general freight agent of the Columbia and Greenville Railroad, and made with him an arrangement for "through rates" to Baltimore, for which the Piedmont Company was to pay fifty-six cents per one hundred pounds to Baltimore, and sixty cents per one hundred pounds to New York. At that time nothing whatever was said about limiting the liability of the defendant.

Some time afterwards, November 22d, 1880, under this general arrangement, those having charge at Piedmont (Mr. Hammet was absent from the State) sent three bales of domestics to the Piedmont station on the railroad, and delivered them to one W. B. Vaughn, agent of the railroad company at that point, who gave a printed receipt for the same. This paper was headed "Greenville and Columbia Railroad, through bill of lading." *It acknowledged the receipt of the three bales, "to be transported by the Greenville and Columbia Railroad to Columbia, Greenville or Seneca City, as the case may be, and thence by connecting lines—same to be delivered in like order and condition—to Woodward, Baldwin & Norris, Baltimore, Maryland."

This paper was not signed by the shipper, but contained in small type "conditions," declaring the railroad companies exempt from liability in many cases stated at length, and among other things as follows: "That the said Greenville and Columbia Railroad and connecting railroads and steamship lines shall not be liable for loss or damage on any article of property whatever, by fire or other casualty while in transit or while in depot, or in other places of shipment or transshipment, or at depots and landings at points of shipment and delivery. * * * And it is further stipulated and agreed, that in case of any loss, detriment or damages done or to be sustained by any of the property herein receipted for during such transportation, whereby any legal liability or responsibility shall or may be incurred by the terms of this contract, that company alone shall be held answerable therefor in whose actual custody the same may be at the time of happening of such loss, detriment or damage; and the carrier so liable shall have the full benefit of any insurance that may have been effected upon or on account of said goods, &c. In witness whereof the agent hath affirmed to one bill of lading, all this tenor and date, one of which being accomplished the others to stand void. (Signed,) W. B. Vaughn,

For agent."

A similar receipt was given on the shipment of the twenty bales to New York.

It appeared that the property in its transportation had reached West Point, Virginia, where it was placed on board the steamer Shirley, to be forwarded to Baltimore, but, before the steamer left the wharf, it, with everything on board, was consumed by fire, on the night of November 28th, 1880. At the same time the twenty bales were burnt on the wharf. The fire originated about one o'clock at night, and consumed not only the steamer, but all the wharves and property thereon. The cause of the *fire was unknown, and no evidence was offered as to whose fault it was, or whether it occurred from negligence. Some correspondence was had upon the subject of liability for the loss with Mr. R. L. McCaughrin, then president of the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company, who thought the claim ought to be paid, but desired the plaintiff to sue, as "it was necessary to have a judgment determining the liability in order to fasten the loss upon the insurance companies and on the parties responsible to us," &c. These letters, against the objection of the defendant, were received in evidence.

The charge of the judge was as follows: †

On the 22d November, 1880, Mr. Hammet, the president of the Piedmont Manufacturing Company, shipped twenty bales of drills, at Piedmont, to be delivered to Woodward & Co., New York, worth $1,600. He says: "Our agreement for shipments, through rates, was made with the general agent in Columbia. We were to pay sixty cents per hundred pounds to New York. There was no contract as to limiting the liability of defendant. No allusion was made as to such limitation. We were not insured, and did not know of the fire. I was in New England at the time, and did not learn of it until after my return to the State. When I learned of the loss, I wrote Mr. McCaughrin, the president of the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company, who, while acknowledging the justness of the claim, requested me, after several letters had passed, to bring this 'friendly suit' to fix the liability. I gave no instructions on what line to ship the goods. The Greenville and Columbia Railroad were shipping by three routes. My contract was made with agent of defendant. Signed no release. West Point is on the Piedmont Air Line. The bill of lading was signed by Vaughn. The Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad receipted for the goods at Columbia. They were burned at West Point, Virginia."

The receipt given by Vaughn, the agent, is the subject of this litigation. It is dated 22d

November, 1880, headed Greenville *and Columbia Railroad, "through bill of lading." It purports to have received of the Piedmont Manufacturing Company certain packages, "to be transported by the Greenville and Columbia Railroad to Columbia, Greenville or Seneca City, as the case may be, and thence by connecting lines; same to be delivered in like order and condition to Woodward, Baldwin & Co., New York." Then follows a description of the goods in writing and printing in distinct type and letters; also, a "Release," in fine type, which is not signed by the shipper. Then follows the "Conditions," also in fine type; the whole paper, at the end of the conditions, is signed by "W. B. Vaughn, Freight Agent."

The question is: Who is liable to this plaintiff—the defendant or some of the connecting lines? Undoubtedly, Mr. McCaughrin, the president of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad, held his company liable. His correspondence shows that. With perfect frankness and fairness he admits the liability of his company in the first instance. But finding there was some difficulty about the insurance, under the advice of counsel he requested this suit to be brought to fix the liability. I do not clearly see, if he thought his company was liable, why this should be desired, but suppose, as a prudent man, he thought it better to act under the advice of counsel rather than to follow the dictates of his own judgment as to whom the responsibility first attached. Hence this suit.

Now the question presented to you is, What was the contract? Was it the contract made by the President of the Piedmont Company and the general agent of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad in Columbia, or this paper signed by Vaughn? When the goods reached Piedmont station was a new contract made, or did Vaughn sign that bill of lading, to carry out the contract made with the general agent? Mr. Hammet was not there; he did not sign the paper, and expressly says the goods were shipped under the contract made in Columbia, in which there was not a word said about limiting the liability. You will observe this bill of lading is a "through bill," in which the Greenville and Columbia Railroad agree to transport by connecting lines and deliver to Woodward, Baldwin & Co., New York, the goods lost. Is not that the very contract

Mr. Hammet *made with the general agent in Columbia? What right had he to alter the terms of that contract, at Piedmont, and attach a release and conditions? None in the world that I can see. There is no proof on that subject, and I regard that bill of lading simply as a receipt to carry out the agreement previously entered into between Mr. Hammet and the general agent of the defendants.

It does seem unreasonable to hold, that when a shipper intrusts his goods to a common carrier, who stipulates that he will deliver them by connecting line in New York, that he is discharged from liability when he delivers them to the first connecting road on the line of connection. The shipper has made no contract; sent no freights to any other line on the route.

This "through" line, North and East, South and West, was not made for his convenience, but for the benefit of the common carriers composing the line. It is true, it is a convenience to the shipper; but if, when he makes a contract with the Greenville and Columbia Railroad, he is to place his goods to the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad and all the other lines of connection, and can only hold that line liable on which the goods were lost, and with which he made no contract, it has to me very much the appearance of a snare.

†This charge is printed in both briefs, both cases being submitted to the jury together; the agreement being that the result in one case should determine the other.—REPORTER.

Evidently Mr. Hammet thought that when he made his agreement with the general agent to have his goods transported on the connecting lines he represented, North and East, West and South, at a stipulated rate of freight which they were to divide, he had a binding contract with the initial road with whom he made the contract, and that the initial road of the connection could not shift its responsibility by any device of releases or conditions in consequence, signed by a local agent at a local station. Is it reasonable, nay, is it just to make the shipper look to any other company than the company with whom he has made the contract? Is it fair, after he has made a contract with the general agent of the combination, in which there was no stipulation whatever, to hold him bound by a printed form, filled with limitations and stipulations, signed by a local agent, to which the shipper has not given his assent by attaching his signature? In all probability, if he went to any other company *than the one with whom he made the contract, he would be told, "We made no contract with you; go to the company with whom you contracted."

This war between common carriers and shippers has been going on from time immemorial. Every device that the ingenuity of man can suggest has been adopted to avoid and shift their responsibility. Since the introduction of railroads, so great is their influence that some States have been induced to change the English rule and adopt what Mr. Lawton calls the American rule. That time has not yet arrived in South Carolina, and we still hold to the English rule, the rule of our ancestors, from whom we have borrowed our jurisprudence.

Admit that a corporation is only liable for the loss of goods shipped over its corporate territory. This is good law. But suppose several corporations, in contiguous States, contract to carry "through freights" over their respective roads and connecting lines, and for that purpose appoint a general agent, who receives pay for the freight at the initial point: I hold that the English rule prevails, and the corporation receiving the freight and giving the receipt at the initial point is responsible.

It is true, as was argued, the legislature has given its construction, that the initial road is responsible until it produces the receipt of the connecting road. But that does not apply to the shipper; it applies to the roads forming the combination. The corporation making the loss is liable to the other corporations forming the connecting line; but the shipper looks only to the corporation who received his goods, took his money, and contracted to deliver the freight in New York. If the loss is disputed, who is to sue? Why, the road who gave the bill of lading, and not the shipper. They must adjust their difficulties among themselves, and not put the confiding shipper to the trouble and expense of running from State to State to find out where the goods were lost, how they were destroyed; if it was negligence, or the act of God, or the public enemy; and, perhaps, when he does make the discovery, the corporation may be bankrupt, while the initial company, with whom he had made the contract, is perfectly solvent. I hold such a construction to be unjust and unwarrantable, either by law or reason. My view *of the legislative construction is, not that the initial road receiving the goods and giving the bill of lading to the shipper is not relieved from liability to the shipper, but as among the companies composing the corporation or through line, that company making the loss shall bear the whole liability, and not distribute it among them all.

If you determine that the contract was the agreement between Mr. Hammet, president of the Piedmont, and the general agent of the through line at Columbia, and that the bill of lading was a mere receipt in pursuance of that agreement, your verdict will be for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,600, with interest from the first day of December, 1880.

The judge subsequently instructed the jury to include the interest on the amount of damages found, if plaintiff has proved himself entitled to any, but not to find interest eo nomine.

The jury found a verdict for plaintiff in both cases. From the judgments entered upon these verdicts the defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

I. Because his Honor refused to instruct the jury as prayed by the defendants.††

(a.) That the legal duty and obligation of the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company as common carrier, was only to convey over its own line of road. The corporate franchise and legal duty are commensurate.

(b.) That the duty or obligation to convey the goods beyond its own line of road and to deliver them at a point beyond its own line is not imposed by law, but depends upon the contract between the shipper and the company.

(c.) That the bill of lading is the contract between the shipper and the company, by which the company agrees to transport and deliver beyond its own line, and the terms and conditions of the contract regulate and determine the duties and obligations of the contracting parties.

(d.) That by the terms of the contract the

††It nowhere else appears in the brief that the judge was requested so to charge, but no objections were urged upon this omission.

Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company was not to be liable for goods *destroyed by fire in transit or at depots and landings or in depots or other places of transshipment. And if the goods in question were destroyed by fire while in transit beyond the line of defendant's road, or while in depot or other place of shipment or transshipment, or while at depots and landings at points of shipment and delivery beyond the line of the defendant's road, then the defendant is not liable and the verdict should be for the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company.

(e.) That in and by the sixth clause of the contract between plaintiff and defendant, it is stipulated and agreed that in case of loss during transportation whereby legal liability may be incurred by the terms of the contract, that company alone shall be answerable for such loss in whose actual custody the property was at the time of the happening of the loss. And if the jury are satisfied that the goods in question were in the actual custody of some other carrier when burnt, then this defendant is not liable. And under the terms of the contract the action must be against the company in whose actual custody they were when destroyed.

II. Because his Honor submitted as the only question for the jury to decide, Who is liable, defendant or some other person?—whereas one of the main questions in the cause was, whether under the bill of lading any one was liable.

III. That the bill of lading was the only contract for the carriage of these goods that was proved, and that his Honor erred in submitting to the jury whether the contract for carriage of these goods was the agreement between Mr. Hammet and the general freight agent, or the bill of lading, signed by the agent of the company when the goods were delivered to the company.

IV. That the plaintiff having put in evidence the bill of lading signed by Vaughn, agent of defendants, no previous parol agreement could alter or affect the terms of the bill of lading or substitute any other agreement for the contract evidenced by the bill of lading.

V. Because his Honor erred in instructing the jury that the real contract was that made between Mr. Hammet and the general freight agent, and the agent at Piedmont had no right to alter the terms or annex conditions; and erred in instructing the *jury that the bill of lading was simply a receipt to carry out the agreement previously entered into with the general freight agent.

VI. That whether the contract was the contract of the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company for the entire carriage or the contract of each successive line, the exceptions in the bill of lading of responsibility for loss by fire at depots &c., attached to the goods and accompanied them from Piedmont to their destination. That this is the English, as well as the American doctrine, and that his Honor erred in ruling to the contrary.

VII. That his Honor erred in holding that the signature of the shipper was necessary to establish his assent to the terms of the bill of lading.

VIII. That the act of the legislature of 1882, does require shipper to go from road to road, until he finds the party in default. And that his Honor erred in ruling to the contrary.

IX. That his Honor erred in admitting the letters of President McCaughrin. That the liability of defendants was a legal question to be determined by the courts, and the declarations or opinions of the president after the loss are not admissible to impose liability on defendants.

Messrs. Conner & Cheves, for appellant.

Messrs. Wells & Orr, T. Q. Donaldson, contra.

October 25th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In November, 1880, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant at Piedmont station, Greenville county, twenty bales of domestics, to be transported to Woodward, Baldwin & Co., at New York, and at the same time and place three bales for Woodward, Baldwin & Norris, at Baltimore. The bill of lading given by the defendant will be found in the brief. It contains a stipulation, that, in case of loss, "the company in whose actual custody the property was at the time of the loss should be answerable." Also an exemption for loss by fire. The twenty bales were destroyed by fire in transit on the wharf at West Point, Va., and the three bales at the same place on board the steamer Shirley, lying at the wharf. This *action was brought to recover damages for the loss of these goods.

The defendant relied upon the exemption in the bill of lading as to fire—that being one of the excepted perils in said bill—and also upon the stipulation as to the liability of the company actually in custody. Two actions were brought below, but as the facts and principles involved were substantially the same in both, it was agreed that the result of the trial in one should determine the other. The jury found for the plaintiff in both cases. The defendant has appealed.

It is admitted that common carriers in this State cannot limit their common law responsibility by any notice or declaration or special contract for or in respect of any goods to be carried by them. This was specially provided by act of legislature (Gen. Stat., 1872, p. 336,) of force at the time of this loss. The first and prominent question, therefore, in the case is, Was the defendant a common carrier as to the goods in question when they were destroyed? If so, then the exemptions in the bill of lading (supposing that to contain the contract) would not avail. If, however, the defendant did not sustain the relation of common carrier as to these goods at the time of their destruction, then, upon equally as well-settled principles as the above, its liability would depend upon the terms of the contract by which the company undertook to ship the goods beyond the terminus of its own line. In other words, the law is, that a common carrier is responsible to the full extent of his common carrier liability, notwithstanding any contract he may make with reference thereto as to all goods, &c., to which he sustains the relation of common carrier; while, on the other hand, one who is not a common carrier may make any contract for transportation which the parties choose, not contrary to law. R. R. Co. v. Pratt, 22 Wall. 129 [22 L. Ed. 827]; R. R. Co. v. Manufacturing Co., 16 Wall. 324 [21 L. Ed. 297].

The true test of the character of a party, as to the fact whether he is a common carrier or not, is his legal duty and obligation with reference to transportation. Is it optional with him whether he will or will not carry? or must he carry for all? If it is his legal duty to carry for all alike, who comply with the terms as to freight, &c., then he is a common carrier, and is subject to all *those stringent rules which, for wise ends, have long since been adopted and uniformly enforced, both in England and in all the States, upon common carriers. If, on the contrary, he may carry or not, as he deems best, he is but a private individual, and is invested, like all other private persons, with the right to make his own contracts, and when made to stand upon them. While the law has imposed duties and heavy responsibilities upon common carriers, which they cannot avoid, limit or shake off, yet it has never attempted to hamper and surround those who are not common carriers with the stringent rules applicable to carriers, or to prevent them from exercising their own judgment as to the responsibilities which they are willing to assume in a special case.

Now the important question arises: Was the defendant a common carrier with reference to the goods in question? The defendant is a corporation created under an act of the legislature, and was formed and organized for railroad transportation between certain points in this State, and as to this railroad and between these points it is certainly a common carrier in the full sense of that term, subject to all the laws and principles, statutory and otherwise, which have been established in this State in reference to common carriers. And if this loss had occurred between the termini of the road there would be no difficulty in the case. In fact, in that event, we suppose the case would not have been here.

It is equally as certain that, so far as the charter of the company is concerned, under its provisions this corporation is not a common carrier beyond its own termini, there being no legal duty imposed to receive and transport goods beyond those points. It would seem to follow then, from these principles, that if liability has attached to the company it must be either because the said company has become a common carrier beyond its termini and over the connecting lines by usage, its character of business, or by contract, express or implied; or it has become liable in this special case by a special contract covering the case.

There is no foundation for the first position; in fact, it has not been urged in the argument that this company has become generally a common carrier outside and beyond the limits of its charter and over its connecting lines, and that it is legally *bound to transport goods to any point beyond its line as may be designated by the shipper. It is true that the destination of the passengers embarking on this road, and of the goods shipped thereon, is frequently beyond its own termini, and at points reached only by connecting roads; but this fact cannot, nor does the payment and receipt of the fare and freight through to the destination, which is as much for the convenience of the traveler and shipper as for the roads, make the company first concerned ex vi termini a common carrier through the whole distance. Such a doctrine would make railroad enterprises a fearful business. It would destroy them utterly, and it finds no place in the books or in reason.

Railroad corporations, however, while being common carriers between their termini, and bound inflexibly by the law on this subject; with no power to alter, amend or limit it as to transportation on their immediate line, may yet contract to deliver consignments at any point beyond such terminus as may be agreed upon, and this contract may be either absolute or conditional, and when made it is subject to the adjudication of the courts, as all other contracts are. The defendant being a carrier only to the extent of its line under its charter, was not bound to receive and ship the goods of the plaintiff beyond its termini. This was optional, as we have seen, and its liability, therefore, in such cases must depend entirely upon the contract made between the parties. Was it absolute, or was it conditional? and if conditional, did the conditions happen which were to exempt the road?

The complaint charges that in consideration of a certain sum the defendant "agreed safely to carry from Piedmont station to the city of New York, over their connecting lines, and there deliver to Woodward, Baldwin & Co., in good order," the goods in question. This is an allegation of an absolute and unconditional agreement, and, had it been sustained by the evidence, there would have been no escape for the defendants: the case of Kyle v. Laurens R. R. Co., 10 Rich. 382 [70 Am. Dec. 231], would have been directly in point. The answer of the defendant puts in a positive denial of the charge in the complaint, and sets up a special and conditional agreement as to the shipment of these special *goods. Upon the complaint and answer, the first question before the court below, as it appears to us, was one of fact, and for the jury, to wit: Was the contract absolute and conditional, as alleged in the complaint, or was it, as stated in the answer, subject to conditions and contingencies?

The testimony on this subject on the one side was the evidence of Mr. Hammet, the president of the plaintiff company, where he said generally: "All our arrangements for shipment and through rates were made with the general freight agent of the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company at Columbia. We were to pay sixty cents per one hundred pounds freight to New York. No contract as to limiting liability of defendant was made or even alluded to. I was in New England when goods burnt." The evidence of the agreement set up in the answer was the bill of lading given when the goods were received at Piedmont station by W. D. Vaughn, agent of the Columbia and Greenville Company, and signed by him as such agent. This bill of lading, it seems, was given to the plaintiff, and by it forwarded to the consignee in New York.

The judge, in his charge, instructed the jury that the agreement between the parties was the one detailed in the testimony of Mr. Hammet; that this agreement was unconditional and had no limited liability attached; that the agent, Vaughn, had no right to alter the terms of this contract and attach conditions, and that, in his judgment, the bill of lading was simply a receipt to carry out the agreement previously entered into between Mr. Hammet and the general agent of the defendants.

We think this charge was erroneous. It is true that it is the province of the judge to construe agreements and extract their meaning, but it is first the province of the jury to determine what agreement has been made. Here, it seems to us, the judge went beyond construction and charged upon facts, the finding of which is alone the province of the jury. The charge in this respect is subject to the fifth exception of defendant. It is not for this court to adjudge or indicate what the precise agreement between the parties was. This, as we have said, is a question of fact for the jury, and the jury should have been left untrammelled in the duty of determining the fact; and as, in our opinion, they *were not so left, the cases must go back on this ground if no other.

But, even supposing that the evidence of Mr. Hammet is the controlling testimony in the case, and that he detailed truthfully what occurred between himself and the general agent (of which there is no doubt), yet we think it was error of law in the Circuit judge to hold that that agreement amounted to an unconditional contract on the part of the defendants to transport and deliver at all times and to all points whatever goods the plaintiffs might ship over the road of the defendant to some destination by connecting lines beyond its termini, and that the agent of the defendant, who gave the bill of lading, could not alter the terms of this previous contract.

We do not see anything of a positive agreement in the interview between Mr. Hammet and the general agent of Columbia, except as to the rates upon which his goods were to be shipped. He says: "All our arrangements for shipment and through rates were made with the general freight agent of Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company at Columbia." But what these arrangements were is not specified, except as to the rates. Under such circumstances we do not see why the agent of the company and the plaintiff might not specify the terms and conditions of the shipment, when he came to receive a special consignment. It would certainly not be illegal for the shipper and the agent at that time to include in the bill of lading such stipulations as might be agreed upon. Whether both parties consented and agreed upon the stipulations, or understood them alike, might be a question dependent upon the facts, but that they would have the right to insert such as they deemed proper, there could be no question. The error of the charge was, that the Circuit judge assumed that the stipulations found therein were inserted by the agent of defendant without the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff. This we think was a question of fact, and should have been left to the jury.

The legal propositions mainly relied on and earnestly pressed by the respondent's counsel, need not be nor can they be successfully contested. They are sustained by abundant authority. "Where a carrier undertakes, without more, to transport beyond

*its own line, the liability attaching at the commencement will continue throughout the transit to destination; all connecting lines of carriers employed in furthering and completing such transportation become the agents of the first carrier, and for their defaults he becomes responsible to the owner of the goods."

We need not go behind Kyle v. Laurens Railroad Company, 10 Rich. 382 [70 Am. Dec.

231], for support to this proposition. There the Laurens Railroad undertook to deliver cotton in Charleston. The cotton was burnt on a connecting line. The Laurens road was held responsible, and why? Because its contract had been breached; it failed to deliver in Charleston. The court did not hold that the Laurens Railroad was a common carrier as to this cotton, and upon that ground liable for its loss, but that it had contracted to do what it had failed to do, and therefore was liable. And here, if it had appeared as a fact found by the jury, that the defendant had made a contract which, upon a legal construction, was without conditions and absolute, then the defendant would be responsible upon the same principle as in Kyle v. Railroad Company, supra.

The respondent further contends, that a common carrier cannot generally limit his liability by a special agreement. And in no event can he shield himself from the consequences of negligence or misconduct by an unconditional exemption from certain perils as fire, &c. This, too, he sustains by abundant authority. But it seems to be overlooked in the application which is sought to be made of these principles on behalf of the respondent, that they apply to common carriers and to common carriers alone; that they have no reference to others who may happen to transport goods at a certain time and place, when and where they are under no legal obligation to do this work, but have assumed it voluntarily, perhaps as much for the convenience as otherwise of the owner of the goods. It is conceded that they do have reference to common carriers; those who have undertaken the business of a common carrier either as a chartered company or otherwise, but we fail to see their application to the other class suggested.

The argument of respondent, it appears to us, has assumed the *real point at issue, to wit: that defendant, as to the goods in question, was a common carrier. We do not think that the defendant was a common carrier beyond its termini under its charter. We hold that there was no legal duty on it to deliver goods beyond its line; that it might contract to do so, however, according to such terms as might be agreed upon between it and the shipper. This agreement might be either absolute or conditional. It might make the company substantially a common carrier, and therefore subject it to all the rules and principles contended for by the respondent, or it might contain limitation and restriction far short of this. But, whatever may be the contract in a given case, is a question of fact for the jury, which, when found and properly construed, must become the law of the case.

There is really no great difference between the English and American doctrine on this subject. The one holds that, to exempt a carrier from liability beyond its terminus there must be a special contract to that end. The other, that to make the first carrier responsible there must be a special contract to that end. Both admit that the carrier is not bound to go beyond the terminus, but that he may do so; and if he undertakes to do so he is bound by his undertaking. In the one case, if the contract contains no exemption it is absolute; in the other, if conditions are specified they must govern. This is nothing more than saying that the whole thing is per contract, and that whatever the contract is that must be enforced—the legal construction being, that in the one case, in the absence of exemptions, the carrier has contracted, unconditionally, to deliver; the other, with conditions inserted, they must control. But if there be a difference, that difference is immaterial here, because both parties claim a contract—the plaintiff an unconditional contract made with Mr. Hammet, and the defendant a conditional one made by Vaughn and accepted by the plaintiff in the receipt of the bill of lading. So at last, as we have said, the case hinges in the first instance upon a question of fact.

The principles announced in the leading case referred to by respondent's counsel (Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357 [21 L. Ed. 627],) do not conflict with those above.

The court in this case, *as is said in the argument, after a most careful examination of the principal authorities, both English and American, reached the conclusion, as announced in its opinion: "First, that a common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility when such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law. Secondly, that it is not just and reasonable, in the eye of the law, for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for negligence of himself and servants. Thirdly, that these rules apply both to carriers of goods and carriers of passengers, and with special force to the latter."

These, no doubt, are all sound conclusions, and are not only well sustained by authority, but are founded on justice and wisdom, when applied, as this case evidently intended they should be, to the business of common carriers acting within their sphere—which business, in this day, has assumed such important and immense proportions. There is not a word, however, in this case, or in the conclusions announced, which make these principles applicable to one who is not a common carrier, or denies to such one the privilege and right to contract for himself. It must not be taken for granted that, because one is a common carrier between certain points, that he is also a common carrier beyond those points, and then apply the principles which have been established in reference to common carriers to him, both within and beyond his lines.

This distinction, it appears to us, has not been clearly observed in this case. Hence we think that many of the authorities cited are not applicable. In Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, supra, Mr. Justice Bradley, drawing the true distinction, said: "A common carrier may undoubtedly become a private carrier or a bailee for hire, when, as a matter of accommodation or special engagement, he undertakes to convey something which it is not his business to convey. * * * In such case such agreement might be made in reference to his taking and conveying the same, as the parties chose to make, not involving any stipulation contrary to law or public policy. But when a carrier has a regularly established business for carrying all or certain articles, and especially if that carrier is a corporation created for the purpose *of the carrying trade, and the carriage of the articles is embraced within the scope of its chartered powers, it is a common carrier, and a special contract about its responsibility does not divest it of the character."

Neither is there any conflict between the principles herein, and the well-considered case from New Hampshire, where the court held that where several common carriers are associated in a continuous line, one price for through freight being received by the initial company, the goods being marked and received to be delivered at a distant point beyond the termini of such initial company, that in such case the initial company is bound to carry them or see that they are carried to their final destination, and is liable for loss happening at any point along the line. Nashua Lock Company v. The Worcester and Nashua Railroad Company, 48 N. H. 339. That was upon the ground that from the facts mentioned, and nothing more, the court would conclude in accordance with the English doctrine, that the contract to deliver in that case was not an absolute contract to deliver at the point mentioned, and, of course, should be enforced as made by the parties. But there is nothing in that case which even intimates the idea that the initial company was bound to receive the goods, whether it wished to do so or not, or that the parties could not make a contract with stipulations if they saw proper to do so. That case is authority for the position that, where the initial company receives the goods, marked, and to be delivered to a distant point, with the freight paid to that point, and no stipulations are made to the contrary, the contract is absolute. It decides nothing more, and it is in accord with Kyle v. Laurens Railroad Co., supra, but not at all in conflict with the positions taken herein above.

We think the charge of his Honor is subject to exception first and the specifications (b) and (c) thereunder, in that he declined so to charge. The other specifications under this exception assume a question of fact which the judge was not authorized to assume. These cannot be sustained.

Exceptions third, fourth and sixth are overruled. The third because the request is based on an assumption of fact, to wit: that the bill of lading was the contract.

This, as we have seen, *was a question of fact for the jury and could not be assumed by the judge. The fourth claims that no previous agreement could alter the terms of the bill of lading. This would be true if the bill of lading constituted the contract, but that was the very question at issue. The sixth called upon the judge to charge that "whether the contract was the contract of the Columbia and Greenville Company or the contract of each successive line, yet that the exemption from the peril from fire attached to the goods all through." Each successive company was certainly a common carrier along its line, and while the goods were on each line, the common law liability of a common carrier, with all its absolute force, attached, and exemptions could not be made by which the company in possession could divest itself of the character of a common carrier; hence, the judge could not have charged this request.

Exceptions second, fifth, seventh and ninth are sustained.

Exception eighth we do not consider in the case. The exceptions have not been set out in full in this opinion, as this would have encumbered it too much. It is to be hoped that the reporter, in giving a statement of the case, will set them out.

Next and last, as to the admissibility of the letters of McCaughrin, the president of the defendant company. These letters were the written declaration of an agent, and their admissibility must depend upon the rules of evidence in such cases. These rules would allow such declarations when constituting a part of the res gestae, or when made within the scope of the agency, but declarations made some time after the act and beyond the scope of the agency should not be allowed. The letters contained an admission by the president of the liability of his company, or rather the expression of a legal opinion to that effect, and they were written some time after the controversy began. We do not think that this opinion was within the scope of the agency of the president, nor its expression a part of the res gestae. They were, therefore, inadmissible. Had they contained an admission of some fact connected with the contract, it would have been otherwise.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

*Mr. Justice McGOWAN dissenting. In these cases I cannot concur in the judgment of my brethren for the reasons herein stated.

[Here follows his statement of the case.] We will not follow the exceptions, but endeavor to dispose of the questions as they arise in order. First, as to the contract between the parties. The exceptions charge in various forms that it was error to leave it to the jury to decide what was the contract between the parties; that the only contract was the printed bill of lading; that all previous verbal negotiations upon the subject were absorbed into that, which became the only contract between the parties.

We believe it is the general rule in such cases where there have been no previous negotiations, to consider the bill of lading, although not signed by the shipper, given on one side and accepted by the other, as the contract of the parties. But when there has been a previous general engagement on the subject, the question often arises whether the shipment was made on the terms of the bill of lading or upon the faith of the previous arrangement. The rule of evidence is that "Parol contemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written instrument, * * * but the rule is not infringed by the admission of parol evidence showing that the instrument is altogether void, or that it never had any existence or binding force either by reason of fraud or for want of due execution, or for the illegality of the subject-matter. 1 Greenl. Evid., § 248.

In this case the plaintiffs denied that they had ever accepted the terms proposed in the printed receipt, which was not signed by them, or made any such contract, but, on the contrary, insisted that the only agreement they had made was that made in Columbia by President Hammet with the general freight agent of the defendant corporation, in which nothing was said about limiting liabilities, but was as follows: "We shipped goods on November 22d, 1880, to Woodward, Baldwin & Norris; were delivered on that day at Piedmont to be carried to Baltimore. All our arrangements for shipment and through rates were made with the general freight agent of Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company. We were to pay fifty-six cents for one hundred *pounds of freight to Baltimore. No contract as to limiting liability of defendant was made or ever alluded to." They insisted that upon the faith of this agreement alone they had shipped the domestics in question, and the defendant corporation could not at the last moment, after the property had been actually delivered, interpolate upon that contract new terms and conditions never submitted before nor agreed to by them.

The question as presented was not as to altering the terms of a written agreement, but whether the paper contained a contract at all. It certainly requires two to make a contract. It is elementary "that in order to constitute a binding contract there must be a definitive promise by the party charged, accepted by the person claiming the benefit of such promise. There must be a request on one side and an assent on the other. No contract is raised by a mere ex parte affirmation in discourse, a mere assertion, or offer to enter into an agreement not expressly and absolutely assented to by both parties." Chit. Cont. 9. Both parties must assent in the same sense. If the printed bill of lading had been before Hammet and the agent in Columbia when they made the general arrangement, and its terms had been agreed to, then it would have been the written contract of the parties beyond the reach of alteration by parol evidence, and to be construed by the judge alone. But whether the various stipulations in the receipt were ever agreed to and became the contract of the parties was a very different question.

It is true that the bill of lading seems to have been offered in evidence by the plaintiffs, probably because it contained the receipt of the defendant for the property; but it does not follow that they are bound by the numerous conditions, exceptions and alleged agreements therein. Ordinarily a receipt is only evidence of a single fact, the closing fact of a transaction, and the act of but one of the parties. We would not expect to find in it original terms and conditions stated as agreed to by two contracting parties. "A receipt in itself does not express the terms of any contract or writing of the words of the parties between whom it has passed, but merely evidences, by way of admission, the fact stated in it, consequently it is not governed by the rules which prescribe the effect of instruments adopted by parties as the *special means of evidencing some compact or understanding had between them, but like evidence not enjoying any special privilege, is capable of being contradicted or modified by other classes of evidence." Heath v. Steele, 9 S. C. 92.

It could not be assumed conclusively that the Piedmont Company had agreed to the terms of the receipt, only because it was retained by the person, possibly a mere employé, who delivered the property at the depot. Whiting v. Sullivan, 7 Mass. 107; Bostwick v. Railroad Co., 45 N. Y. 712; Hutchinson on Common Carriers, § 238, and Lawson on Contracts of Carriers, § 101. It seems to me that the point is fairly stated by Mr. Lawson at page 138, when he says: "When the shipper of goods, who has previously entered into an oral agreement with a common carrier, takes a receipt for the same, he has a right to assume, in the absence of notice to the contrary, that his agreement is embraced in the paper, or at least that his receipt contains nothing to the contrary, and that it is in the nature of a fraud on the part of a carrier, having entered into such oral agreement, to insert in the receipt a contract of an entirely different character and present it to the shipper without calling his attention to it or getting his assent." The question of what was the contract, whether the general agreement in Columbia, or the paper handed to the servant when the bales were delivered at the depot, was one of fact, and I cannot say that the judge erred in submitting it to the jury.

Assuming then, as we may do, that the jury found that the conditions expressed in the printed bill of lading were never agreed to by the Piedmont Company, but that the bales of domestics marked for Baltimore were sent to the depot under the general arrangement entered into by the president at Columbia, the verdict might be rested on that alone and go no further. In this view the defendant corporation undertook to transport the property to Baltimore; in the words of Mr. Hammet, that it was to be "carried to Baltimore" and there delivered to Woodward, Baldwin & Norris, to whom the bales were directed. This arrangement was made with the defendant corporation alone, without any reference to the means by which it was to be done or limitation as to responsibility.

*377

There was no privity of *contract with any other company whatever. So far as appears, the defendant corporation or its agent had no authority to make a contract binding upon intermediate companies for their respective share of the service to be rendered; but they, without any reference to any such agencies, undertook themselves to give through transportation, to do or have done the whole work and to deliver in Baltimore, thereby, as I think, making for that purpose and to that extent, all connecting lines their agents, or, as it were, extending their own road to Baltimore. If their own track did not actually extend to Baltimore, they, nevertheless, undertook the business through to that point and received pay for it, and they cannot now be permitted to disclaim their own contract or escape the liabilities incident to it.

If time permitted I might review the numerous authorities upon the subject, but we can only deal with conclusions. After much discussion and some difference of opinion, we regard the law as properly held, both on principles of justice and the preponderance of authority, in the well-considered case of The Nashua Lock Company v. The Worcester and Nashua Railroad Company, 48 N. H. 339, where, after a full review of the authorities, it was held that, "When several common carriers are associated in a continuous line of transportation, and in the course of the business goods are carried through the connected lines for one price, under an agreement by which the freight money is divided among the associated carriers in proportion fixed by the agreement; if the carrier at one end of the line receives goods to be transported through, marked for a consignee at the other end of the line, and on delivery of the goods takes pay for transportation through, the carrier who so receives the goods is bound to carry them or see that they are carried to their final destination, and is liable for an accidental loss happening at any part of the connected line."

I refer to this case for the authorities cited, and the reasons upon which the doctrine is based. This New Hampshire case was much stronger than the one in hand. There the initial company was held liable for doing nothing more than receiving and transporting the goods marked to be delivered at a point beyond their own road. Here this was done, but there was also *an agreement that the goods should "be carried to Baltimore;" that is, delivered in Baltimore. Upon this very point as to what shall be regarded as sufficient evidence of an undertaking to transport through, there has been much diversity of opinion in the American courts, which (Mr. Hutchinson informs us at section 148 of his book on Carriers) are about equally divided on the point "whether a carrier receiving goods marked for delivery beyond the end of his line is, in the absence of special agreement, only responsible for safe carriage over his own line and safe delivery to the next carrier." See late Tennessee case of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company v. Weaver, 9 Lea 39, and 42 Am. Rep. 655, and notes. I believe that when the company receiving the goods is known to be one of a continuous line of associated companies, and there was, as here, a special agreement of the initial company to transport through, there has never been a doubt expressed in any court.

It is, however, earnestly urged on the other side that the defendant corporation was a common carrier by law only as to their own road, and that their duties should be correlative to their rights and not beyond; that as to so much of the Columbia agreement as was to be performed beyond Columbia, the company must be considered as an individual undertaking to transport certain bales of goods for hire, which single transaction would not make him a common carrier or subject to the rigorous liability imposed upon carriers. The obvious answer to this is that the defendant corporation, when they agreed to transport these goods, was already a common carrier all the way to Baltimore, by virtue of their being engaged with the associated lines in the regular business of through transportation to that point.

The transportation of the few bales of domestics in this case was not a single, isolated act for accommodation or compensation, but one of the acts done in the course of through business, in which they were regularly engaged. It appeared that they canvassed for through business, had arranged the price for which they could do it, and prepared a most elaborate through-receipt. As Mr. Hammet proved, they were at that time engaged in extensive through business "shipping over these routes." As I understand it, common carriers are not limited to those created by charter, but may become such by virtue of their occupation. Railroad Company v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357 [21 L. Ed. 627]. Mr. Tomlinson, in his Law Dictionary, says: "All persons carrying goods for hire, as masters and owners of ships, lightermen, stage coachmen and the like, come under the denomination of common carriers." In the case of Clarke v. Swearingen, 6 S. C. 292, Mr. Swearingen was treated as a common carrier, for the reason that during the winter months he was engaged in the business of boating cotton for hire down the Savannah river to Augusta.

The Greenville Company were common carriers to the extent of their road by charter, and beyond that by virtue of being engaged in the business of through transportation. Their liability as common carriers should not be measured by the length of their road, but by the extent of their undertakings in their business of through transportation either by themselves or in connection with other associated lines. We think there was competent evidence before the jury that the company undertook to carry this property to Baltimore, and the jury having found such to be the fact, the other companies are to be deemed the agents of the defendant, for whose fault they are responsible. Railroad Company v. Pratt, 22 Wall. 133 [22 L. Ed. 827]. A man who owns a private ferry may make himself a common carrier if he undertake to carry for hire all persons indifferently. Littlejohn v. Jones, 2 McMull. 368 [39 Am. Dec. 132]. And this is a question of fact to be determined by the jury. Ibid.

The law is so well stated in the case from Tennessee (as late as 1882) above cited, that I will venture to make a somewhat long quotation: "It is well settled that a railroad company, as a common carrier, may contract to carry to a point beyond the terminus of its own line so as to become liable for its delivery at that point, and that the liability thus attaching at the commencement, will continue throughout the whole transit, all connecting lines of carriers employed in furthering and completing such transportation, becoming its agents, for whose defaults it is responsible. Railroad v. Stockard, 11 Heisk. 568; Hutch. Carr., § 145. But the courts are not in accord as to what will, prima facie, constitute such a contract.

*"In England the courts from the first adopted the rule, to which they have formally adhered, that when a railroad company, as a common carrier, receives goods directed to a place beyond the terminus of its own line, without limiting its responsibility by express agreement, such receipt of the goods so directed is prima facie evidence of an undertaking to carry the goods to the place to which they are directed, and all connecting railroad companies, or other carriers along the route, are merely the agents of the first company. The latter is alone subject to suit for any loss or damage to the goods, the other companies not being responsible to the owner for want of privity of contract. Muschamp v. Railway Co., 8 Mees. & W. 421. The rule, founded as it is in common law principles, has much to recommend it by reason of its uniformity and simplicity, and has been found to work well for the comparatively short distances of carriage on the British island. It has been followed by the courts of a number of States in this country, but modified, generally, so as to give an action against the carrying company actually guilty of the wrong out of which the cause of action arises, although not the original contracting company. All of the American courts, perhaps, except it may be those of Georgia, concur in adopting the English rule, with the modification suggested, wherever the contract is clearly a through contract, or the circumstances show that the contracting company has an interest, or partner, or otherwise, in the entire route. Hutch. Carr., § 160. The courts of the State of Georgia seem to have adopted the English rule without qualification. Many of the States have been led to modify the rule, not only in allowing the actually defaulting carrier, other than the first, to be sued, but in the matter of the prima facie evidence of a through contract and the burden of proof," &c.

In the case at bar there was no need of resorting to the rule as to prima facie proof of the contract; the proof was positive, and besides the circumstances showed most conclusively that the contracting company had an interest in the through transportation "as partner or otherwise." This was properly a question for the jury, and they have so found.

But, suppose we assume that the person who carried the *domestics to the depot at Piedmont had the authority to act for the company in receiving the printed receipt with the numerous stipulations embodied therein, and the jury found that to be the only contract between the parties: I incline to think that, even in that case, the verdict should stand. At the time these goods were shipped the act of 1864 was of force in this State. It has since been superseded, but we must consider it in determining the rights of these parties. Section second declared: "That no public notice, or declaration, or special contract shall limit or in any wise affect the liability, at common law, of any railroad company within this State, for or in respect of any goods to be carried and conveyed by them, but such railroad company shall be liable, as at common law, to answer for the loss of or injury to any articles or goods to be carried or conveyed by them, any public notice, declaration or special contract by them made and given contrary thereto, or in any wise limiting such liability, notwithstanding." Rev. Stat. 366.

The defendant corporation was a "railroad company within this State," and, of course, subject to the law, and there can be no doubt that, according to its terms, the exemptions from liability inserted in the bill of lading, were void and of no effect so far as they concerned transportation on the track of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company proper. But it is insisted that the liabilities of the company must be limited to their own road; that not being carriers beyond, they were not compelled to take the business, and if they did so they had the right to attach their own conditions, and the provisions of the act did not apply to any agreement to transport beyond Columbia.

This might be so if this had been a single act of transportation, undertaken by contract for the accommodation of the Piedmont Company, but we have already endeavored to show that by engaging in the business, they had previously acquired the character of a common carrier as to the through transportation, and must be held to an accountability as such. If so, was not a contract as to that business as much under the inhibitions of the act as business upon their own rails? It has been decided in this State that the agreement of a railroad company to deliver articles at a point beyond the terminus of their own road, made *them liable as carriers until the point was reached and the articles delivered. Kyle v. Laurens Railroad Company, 10 Rich. 382 [70 Am. Dec. 231]; Hutch. Carr.

In the case of Kyle, the plaintiff shipped cotton on the Laurens Railroad, to be delivered in Charleston; two other roads had to be used in reaching Charleston; part of the cotton was lost after it left the lower terminus of the Laurens road, and yet it was held that the Laurens Company was liable for the loss, "their undertaking being special to deliver in Charleston." That is to say, their contract as carriers extended beyond their own road to the point of delivery.

But it is said while that may be so as to roads within the State, the principle does not apply and our State law did not reach transportation on railroads beyond the limits of the State. I do not understand why not. I do not see why the South Carolina law which applies to railroads in the State, should not apply to them as well while running the road of another company beyond this State. In either case one carrier is using the road of another carrier in doing carrier business. Both are carriers and it would seem that the one which undertakes to transport the property, should be subject to the law applicable to common carriers in the State where it is located, and the contract is made. The contract was an entirety for the whole distance, made in the State, to be paid in the State, and to a corporation of the State, and I suppose the fact that the property was to be carried beyond the State through other associated lines, could not change the rule which requires that a contract shall be construed according to the lex loci contractus. McDaniel v. Railroad, 24 Iowa 412; Cantu v. Bennett, 39 Texas 303.

It is not, however, necessary to affirm anything upon this point. If we assume that the special law of this State, declaring null efforts to restrict liability in certain cases, did not apply to so much of the printed receipt as stipulated to transport beyond her borders, still, as I suppose, the defendant corporation being a common carrier quoad the through transportation was amenable to the general law upon the subject of the liability of carriers; which, while it allows parties to limit their liability by special *contract, does not allow such limitations as will destroy the character of the parties as common carriers.

For many good reasons the law is very watchful of the rights of shippers. The general doctrine, as I understand it, is laid down in 2 Greenl. Evid. 260: "If the acceptance of the goods was special, the burden of proof is still on the carrier to show not only that the cause of the loss was within the terms of the exceptions, but also that there was on his part no negligence or want of due care." See Singleton v. Hilliard, 1 Strobb. 203; Swindler v. Hilliard & Brooks, 2 Rich. 302 [45 Am. Dec. 732]; Baker v. Brinson, 9 Rich. 201 [67 Am. Dec. 548]; Railroad Company v. Lockwood, supra; Hutchinson on Carriers, § 260. The last named authority, at the section given, says: "That the weight of authority in this country is in favor of excluding negligence altogether as an element of contract between the carrier and his employer and of holding the former to a rigid accountability for every degree of negligence, without the power by contract or in any other mode to divest himself of it."

In the case of Swindler v. Hilliard, supra, the defendants had a steamboat running between Charleston and Columbia. They received cotton in Columbia and, gave a bill of lading with these words incorporated into it, "Damages of fire and navigation only excepted." The cotton was burnt on the boat, and it was held, "That carriers can not by any special contract exempt themselves from liability for losses arising from negligence, and when there is a special acceptance the onus of showing not only that the cause of the loss was within the terms of the exception, but also that there was no negligence, lies on the carrier."

In the case from the Supreme Court of the United States, supra, after exhaustive consideration of the whole subject and a careful examination of the authorities, it was held, "First, that a common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility when such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law; and second, that it is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for negligence of himself or his servants."

I conclude, even if the printed receipt constituted the only contract between the parties, that the defendant corporation having assumed the business of a common carrier as to the through transportation, and received the property addressed to Baltimore, was bound, notwithstanding the stipulations of exemption, to carry out the main undertaking therein, "to transport to Columbia, and thence by connecting lines to Baltimore." The law will not allow parties to do the business of common carriers and to receive pay as common carriers and at the same time to renounce all responsibility as common carriers. The onus was upon the defendant corporation to show that the property was not destroyed through negligence, which they did not do.

In the language of Judge Withers, in the case of Baker v. Brinson, supra: "Whilst in this State we recognize the doctrine that a carrier may limit by special contract his common law liabilities, there is not the slightest disposition further to modify the rules justly applicable to such transactions. Learned judges in England and America have regretted the recognition of such exceptions. Notwithstanding their apparent rigor, there is a salutary policy in these common law doctrines, and those who are called to administer the law must see to it that they are not wholly evaded."

I think the judgment below should be affirmed.

Judgment reversed.

19 S. C. 384

FRASER & DILL v. CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON.

(November Term, 1882.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⇨127.]

Where an executor qualifies after his co-executor has fraudulently misapplied the estate, and afterwards a receiver is appointed without objection, the court will not, upon the death of the guilty executor, restore the management of the estate to the survivor.

2. The rulings in this case on former appeals, (11 S. C. 515; 13 Id. 542,) as to the judgments obtained at law against the executor, stated.

[3. Executors and Administrators ⇨453.]

Judgments obtained at law by innocent creditors against an executor on notes purporting to bear the testator's signature, but which had been forged by the executor in the testator's life-time, are conclusive upon the executor and upon the legatees, as his privies.

[4. Executors and Administrators ⇨255.]

*A judgment rendered on a creditors' note against an estate on the same day that an injunction was obtained and filed in a creditors' suit restraining actions, the creditors' bill being afterwards discontinued, is not evidence of collusion on the part of the creditor suing at law, nor notice sufficient to put him upon inquiry as to the genuineness of the signature to his note.

7. This case distinguished from Wilson v. Kelly, ante p. 160.

Before Fraser, J., Charleston, March, 1882. The opinion fully states the case.

[For subsequent opinion, see 23 S. C. 373.]

Messrs. G. D. Bryan, A. G. Magrath, Robert Chisholm and B. J. Whaley, for appellants.

Messrs. McCrady & Sons, S. Lord and James Conner, contra.

November 23d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McGOWAN. It will be useful to precede the consideration of the several questions made in this case by a brief statement of the facts out of which they arise.

On January 26th, 1872, Joseph Whaley died possessed of a large estate, which he disposed of by will, appointing as his executors his son William Whaley and his kinsman William James Whaley. Soon after his death William Whaley qualified, and continued to act as sole qualified executor until July 7th, 1874, when William James Whaley also qualified. Up to this time a number of persons claiming to be creditors of the testator, Joseph Whaley, had recovered judgments, mostly by default, against William Whaley as executor; but of these it will only be necessary to state the following, which are particularly assailed, viz.: R. K. Scott, for $5,373.01, May 30th, 1874; Fraser & Dill, $2,069.76, June 8th, 1874; Mary F.

Davie, $1,400, June 8th, 1874, and the judgment of Gadsden and wife for $15,129. This latter action was commenced in 1873 against William Whaley as executor, but, he having died in the meantime, judgment was finally recovered against William James Whaley, as surviving executor, after he had qualified in October, 1880.

On June 8th, 1874, the Peoples' Bank of South Carolina, claiming to be a bond creditor of Joseph Whaley, filed a complaint in the nature of a creditors' bill to marshal the assets of Joseph Whaley, and on the same day obtained an order for temporary injunction against parties suing at law. On July 13th, 1874, Fraser & Dill, having obtained judgment, as above stated, against the executor, William Whaley, instituted this action charging insolvency and maladministration against the acting executor, William Whaley, and praying that he should be held to account for the estate of Joseph Whaley, and especially for certain stocks of the city of Charleston, which were standing in the name of the testator at the time of his death, and for the appointment of a receiver, &c. This cause, by consent, was incorporated into that of the bank above referred to, under which the creditors of Joseph Whaley had been called in.

To this proceeding the beneficiaries under the will of Joseph Whaley were not made parties; only William Whaley, executor, and the city council; but afterwards, by order, William James Whaley, lately qualified as executor, was also made a party, and he answered: "That all the transactions referred to in the complaint occurred a long time before he qualified as executor, and took place with William Whaley, the first executor, and the defendant is in no wise connected with the same; wherefore he asked to be dismissed with his costs," &c. At this time the Charleston stock was the principal matter in controversy. Judge Reed made a decree from which there was no appeal, and this court sent the case back for further testimony, &c. 8 S. C. 318.

Upon the second investigation it appeared that most of the scrip for the Charleston stock had not been transferred by the testator, Joseph Whaley, in his life-time, but that his son William, afterwards his acting executor, had signed his name without authority. During this inquiry as to the genuineness of the signatures purporting to be those of Joseph Whaley, experts as to handwriting were examined and comparison of signatures resorted to, when it seems that some witnesses testified that the endorsements on the notes of plaintiffs and other creditors, who, as before stated, had obtained judgments on their endorsements against William Whaley, as executor, were in the same handwriting as the transfers of the Charleston scrip; but the referee, Mr. Dingle, made no report on testimony which fell out thus incidentally, confining himself to the matter of the Charleston scrip, which alone had been referred to him. As to that, he reported, as matter of fact, that the transfers of scrip, with one exception, were not in the proper handwriting of the testator, Joseph Whaley.

Judge Wallace confirmed this report, held the city council liable, and ordered the appointment of a receiver of the estate of Joseph Whaley. In his decree Judge Wallace said: "In the argument at the hearing, the testimony to the effect that the signatures of Joseph Whaley upon the notes held by plaintiffs and other creditors were in the same handwriting as the disputed signatures upon the city scrip, was pressed upon my attention, and it was suggested that if the disputed signatures upon the scrip were not genuine then the signatures upon said notes were not genuine, and the holders thereof had not the right to sustain the relation of plaintiffs to this action. * * * It was said, on the other hand, that the notes referred to were in judgment, and had been, therefore, passed upon by a court of competent jurisdiction and could not be collaterally impeached, and could only be assailed in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. The issue thus raised is not ripe for decision in this decree, but may again arise in the subsequent progress of the cause. * * * It is further ordered that the receiver have leave to institute such proceedings as he may be advised may be proper and necessary to try the validity of any claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley, and defend such proceedings as may be instituted against him," &c. This judgment was affirmed in this court. See 11 S. C. 515.

About this time (1879) William Whaley,

the acting executor, *died. The receiver, T. W. Bacot, Esq., did not exercise the authority given him in assailing judgments recovered against William Whaley while he was acting as sole qualified executor; but the city council of Charleston procured the assignment of the shares of Josephine M. Porter and Sabina Morris, granddaughters of Joseph Whaley, and entitled to two-thirds of the legacy of $20,000 of city stock, under his will given to Maria Evans Morris, and as such assignee made application to the Circuit Court to allow them to be made parties in order to protect their interest. The Circuit judge (Fraser) refused the motion, but upon appeal to this court, under the very peculiar circumstances, the order was reversed and the parties allowed to come in—Judge McIver, in delivering the judgment of the court, saying: "But when there is no such representative before the court, and especially when, as in this case, the person appointed as such representative (the executor) has been declared unfit to be entrusted with the administration of the assets of the testator, not merely on the ground of negligence or want of capacity, but upon the allegations and proof of the grossest fraud, he certainly cannot be regarded by a court of equity as the representative of the legatees, one of whom is a minor, and, therefore, peculiarly entitled to the protecting care of the court. In such case the legatees must necessarily represent their own interests, and for this purpose must be brought before the court as parties. * * * The legatees undoubtedly had a right to be let in as parties and to have the receiver restrained from distributing the fund until they could have an opportunity of asserting their rights in such form as they may be advised," &c. See 13 S. C. 542.

Under this judgment the plaintiffs filed a supplemental complaint, making the said legatees parties, and they, through the city council, answered, claiming affirmative relief. They deny that the open accounts to a large amount set up as claims against Joseph Whaley are his debts and as to them they demand strict proof. They also claim that as legatees they have the right in a creditors' bill to assail and set aside judgments previously obtained against the sole qualified executor before they were called in as parties upon the ground that the signatures of the *endorsements, on which the judgments were obtained, were not in the handwriting of the testator, Joseph Whaley, "and said judgments were obtained by and through the fraud of the executor, who knew but suppressed the fact that the signatures were not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley, and the rights of his legatees cannot thus be affected and destroyed; and all the debts, and especially those upon which judgment was allowed to pass on June 8th, 1874, are no more than the debts of William Whaley, and not chargeable upon the estate of his testator."

No new testimony was offered on this new issue, but, by consent, the case was tried upon the testimony taken before the referee in the original cause as to the city scrip. Judge Fraser held that: "Some of the claims had been put into judgment by suit against William Whaley, at the time the only qualified executor, and others have been established only under the original proceedings, to which this case is supplemental. In the absence of collusion, I must regard a judgment against an executor as conclusive against the world whenever the same matter comes in question again. It seems to me that any other rule would make it necessary to change the whole practice of suing claims against the estate of deceased persons. With these views, I hold that all the judgments proved before the referee, G. W. Dingle, Esq., including the judgment of Edward H. Gadsden and wife v. William Whaley, executor of Joseph Whaley, and as to all of which there was evidence before me, are valid claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley," &c.

He, also, in relation to the claim of William James Whaley, surviving executor of Joseph Whaley, to have restored to him the custody of the estate of Joseph Whaley, held as follows: "If the court is to administer the fund it must have control and possession of it, and especially when William James Whaley, the surviving executor, while entirely free from fault otherwise, does not seem to have used any exertion to aid in saving the estate from the alleged fraudulent administration of his co-executor, William Whaley. The motion, therefore, made before me and earnestly pressed, to take the estate of Joseph Whaley out of the hands of the receiver, appointed by this court, and to *restore it to the custody of William James Whaley, surviving executor, is refused."

From this decree the legatees, the city council of Charleston, as assignee, and William James Whaley, as surviving executor of Joseph Whaley, appeal to this court. But the exceptions are long and sometimes duplicate the same matter; and those of the city council, as assignee, and of William James Whaley, as surviving executor, it is believed, make all the questions necessary to be considered.

Exceptions of William James Whaley, surviving executor:

1. "We adopt the grounds of appeal made and served by the city council of Charleston on October 13th, 1882.

2. "Because the Circuit judge erred in refusing to take the estate out of the hands of the receiver and restore it to the custody of the defendant.

3. "Because the defendant is, as sole surviving executor, the only proper party to represent the estate of Joseph Whaley.

4. "Because the defendant, as executor, has never been removed.

5. "Because the defendant has been prevented, by want of funds, in defending and protecting the estate of Joseph Whaley as well as his own rights and interests in the case.

6. "Because the appointment of a receiver in this defendant's stead and place was never prayed for in plaintiffs' complaint, was unnecessary, was done without cause shown or alleged against him, when he was free from fault, and against his consent, and unjust to him.

7. "Because the judgments against the estate of Joseph Whaley were entered on claims which were fraudulent, and known to be so by the then sole executor, William Whaley, and before this defendant had qualified as executor; and the counsel for plaintiffs (Mr. S. Lord) admitted on the trial of the cause before Judge Fraser that the papers upon which the judgments against the estate were obtained were never signed in the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

8. "Because the judgments having been obtained upon paper whereon the names of Joseph Whaley were not in his handwriting, nor authorized by him, should be set aside and the estate protected; and that this appellant, as sole surviving *executor, is the proper party to do it, is anxious to do so, and is prevented from doing so because the custody of the estate has not been restored to him.

9. "Because the defendant was never made a party to the suit, as required by the order of Judge Graham, of the 13th August, 1874, in that no summons or complaint were served on him, nor was he a party to the action at the time of the order of Judge Graham of 12th September, 1874.

10. "Because the receiver has not protected the estate against parties claiming to be creditors.

11. "Because, when an executor does not appeal (nor object) from an order appointing a receiver at the time the order is made, it will not prevent his subsequently asking the consideration of the court whether the order ought to be sustained.

12. "The necessity for a receiver having ceased to exist, the property should be restored to the legal owners."

Exceptions of city council, as assignee:

1. "Because the evidence before his Honor, Judge Fraser, clearly and positively establishes the fact that the causes of action on which judgments were entered against William Whaley, executor of Joseph Whaley, and which judgments were claimed to be debts for which the estate of Joseph Whaley was liable, were not causes of action for which the said Joseph Whaley in his lifetime was liable, or which, after his death, were claims or demands for which his estate was liable.

2. "That the said causes of action, so far as they were claimed to be a charge on the estate of the said Joseph Whaley, purported to be endorsements on promissory notes drawn by William Whaley; and the evidence produced at the hearing clearly and positively established the fact that the endorsements purporting to have been made by Joseph Whaley were not so made by him, and not in his handwriting.

3. "That the testimony before the court, as given by experts in the question of handwriting, clearly and positively established the fact that the handwriting in what purported to be the endorsements of Joseph Whaley was the handwriting of William Whaley, the maker of the said notes and drawer thereof.

4. "That no agency, express or implied, direct or indirect, was *proved or attempted to be proved, by which William Whaley had power or authority to endorse on the said notes, or any of them, the name of Joseph Whaley, or to bind Joseph Whaley in his life-time, or his estate after his death, for any liability because of such endorsements, or in any manner whatever for the payment of the same.

5. "Because, whatever may have been the consideration for which William Whaley gave the said notes to the holder thereof, no testimony was offered which showed that such consideration, in whole or in part, passed to Joseph Whaley, or that he was in any manner concerned or interested therein.

6. "Because, so conclusive, and beyond the range of discussion, was the fact that what purported to be the endorsements in the handwriting of Joseph Whaley, but were in the handwriting of William Whaley; that the counsel representing the plaintiff, at the hearing before Judge Fraser, stated that it was conceded that the endorsements were not in the handwriting of Joseph Whaley, but were made by William Whaley, the principal debtor; that he, the personal representative of the testator, could not interpose the defense without criminating himself, but nevertheless, in the cases in which judgments had been entered, because of such endorsements, against William Whaley, as executor of Joseph Whaley, such judgments were conclusive and bound the estate of Joseph Whaley; nor could the causes of action, because of which such judgments were entered, be inquired into.

7. "Because, with the testimony in the case before the court, it is held in the decree of Judge Fraser to be the law of this case and of the State, that where the name of the testator has, during his life, been written as endorser of a note by one who afterwards becomes the executor of the testator, and being sued because of such forged endorsement, allows judgment to be entered against him as such executor, the judgment so entered on such forged endorsement cannot be drawn in question, unless collusion is charged and proved to have existed between the plaintiff in the judgment and the defendant, he being the maker of the note and the executor in whose handwriting the name of his testator was placed on the note as such endorser.

*8. "Because, while the facts of the case prove that a wrongful act was thus done to all who are or were entitled to the estate of Joseph Whaley, and which would have been redressed if known to the court before such judgment was rendered by it, to hold that when the judgment was entered the court could not control and correct it, would be to affirm that an act done by the court because of a fraud which had been practiced on it, could not be undone by it, and so that it must confirm the wrong.

9. "Because the Supreme Court of the State had, in the strongest terms, declared that the personal representatives or legatees of Joseph Whaley could not be considered as represented by or bound by the acts of William Whaley in his capacity as the executor of Joseph Whaley, whom the court, in its own language, declared to be "unfit to be intrusted with the administration of the assets of the testator," and, therefore, the representatives or legatees were, by the direction of this court, made parties in this case. And the case was sent back to the Circuit Court that the personal representatives or legatees might protect themselves and their interests in the estate of the testator against the wrongful acts of the executor. But if a wrongful act done by William Whaley before they had been so made parties could be shielded from all inquiry or relief by a fraud upon the court in admitting a judgment to be entered in a case wherein no legal cause of action existed to bind the estate of the testator, this would be, in fact, to deny the relief that the court professed to give, and admit parties in a case to defend their rights and interests, yet exclude them from the relief which, being parties in the case, they were entitled to ask.

10. "Because all the circumstances in the case being known to the Supreme Court, that court, in the strong terms used by them, indicated its purpose that there should be a full investigation of all the claims made against the representatives and legatees of Joseph Whaley; a purpose wholly defeated if, in the case of parties claiming to be creditors of Joseph Whaley, because of judgments admitted by the executor to be entered on endorsements of his own notes, in which he had wrongfully used the name of Joseph Whaley, such representatives and legatees were, because of judgments so entered, excluded from denying *that the endorsements so made could bind the estate of Joseph Whaley. The fact, moreover, being that such judgments so entered constituted a large part of the so-called claims and demands against the estate of Joseph Whaley.

11. "Because the case was before the court in the form of a creditors' bill, with the fund to be distributed under the order of the court, and distributed, therefore, according to the proof of the lawful and just character of each claim made against it. And although that claim may have been, by the assent of the executor, carried into judgment, if creditors or representatives or legatees of the testator showed the court that it was not a lawful and just claim, the mere circumstance that a judgment on it had been admitted to be entered by the executor, who had himself, and not his testator, created the claim by unlawful and dishonest means, could not make that a lawful and just claim which all the testimony before the court concerning the cause of action on which the judgment was entered, conclusively proved was not a lawful and just claim against the estate of Joseph Whaley. And if the plaintiff had been, without collusion on his part, made a victim of the fraud and wrong of the executor, and if a court, in giving its judgment, had been made also the instrument of giving protection, by its judgment, to that fraud and wrong, all these could never, in a court of equity, lead it to apply to the payment of a claim not just or lawful, the property of one who was not in conscience or in law liable for its payment."

First. As to the exceptions of William James Whaley, surviving executor. It is a mistake to suppose that the court ever undertook to "remove" the executors in the sense claimed, or that such was the effect of the appointment of a receiver. This court has held in reference to these very executors that "The Court of Equity has not the power to remove the executor," and after the death of William Whaley, the first qualified executor, actually substituted by order in place of his name, that of William James Whaley, as surviving executor on the record of a case which had been commenced against William Whaley alone, before the appointment of a receiver. Gadsden v. Whaley, 14 S. C. 214.

*But the same case also held that the court may appoint a receiver as an executive officer "to administer the assets of the estate under the direction of the court, which may, for the purpose of preserving the property, restrain the executor from meddling with the management of the estate, and compel him to give up the control of it to the receiver." That is precisely what was done in this case, and nothing more was meant when, in giving a reason why the legatees should be let in as parties to a creditors' bill, this court said:

"When, however, the executor is insolvent the rule [as to parties] is different, and especially when, as in this case, the executor is not only insolvent, but has been removed from office, as it were, on the ground of misconduct, and has become thereby not only incompetent, but has been rendered incapable of representing the legatees," &c.; that is to say, restrained from meddling with the administration of the estate. There was certainly ample cause for the appointment of a receiver, so far as concerned the acting executor, William Whaley, who had shown, to say the very least of it, that he had been unfaithful to the trust reposed in him.

But, it is urged that in doing so the effect was to supersede, also, the other executor, William James Whaley, against whom there was and is no charge of improper conduct; and the claim is now made that since the death of William Whaley, who first qualified, the administration of the estate should be taken from the receiver and intrusted to him as surviving executor. It is true there is no evidence that William James Whaley joined with his co-executor, William Whaley, in the maladministration of the estate, but it must be remembered that he did not qualify until all the damage had been done by his co-executor, and when he did so and was made a party he disclaimed all responsibility, and prayed to be "dismissed with his reasonable costs and expenses," &c. He did not object to the appointment of a receiver or appeal from the order. "The death of one of two executors (or his maladministration) and the refusal of the other to act, afford abundant reason for the interference of equity by appointing a receiver to take charge of the assets," &c. High Rec., § 718.

At the time the appointment was made the circumstances *were such that the court, in the interest of all concerned, could do no less than take possession of the assets by a receiver, and now, when he has possession, after the lapse of years and a long litigation, the court cannot reverse all that has been done only for the reason that the surviving executor, William James Whaley, has changed his mind upon the subject and is now willing to undertake the active administration of what remains of the estate. So much of Judge Fraser's decree as refused the motion to take the estate of Joseph Whaley out of the hands of the receiver appointed by the court and restore it to the custody of William James Whaley, as the surviving executor, is affirmed.

Second. The exceptions of the city council of Charleston, assignee of legatees, as to the judgments of Fraser & Dill and others, which were recovered against William Whaley while sole qualified executor.

Upon this subject, also, there seems to be a misapprehension as to the scope and effect of former orders. It is earnestly urged that the right of the legatees to set aside these judgments has already been practically decided; that Judge Wallace's order appointing a receiver and giving him authority to institute proceedings to try the validity of any claim against the estate, and the former judgment of this court allowing the legatees to be made parties after the facts had transpired in the examination of the city scrip, as to the manner in which William Whaley signed his father's name, amounted, substantially, to a declaration in advance against the validity of the said judgments.

This is not only a mistake, but a gross injustice. It would be improper to prejudice any question. The court never undertakes to decide anything until the issue is made, the proof offered and the parties heard. The developments on the former trial in reference to the city stock were extraordinary; they were of such a character as, in our judgment, to make proper the largest scope of inquiry allowed by law as to all the transactions of William Whaley as executor of his father's will. In actions to marshal assets, especially when the executor is insolvent, the legatees have an interest and should be made parties, and we think that is the general practice.

The condition of this estate *was very peculiar, and, if any ever did, needed the attention of the real parties in interest. In the progress of the litigation against the acting executor, it suddenly appeared that, by signing his father's name, he was appropriating the estate intrusted to his care to the payment of his own debts. In the interest of justice the court is always inclined to full investigation, and to give parties interested the right to be heard.

Under these circumstances a receiver was appointed with authority to institute proceedings to try the validity of claims against the estate, and the legatees who applied were made parties. But by these orders there was not the slightest intention to prejudice anything. The only object was to give those who had been grossly wronged by one supposed to be acting for them, the fullest opportunity of making any and all questions they might be advised. It could not then be foreseen what precise issues could or would be made or what facts could be proved. It might turn out that besides the matters in judgment there were other claims, which the executor, left to himself, might decline to contest, or, as to these already in judgment, it might appear that the creditors had knowledge of the improper acts of the executor, and that the judgments were obtained by fraud and collusion between them and the executor.

By opening the door to inquiry, the court did not intend to decide, or to give the least intimation of opinion as to the case which might be made. On the contrary, Judge Wallace expressly said, that the question as to the judgments was not then "ripe for decision but may again arise in the subsequent progress of the case;" and this court, in the judgment allowing the legatees to be made parties, said, "What steps they may or ought to take for the protection of their interests after they have been made parties, we regard it premature to discuss now." So that in the subsequent progress of the case, the question for the first time has arisen, and it must now be decided according to the rights of the parties, without being affected in the least by any former proceedings or orders in the case.

Have then the legatees (through the city council) the right now to impeach the judgments recovered against William Whaley as executor, upon the ground that he fraudulently omitted to *make a defense which would have prevailed, and of which he had knowledge at the time?

1. As to the judgment of Gadsden and wife for $15,129. We have not been able to discover the slightest proof that this judgment was recovered upon paper alleged to have been signed by the executor, William Whaley, for his father, or that he fraudulently allowed it to pass into judgment without defense, in violation of his duty as executor. On the contrary, in this case at least, the executor, William Whaley, made vigorous defense, and after his death the surviving executor, William James Whaley, was made a party (the case having been commenced before a receiver was appointed), and the judgment affirmed upon appeal to this court as late as 1880. The judgment is clearly beyond the reach of impeachment. See Gadsden v. Whaley, 14 S. C. 214.

2. As to the judgment of R. K. Scott. This judgment was not rendered in Charleston, but in Columbia, where the record remained. We do not see any evidence that the obligation sued on was ever before the experts who testified as to the handwriting of Joseph Whaley in Charleston. From the exemplification of the record, it appears that the obligation sued on was a guaranty purporting to have been signed by both William Whaley and Joseph Whaley in the presence of Julian Mitchell, Esq., as a witness, and that there was a defense and the verdict of a jury. Under these circumstances we see no evidence in the case tending to impeach the validity of this judgment.

3. Then as to the judgment of Fraser & Dill, and others in the same condition, which were rendered in Charleston. It seems that the plaintiffs Fraser & Dill (taken as a representative case) gave value for a note of William Whaley, which had upon it what seemed to be the endorsement of Joseph Whaley; that after his death they sued William Whaley, as the executor of Joseph, and recovered judgment on the endorsement, June 8th, 1874, which was entered up in the usual form, was proved before the referee in the earlier stages of the case, and lay undisputed until after the developments in the matter of the city scrip, in which inquiry, it will be remembered, certain experts, examined as witnesses as to the comparison of the different *signatures of Joseph Whaley, gave it as their opinion that the endorsement on the note, like the transfer of the Charleston scrip, was not in the handwriting of Joseph Whaley, and thereupon (1881) some of the legatees assigned their interest to the city council, and in that way asked the court to set aside the judgment on the ground that the executor, William Whaley, fraudulently allowed it to be recovered against him as executor, when he could have made a successful defense.

This is the most difficult question in the case, and its inherent difficulty has been increased by the use of testimony which fell out incidentally upon another branch of the case, and which, if offered directly in the new issue against the judgment, would have been inadmissible. In reference to this testimony, it may be proper to say, in passing, that Judge Fraser, in settling the case, ordered stricken out the folios which claimed that its truth had been admitted by counsel. "The admissions therein referred to, having been made by counsel in the argument, and only for the purpose of the argument," &c.

It is elementary that the judgment of a competent court, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, is absolutely conclusive against all the parties, and the matters decided by it are res adjudicata, and may not be stirred again by them. "A judgment is properly a bar, on principles of public policy, because the peace and order of society, the structure of our judicial system and the principles of our government, require that a matter once litigated should not again be drawn in question by the same parties or their privies." Freem. Judg., § 247; Manigault v. Deas, Bailey Eq. 293, and authorities.

Was the identical matter now sought to be inquired into, viz., whether the endorsement was that of Joseph Whaley, decided in the former action at law against the executor on that endorsement? It does not clearly appear that proof was offered, and the point in question actually decided by the court; but that was not indispensable, provided the precise matter was involved in the issue, so that it had of necessity to be decided before the judgment could have been given. Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 42. It seems to us that the identical matter now charged was necessarily involved in the action at law upon the endorsement. If *the proof of handwriting was not made, it should have been required, and, failing to require it, the result must be the same as if it had been formally made.

It may be that the precise matter of genuineness would not have been necessarily adjudged, if, at the time the judgment was rendered, the endorsement covered a hidden fraud which was unknown to the defendant as well as the plaintiffs, on the principles announced in the above stated case of Hart v. Bates, "that it is not necessary for a party in ignorance to assail every paper proved as fraudulent in order to escape the penalty of being precluded from doing so at a future time in case he should discover evidence that would justify such charge."

But we cannot see how the executor, Whaley, can claim the benefit of this principle. If, as alleged, the endorsement was in his own handwriting, he must have known it when he was sued—indeed, he was probably the only one that did know it. He was certainly bound by the judgment, and, if now living, he could not be allowed to impeach it. "An adjudication is final and conclusive, not only as to the matter actually determined, but as to any other matter which the parties might have litigated and had decided as incident to or essentially connected with the subject-matter of the litigation, and every matter coming within the legitimate province of the original action, both in respect to matters of claim and defense." Freem. Judg.

The executor being bound, the legatees, his privies in estate, are also bound, unless there is something in the extraordinary circumstances of the case which makes it exceptional. "A judgment against an administrator (or executor) is binding on the creditors and legatees of the estate." Freem. Judg., § 163; Mauldin v. Gossett, 15 S. C. 578, and authorities. This is admitted to be the general rule; but it is insisted that this is a peculiar case and does not fall within the rule. It is insisted, in behalf of the legatees, that they should not be bound by the judgment, for the reason that, when the action was brought at law against the executor, they were not made parties, and never had an opportunity to be heard as to that endorsement or the judgment upon it.

We think the legatees should have been made parties to this bill on the equity side of the court to marshal assets, and when some of the legatees made an application to be let in as parties, this court so held. But it was very different as to the action at law upon the endorsement. To that action the legatees had no right to be made parties; the regularly qualified executor was the proper representative of the estate, and was the only party to be sued. Winstanley v. Savage, 2 McC. Eq. 435; Fretwell v. Neal, 11 Rich. Eq. 571.

It was further strongly urged upon us that this case was exceptional, because the executor had betrayed his trust, and had not only neglected the interest of the legatees, but, through his powers as executor, had systematically appropriated the assets of the estate to the payment of his own debts; and that, in consequence of such conduct, this court actually superseded him in the administration of the estate by the appointment of a receiver, for the reason that he "was unfit to be intrusted with the assets of the testator." It is undoubtedly true that the executor grossly wronged the legatees, but the position which enabled him to do it was intrusted to him by the testator himself, from whom the legacies came, and under whose will they claim as beneficiaries. We know of no principle which would authorize the court to deny to him the full measure of rights belonging to other executors up to the time when the administration was taken out of his hands; or to qualify in any way the effects of acts done by him while he acted as sole qualified executor of the will. The law applicable in the case of other executors must be applied to him and his acts.

It was still further pressed in argument that there must have been fraudulent collusion, in obtaining the judgments, between William Whaley, the executor, and the creditors, and especially Fraser & Dill and the others who obtained their judgments on June 8th, 1874, for the reason that on that very day an injunction was granted in the cases first filed against Whaley as executor—that of the People's Bank of Charleston, restraining creditors from suing at law—and that such haste and disregard of the order indicated knowledge of something wrong, and if the forgery was not actually known, proper inquiry would have disclosed it. We cannot see in this circumstance alone any evidence of collusion. Such restraining order is the usual incident of a creditors' bill, and affords no notice of frauds perpetrated or to be perpetrated. Although on the same day, it does not appear whether the judgments were entered before or after the restraining order.

Besides, Judge Fraser says: "It does not appear that the order was in any way served on the creditors, and if it had been it could only have rendered the creditors liable to attachment for contempt. The full record of the case of the People's Bank of Charleston is now before me, and it seems to have been allowed to drop, and that it has been superseded by these proceedings, under which there has been no order of injunction against creditors," &c. From the nature of the case, Whaley would not be apt to make disclosures implicating himself in forgery to creditors who had trusted him, and whom he had deceived. They never doubted that they had Joseph Whaley's endorsement, and in that view there was nothing to conspire about. We see no evidence that the creditors fraudulently colluded with the executor Whaley in the rendition of the judgments.

Besides, suppose we pass by the doctrine of technical estoppel, and consider this as a direct assault upon the judgment by the legatees and the proof regularly made in the case, how would the matter then stand? In that case would the fraud of the executor in allowing it to pass against him, alone be sufficient to set aside the judgment regularly recovered by creditors, who were ignorant that there was any defense, and innocent of any fraud, and who had probably paid their money on the faith of the endorsement of the father?

After reflection and with some hesitation we are inclined to think that the recent ex parte fraud of the executor alone was not sufficient for that purpose as against innocent judgment creditors. It is true that, as a rule, fraud avoids every thing it touches. It is also true that the courts abhor it, and will not give effect to it to the injury of innocent third parties; but, as we understand it, this righteous principle does not cover the case where the prayer for relief comes from the party himself *who committed the fraud, or from his privies, who, though not in fact participating, cannot, as to the estate, be considered third parties in the sense intended. "To entitle a party to relief from a judgment it must be made evident that he had a defense upon the merits, and that such defense has been lost to him without such loss being attributable to his own omission, neglect or default. The loss of a defense, to justify a court of equity in recovering a judgment, must, in all cases, be occasioned by the fraud or act of the prevailing party, or by mistake or accident on the part of the losing party, unmixed with any fault of himself or his agent. * * * Equity will not relieve a party from a judgment procured by his own fraud." Freem. Judg., §§ 486, 489.

The executors deceived both the creditors and legatees—the first strangers and the latter privies. The legatees, of course, have their redress against the executor who betrayed their trust, but, we think, as against innocent third parties, they cannot have removed a judgment which the executor allowed to be recovered against himself as executor, without fraud or collusion on the part of the judgment creditors. Russell v. Walker, Rich. Eq. Cas. 232; Walker v. May, 2 Hill Eq. 24; Vaughan v. Hewitt, 17 S. C. 444; Castellaw v. Guilmartin, 54 Geo. 299; United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 68 [25 L. Ed. 93].

In the case last cited Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court, said: "We think the decisions establish the doctrine on which we decide the present case, namely, that the acts for which a court of equity will, on account of fraud, set aside or annul a judgment or decree between the same parties, rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, have relation to frauds, extrinsic or collateral, to the matter tried by the first court, and not to a fraud in the matter on which the decree was rendered. That the mischief of retrying every case in which the judgment or decree rendered on false testimony given by perjured witnesses, or on contracts or documents whose genuineness or validity was in issue, and which are afterwards ascertained to be forged or fraudulent, would be greater, by reason of the endless nature of the strife, than any compensation arising from doing justice in individual cases." &c.

*The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

In this case there was a petition for rehearing upon the grounds considered by this court in their order refusing it.

December 8th, 1883. The following order was passed

PER CURIAM. We have carefully examined the grounds stated for a rehearing in this case, and find that they were all gravely considered before the judgment was pronounced.

First. It is true that this court held that the legatees were proper parties in this proceeding to marshal the assets of Joseph Whaley's estate, and as to such as applied ordered them to be brought in as parties; but that is a very different matter from their being proper or necessary parties in the action at law against William Whaley as executor on the endorsements, in which the judgments in controversy were obtained. The cases are as different as possible.

Second. This court, in its judgment, gave the city council all the rights which belonged to their new character as assignees of legatees, precisely as if they had never, in any capacity, been parties before. Their rights were decided as if the legatees themselves had been before the court.

Third. It is a mistake to suppose that the judgments which were the subject of this contention, were "orders, decrees or acts done in the progress of this case," as alleged, either before or after the legatees (represented by the city council as assignees) were made parties. These judgments were obtained at law against the executor, as the proper representative of the estate, before this action to marshal the assets of the estate was commenced on the equity side of the court.

Fourth. The order directing the complaining legatees to be brought in as parties, to make any questions they might be advised, did not commit the court in advance upon any issue which they, being admitted, might be advised to make, as appears fully in the judgment. Every issue had to be decided according to the principles applicable to it.

Fifth. The court had carefully considered the case of Wilson v. Kelly, ante 160, referred to in the petition, before the judgment was pronounced. There was nothing ruled in that case inconsistent with the rulings in this. In that case the judgment assailed was recovered against the administrator in a suit in equity to foreclose a mortgage upon real estate in which the heirs-at-law (to whom the title of the land had descended) should have been made parties in the action to foreclose, while in this the judgments contested were recovered in actions at law upon alleged endorsements, in which the legatees were not proper parties. In that case, therefore, the contest was between heirs-at-law and a creditor, while in this the only issue was between legatees and creditors who had obtained judgments against the executor representing the legatees, and before the proceeding to marshal assets was instituted or the legatees had any right to be heard except through the executor. In the case of Wilson v. Kelly the court say (page 166): "Now, while it may be true, so far as the personal estate is concerned, that the administrator does represent the distributees, who, under our statute, are the same persons as the heirs, inasmuch as the legal title to that kind of property vests in the administrator upon the death of the intestate, the same cannot be said as to the real estate, for with that the administrator has nothing to do. Mauldin v. Gossett, 15 S. C. 578. The heirs, not having been represented by the administrator in the action in which the judgment in question was obtained, have never been heard, or had an opportunity of being heard, upon the issues in that action; and, therefore, it would seem to follow that they ought now to be allowed the opportunity of being heard upon such issues, one of which is as to the amount legally due upon the bond, and that they will not be estopped by a judgment obtained in an action to which they were not parties or privies." There is nothing in the case of Wilson v. Kelly which even intimates that legatees under a will have the right under a subsequent proceeding to assail a judgment rendered against the executor, upon the ground that they were not parties in the action. In this case there is no complaint except by legatees who were privies of the executor, and represented through him when the judgment at law was rendered against him.

*406

*No question as to the rank of the demands in marshaling the assets was before us, and, of course, nothing was decided on that subject.

The petition for a rehearing is refused.†

19 S. C. 406

LYONS v. HOLMES.

(April Term, 1883.)

[1. Slaves ⇐3.]

A person of African descent, whose freedom is not traced back to a date prior to the act of 1820 (7 Stat. 459), cannot be presumed to have been free before the general emancipation of slaves, although reputed free for more than twenty years. A presumption cannot arise of emancipation by deed, for that act prohibited it; nor by statute, for it was contrary to the settled policy of the State. Vinyard v. Passalaigne, 2 Strobb. 540, recognized and followed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State v. Pacific Guano Co., 22 S. C. 84.

For other cases, see Slaves, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⇐3.]

[2. Slaves ⇐23.]

The change of policy in this respect, since 1865, cannot be permitted to affect title to land claimed to have been transmitted through such a person before that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Slaves, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. ⇐23.]

[3. Evidence ⇐264.]

The admission by defendant of a deed in plaintiff's claim of title extends only to its execution, and does not admit its legal validity or the truth of its recitals.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1028; Dec. Dig. ⇐264.]

[4. Ejectment ⇐15.]

A claim of title by defendant in his answer, as devisee of R., who was sole heir-at-law of S., does not estop him from contesting plaintiff's title upon the ground of the incapacity of S., as a slave (through whom plaintiff claims), to acquire and transmit property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. ⇐15.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, July, 1882.

This cause has once before been before this court, and will be found reported in 11 S. C. at p. 429. It was an action by Jacob C. Lyons, devisee of Henry Lyons, against Bella Holmes and others, devisees of Richard Holmes, to recover the possession of a lot of land in the city of Columbia. Plaintiff claimed as devisee of Henry Lyons, who purchased from Sarah Hane, apparently a free person of color, who purchased from Guignard. Defendants claimed under the will of Richard Holmes, who was the sole heir-at-law of Sarah Hane. Sarah Hane died in 1862 or 1863, and Richard Holmes in 1870. The deed from *Guignard was "admitted in evidence without proof." It recited a consideration, "to me paid by Sarah Hane, a free woman of color, of Columbia," and bore date in November, 1855. This deed was objected to only to the extent that Sarah Hane, as a slave, could take nothing under the deed and could convey nothing. The same objection was made to the deed of Hane to Lyons.

So much of the charge as is contained in the brief is stated in the opinion. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendants appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because it was proved that Sarah Hane, who died some time in 1862, was a person of African descent, and there was not a particle of testimony to contradict this fact.

2. "Because this fact being proved, then, as a conclusion of law, Sarah Hane was a slave at the making of the so-called deed from her to Henry Lyons, and as such she could neither hold nor transmit real estate by deed or otherwise.

3. "Because there was not a particle of evidence (1) that Sarah Hane was emancipated by deed, according to act of 1800, at any time before the act of 1820; (2) nor that she was emancipated by act of assembly after the act of 1820; (3) nor that she had passed as a free person of color for twenty years, or any shorter period, before the act of 1820, whereby a presumption might arise of a deed of emancipation under the act of 1800; (4) nor was her pedigree established so as to show that she had descended from a free mother before the act of 1800, or 1820, or since.

4. "Because upon these facts his Honor refused to charge, when so requested, that no length of time within which Sarah Hane may have passed as a free person of color after the act of 1820 could raise the presumption of a deed of emancipation, unless it were first established that Sarah Hane passed as a free person of color before the act of 1820, thereby raising the presumption that she was emancipated by deed in the manner permitted by the act of 1800.

5. "Because, under these circumstances, his Honor permitted the so-called deed of Sarah Hane to go to the jury, when it was objected to as constituting no link in the title of Jacob C. Lyons to the property, or by which said plaintiff could connect him*self with any grant, actual or presumptive, as he is required to do by law."

Mr. J. D. Pope, for appellant.

Mr. W. A. Clark, contra.

June 27th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff in this action seeks to recover the possession of certain real estate in the possession of the defendants, and to make out his title relies upon evidence tending to show that both parties claim from a common source. He contends that one Sarah Hane at one time held the title of the premises in dispute, and that both parties claim under her, his being the superior claim. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that Sarah Hane was a slave, and, therefore incapable of holding or transmitting title to any one, and the real controversy in the case is as to the status of Sarah Hane.

It seems to be conceded that Sarah Hane, who died in 1862 or 1863, was a colored person of African descent, and therefore she was prima facie a slave. Act of 1740, 7 Stat. 397-8; State v. Harden, 2 Speers 152, note; Nelson v. Whetmore, 1 Rich. 324; Huger v. Barnwell, 5 Rich. 274; State v. Brown, 2 Speers 135; State v. Motley, 7 Rich. 334. To rebut this presumption established by statute and recognized and applied in the cases just cited, the plaintiff relies upon the fact that Sarah Hane had, for many years prior to her death, been in the enjoyment of apparent freedom and had been recognized in the community as a free person of color, and that from this it should be presumed that she had been emancipated. Under the law as it stood prior to the passage of the act of 1820 (7 Stat. 459), there is no doubt but that a colored person of African descent who had been in the enjoyment of apparent freedom and had been recognized in the community as a free person of color for the requisite period of time would be presumed to have been emancipated; because by the act of 1800 (7 Stat. 442), the mode of emancipating slaves was by deed, and such a deed, like any other, might be presumed from lapse of time, with the other necessary attendant circumstances. Miller v. Reigne, 2 Hill 592; State v. Hill, 2 Speers 161.

But since the passage of the act of 1820, forbidding emancipation, except by act of the legislature, a different question is presented. In face of the fact that emancipation of slaves was against the declared public policy of the State as evidenced by the repeated acts with ever-increasing stringency upon the subject, to which it is needless to refer, will an act of the legislature emancipating a slave ever be presumed? To this question we think but one answer can be given, whether looked at in the light of reason or authority. It would seem to be an extraordinary assumption of power on the part of the judiciary, bordering on usurpation, to presume that the legislative department of the government had passed an act to effect a purpose which, by repeated legislation, it had declared to be contrary to the public policy of the State, and would amount to a presumption that the legislature had deliberately gone counter to what itself had declared to be the best interests and true policy of the State. It is unnecessary, however, to argue the question, as we think it has been conclusively settled by the case of Vinyard v. Passalaigne, 2 Strobb. 536, in which the precise question was discussed and decided in accordance with the view which we have indicated. See also McCarty v. McCarty, 2 Strobb. 6 [47 Am. Dec. 585], where it was held that an act of the legislature granting a divorce, would not under any circumstances be presumed because it was against public policy in this State to grant divorces.

It is argued, however, that since the change in the policy of this State in respect to emancipation, this doctrine ought not now to be applied. We are unable to appreciate the force of this position. The question is, Did Sarah Hane ever have lawful title to the premises in dispute? And, she having died before the change in the policy of the State took place, it is difficult to see how such change could affect her alleged title. If she lived and died as a slave, she never could have been invested with title, and no events occurring subsequent to her death could invest her with the capacity to take and transmit title to property.

It does not appear to us that there is any evidence tending to show the condition or status of Sarah Hane prior to 1820. No

*witness seems to have known her until some years after that time. The witness Dinah Collins, whose recollection of her extends further back than any of the others, could not have known her until some time between the years 1825 and 1830, and most probably later. At the trial in July, 1882, she says: "I must be now going into the sixties" (whatever that may mean). "I knew her some forty or fifty years, ever since I was a girl about so high" (holding her hand up about four feet from the floor). Even if it be assumed that this witness was sixty-five years of age at the time of the trial, and that she was therefore born in 1817, she must, from her own account, have been eight or ten years of age when she first knew Sarah Hane, and therefore she could not have known her until some time in 1825 or 1827, and hence we are without any evidence as to the condition of Sarah Hane prior to 1820.

Having thus stated the law which we conceive to be applicable to the facts as gathered from the case as submitted for argument here, we will proceed to consider so much of the charge of the Circuit judge as relates to the real point in controversy. The second request to charge was in these words: "That there can be no presumption of freedom by proof of a general reputation of one being a free person of color, since the act of 1820, directing that emancipation shall be by act of the legislature only; that no such act of assembly being produced, twenty years' enjoyment of apparent freedom does not presume emancipation either by deed or by act of assembly." This request was refused and the jury were charged in general terms, "that if they were satisfied from the evidence that Sarah Hane was a free person of color, that was enough, and they must judge of the evidence. If they were satisfied from the evidence that Sarah Hane was a free person of color, her deed would be good." The exception applicable to this request was, "that his Honor refused to charge that no length of time within which Sarah Hane may have passed as a free person of color after the act of 1820, could raise the presumption of a deed of emancipation, unless it were first established that Sarah Hane passed as a free person of color before the act of 1820, thereby raising the *presumption that she was emancipated by deed in the manner permitted by the act of 1800."

From what we have said, it is clear that the defendants were entitled to have the jury charged as demanded by this request. The manifest object of the request was to have the jury instructed that the enjoyment of apparent freedom, and being regarded in the community as a free person of color since the act of 1820, constituted no evidence that the person whose status was in question was a free person of color, because these facts would not authorize the presumption of a deed of emancipation, as that mode of emancipation was no longer lawful, nor of an act of the legislature, because such an act, being contrary to public policy, could not be presumed; and when, on the contrary, the jury were told in general terms, that all that was necessary was that they should be satisfied, from the evidence, that the woman was a free person of color, without explanation of the legal bearing of the evidence, they were practically left to pass upon a question of law as well as of fact, and permitted to infer emancipation from the long enjoyment of apparent freedom after the passage of the act of 1820, which, as we have seen, the law did not permit.

The criticism of respondents' counsel, in his argument upon the phraseology of this request to charge, is not sound. The request must be construed as a whole, and not in detached portions. So construed, we think it obvious that it does not practically assert that twenty years' enjoyment of apparent freedom, whether before or after the act of 1820, or partly before and partly after said act, does not presume freedom. On the contrary, properly construed, it plainly asserts that the presumption of emancipation cannot arise from twenty years' enjoyment of apparent freedom after the act of 1820.

We do not think that the position in respondents' argument, that the defendants are estopped from denying Sarah Hane's capacity to hold and convey property, can be sustained. The grounds of estoppel relied upon are: 1. That they have admitted the deed from Guignard to Hane, in which she is described and takes as a free person of color. 2. That the defendants, in their answers to the original complaint, claim title as devisees of *Richard Holmes, who claimed as the sole heir-at-law of Sarah Hane. As to the first ground, it is very obvious that the admission only extends to the execution of the deed, and, certainly, such an admission cannot be regarded as committing the parties to an admission of its legal validity, or of the truth of any recitals which it may contain.

As to the second ground of estoppel, the pleadings are not before us, and we are, therefore, unable to say what the facts are. But even if they be as alleged, we are unable to see how the title set up by the defendant in his answer to an action like this can estop him from contesting each link in the plaintiff's chain of title. In an action to recover possession of real estate the plaintiff must stand upon the strength of his own title, and not rely upon the weakness of his adversary's. He must make out his title, and until he does so the defendant may fold his arms and close his lips.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

BLACK v. CITY OF COLUMBIA.

[1. Pleading ⚡34.]

[2. Municipal Corporations ⚡739.]

The plaintiff brought action for damages against a municipal corporation, based upon the destruction of his house by fire, resulting from an inadequate supply of water, to a sufficient supply of which he claimed to be entitled by reason of a water tax assessed upon such property by the city and paid by him. Held, on demurrer, that the action was for a tort, and, therefore, as against a municipal corporation, could not be sustained.

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, July, 1882.

This was an action by Joseph R. Black, as trustee for himself and others, against the city of Columbia. The opinion states the case. The order of the Circuit judge, omitting its statement of the pleadings, was as follows:

The two causes of action will be considered separately and in the inverse order in which they are laid in the complaint. I regard the second cause of action ex delicto in its nature, as the plaintiff claims damages by reason of the non-performance of a duty devolved upon defendant under the law. No statute is pleaded giving the right to maintain an action for tort against defendant, nor was any such statute referred to upon the hearing. Whilst the rule is different in regard to private corporations, it seems to be well settled that such an action will not lie against a municipal corporation, like a city or town, created for the public good, unless authorized by statute. See Coleman v. Chester, 14 S. C. 286, affirming White v. City of Charleston. The defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's second cause of action must, therefore, be sustained.

I regard the first cause of action in the complaint as uniting two causes of action, damages being claimed as well for defendant's breach of contract as for breach of duty in not keeping the water pipes in order and furnishing plaintiff with a proper supply of water, which resulted in the destruction of plaintiff's property by fire. Plaintiff might have waived the tort and relied upon the contract, or vice versa. If plaintiff wished to rely upon both the tort and the contract he should have set up each as a separate cause of action. He has not done so. Defendant, before demurrer, by motion, could have required plaintiff to separate these two causes of action, or at least have required plaintiff to elect *between them.

If either of the causes of action so united (in the first cause of action) can be maintained, the demurrer as to such cause of action must be overruled. In Coleman v. Chester, supra, it is held that a municipal corporation may make contracts and be bound by them without statutory authority.

It is true that this cause of action, whilst in its nature ex contractu, is not as formally or definitely pleaded as it should be, yet I am not prepared to hold that it is defective in substance; on the contrary, it substantially appears on the face of the complaint that defendant agreed with plaintiff, in consideration of the payment of the special water tax, to furnish water pipes in order and a sufficient supply of water to protect plaintiff's property from fire; that defendant failed to comply with this undertaking, by reason of which failure plaintiff's property was destroyed by fire, for which plaintiff claims damages. The facts stated cannot be disregarded because plaintiff also rests his demand for damages upon defendant's breach of duty. The informality in the statement of the cause of action for breach of contract must also be disregarded, if the facts are sufficiently presented as a cause of action. Hammond v. R. R. Co., 15 S. C. 10.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's second cause of action be sustained, and that said demurrer to first cause of action for damages for breach of contract be overruled, but with leave to defendant to answer over within thirty days from service of notice of the filing of this decree, without prejudice to any right of defendant to require the first cause of action to be made more definite and certain upon the matter of contract therein relied upon. Upon defendant's failure to answer within the time herein directed, the plaintiff may have his damages assessed at the next or some subsequent term of court, as in case of default.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action against the city of Columbia to recover $2,500 damages, the value of a dwelling-house and outbuildings destroyed by fire on February 22d, 1882, by reason, as alleged, of the failure on the part of the defendant corporation to keep its water pipes, hydrants and fixtures in repair, so as to furnish a sufficient supply of water to enable the engines to extinguish fires. The fire did not originate on the plaintiff's premises, but in a neighboring building, and, it was alleged, could have been extinguished before it reached and consumed the plaintiff's house, had there been a sufficient supply of water in the pipes, and that the want of such supply was caused by the negligence of the corporation.

The complaint contained two causes of action. The first, among other things alleged: "That the defendant is a municipal corporation, and by virtue of several acts of the legislature, is clothed with a general power of taxation, and also with certain special powers of taxation within the corporate limits of the city. * * * And also with the power of laying down all pipes, fixtures, fire plugs, hydrants, water works and cisterns, within the said corporate limits, with ample power at any and all times to make ordinances, rules and regulations necessary to the execution of their said powers. That by virtue of such powers and the said charter, and of the ordinances passed thereunder, the said defendant corporation did lay down or cause to be laid down in the streets leading to and upon plaintiff's premises, certain water pipes, and did place and cause to be placed in said streets certain hydrants connected with said pipes. * * * That said defendant did assess upon plaintiff's said property an annual tax for the use of the said pipes, and of the water to be furnished thereby to the plaintiff by defendant for certain purposes, among others, in case of fire in or about the said premises and for the extinguishment thereof. That in consideration thereof, and with the understanding that the plaintiff was to be furnished with an ample supply of water by means of the said pipes and hydrants for the extinguishment of any fires that might occur as aforesaid, the said plaintiff did agree to pay and did pay to the said defendant the annual tax so assessed and imposed. * * * That by reason of the premises and of the powers and duties imposed by said acts and by reason of the ordinances of the said defendant, and in consideration of the tax so paid, and in consideration of the said understanding that the pipes and hydrants aforesaid should be properly laid down and placed so as to furnish the said plaintiff with an adequate supply of water for necessary purposes, and for the extinguishment of fires as aforesaid, it became and was the duty of the defendant to lay down such water pipes, and to place such fire plugs and hydrants as would furnish a full and adequate supply of water for the purpose aforesaid, and at all times to keep in said pipes, fire plugs and hydrants, such adequate supply of water and to keep said pipes and hydrants in proper order. * * *

"That the said city of Columbia, unmindful of its duty in the premises under the charter and ordinances aforesaid and its understanding with the plaintiff, and notwithstanding the taxation and assessment of the said sum of money and in utter disregard of the plaintiff's right, wholly failed and neglected to comply with its obligations or perform its duties and to keep said water pipes and hydrants in proper order, and to keep in the same a sufficient supply of water for the extinguishment of fires as aforesaid. * * *

That on or about February 22d, 1882, the house of one Carr, adjoining plaintiff's lot, took fire; that the alarm being given, the fire department and other persons repaired to the spot in sufficient force, with engines, &c., in ample time to extinguish the fire and prevent its extending to plaintiff's buildings; but, although strenuous efforts were made to draw water from the pipes and hydrants aforesaid, it was impossible to obtain therefrom a sufficient quantity, said pipes and hydrants not being in proper order, and there not being in said pipes and hydrants a sufficient quantity of water to extinguish *said fire or to enable the engines to play upon plaintiff's buildings, or in any manner to check or extinguish said fire, whereby plaintiff's said dwelling-house and other buildings were totally consumed, to the plaintiff's damage twenty-five hundred dollars," &c.

The second cause of action made substantially the same allegations. It omitted, however, the statements that the city had the pipes laid down and that there was an understanding between the plaintiff and the defendant corporation that there should be, at all times, a sufficient supply of water in the pipes for the purpose of extinguishing fires. This cause of action simply stated "that the city of Columbia, a corporation, found and took possession of the water-pipes, hydrants, &c., and passed an ordinance in the following terms: 'That each and every owner of real estate upon any street where water is brought by pipes or otherwise from the city reservoir, shall pay to the city treasurer, at the same time with the other taxes imposed by this ordinance, a general tax of one dollar for each fifty feet of frontage when there are buildings, and one cent per foot of frontage when there are no buildings upon lots so taxed; provided, that every one shall pay a water tax of not less than one dollar; and provided, further, that no property-holder shall be charged with more than one frontage for each piece of property owned by him,'" &c. That the plaintiff paid the tax assessed upon him as an owner of real estate under this ordinance, "by reason whereof it became the duty of the defendant corporation to keep said water pipes, fire plugs and hydrants in good order, and to keep in said pipes and hydrants a sufficient quantity of water, at all times, for the extinguishment of fires," &c. It further alleged that the plaintiff performed all the conditions required of him; but the defendant corporation did not, and that in consequence the plaintiff's said dwelling-house and other buildings were totally consumed by fire, to the plaintiff's damage twenty-five hundred dollars.

The defendant corporation demurred upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the cause coming on for trial before Judge Wither*poon, he sustained the demurrer as to the second cause of action, holding that it was ex delicto in its nature, and as such could not be maintained against a municipal corporation for a non-feasance. But he overruled the demurrer as to the first cause of action, holding that it contained the elements of two causes of action, "damages being claimed as well for defendant's breach of contract as for breach of duty in not keeping the water-pipes in order and furnishing plaintiff with a proper supply of water, which resulted in the destruction of his property by fire," stating at the same time that, whilst the first cause of action was, in its nature, ex contractu, it was not as formally or definitely stated as it should have been.

From this ruling the defendant corporation appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: "1. For that his Honor erred in holding that the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's first cause of action be overruled. 2. For that his Honor erred in holding that he could sustain the first cause of action to the complaint herein, when, as he decided, two causes of action were united in it—one for breach of contract and the other for breach of duty—by separating the one from the other. 3. For that his Honor did not hold that the injury complained of is too remote, and is not the proximate or natural consequence of the act, and that no liability on this account can attach to the defendant. 4. For that his Honor did not hold that an action to recover damages for a tort cannot be maintained against a municipal corporation, unless provided for by statute."

The plaintiff, whilst resisting the appeal of the defendant, gave notice that he also appealed to this court upon the following grounds: 1. "Because his Honor sustained the demurrer to the second cause of action. 2. Because his Honor decided that cause of action to be a cause of action ex delicto. 3. Because his Honor decided that such an action, unless authorized by statute, will not lie against a municipal corporation. 4. Because his Honor decided that the first causes of action united in itself two causes of action, 'damage being claimed as well for defendant's breach of contract as for breach of duty.' The questions made by these exceptions will come under review in connection with *the consideration of those filed by the defendant, and therefore they will not be taken up separately or considered seriatim.

The effect of the defendant's demurrer was to admit the allegations of the complaint, but this being the result of a rule of law and not of evidence, these statements are not to be amended by intentment, but must be taken as they stand.

Without stopping to consider the effect of mixing, in the first cause of action, allegations which indicate a tort with those which may be supposed to point towards a cause of action ex contractu, we have grave doubts whether the allegations made in that cause of action—taken as a whole and considered together—make out a cause of action upon a contract with the plaintiff personally, to insure or guarantee to him at all times an ample supply of water in the pipes for extinguishing fires, &c. It is certainly the general rule that the contract of a corporation should be evidenced by proper corporate proceedings, and nothing of that kind appears here. Neither the word "contract" nor "agreement," as referring to the action of the corporation, is stated. As applied to the corporation the strongest term used is "understanding" which is equivocal, or at least falls short of alleging a distinct and express contract between the parties.

Looking at the situation of the parties and the subject-matter, we can not resist the conclusion that the plaintiff merely meant to allege the existence of certain facts—such as the power to make the assessments—the payment of the tax for water frontage, &c., and that these facts raised a legal obligation which authorized the fiction of an implied assumpsit. We do not understand that the plaintiff meant to allege or did allege that there was a distinct agreement beyond what could be implied from the facts stated, and this view is strengthened by the manner in which the alleged breach is stated, "that the defendant corporation, in utter disregard of its duty, wholly failed and neglected to comply with its obligations or perform its duties, and to keep said water pipes and hydrants in proper order and to keep in the same a sufficient supply of water for the extinguishment of fires," &c. We regard both causes of action as substantially charging a non-feasance on the part of the corporation, a tort.

*If, however, we consider that there was alleged a distinct express contract of the officers with the plaintiff personally, undertaking to insure to him an adequate supply of water in the pipes at all times for the purposes aforesaid, it does not necessarily follow that the action could be maintained upon such contract. That would involve another question, whether the officers of the corporation had the right to make such a contract. Doubtless there are cases in which a contract by a municipal corporation will be implied from facts. These, however, arise for the most part out of transactions in which the corporation itself has in some way received and used property or money which, ex equo et bono, does not belong to it. But in all cases, either of express or implied contract on the part of the corporation, the contract cannot be enforced against the corporators, if it is in violation of the charter or beyond the scope of the agency created by it. In such case the principle of respondeat superior does not apply, but the alleged contract is ultra vires and void. To this class belongs an alleged contract which restricts the exercise of legislative discretion vested in the municipality or its officers in reference to public duties, and "upon such contract the corporation can not be held liable either in special or general assumpsit." Thomas v. City of Richmond, 12 Wall. 349 [20 L. Ed. 453]; Dill. Mun. Corp., §§ 61, 372, and notes.

In the case from Wallace, notes were issued by the City of Richmond to circulate as money in contravention of law, and it was held that they could not be recovered. The court said: "Municipal corporations represent the public, and are themselves to be protected against the unauthorized acts of their officers when it can be done without injury to third parties. Persons dealing with such officers are chargeable with notice of the powers which the corporation possesses, and are to be held responsible accordingly. The issuing of bills by such a corporation without authority is not only contrary to positive law, but, being ultra vires, is an abuse of the public franchise which has been conferred upon it; and the receiver of the bills being chargeable with notice, is in pari delicto with the officers and should have no remedy against the corporation. * * * The protection of public corporations from such unauthorized acts of *their officers is a matter of public policy in which the whole community is concerned," &c.

If, as alleged, there was in this case a contract by the officers of the city insuring to the plaintiff an adequate supply of water at all times and under all circumstances, we incline to the opinion that it was a contract restricting the discretion of the municipality, beyond the scope of the charter, and if actually proved, would not support an action against the corporation.

Assuming, then, that both causes of action substantially charged a tort, could the action be maintained? There is no statute in this State authorizing an action against a municipal corporation for non-feasance as to a public duty. The general doctrine is, that civil or municipal corporations are public in their nature, but instrumentalities of the State which incorporates them to assist the State in more effectually discharging its duty. The powers conferred on such corporations are not always uniform, but they generally relate to the administration of justice, the support of the poor, the establishment and repairs of highways, &c., all of which are matters of State as distinguished from local concerns. It seems to have been considered that, as the State cannot be sued, these governmental agents of the State should not be liable in an action of tort, for either non-feasance or misfeasance; that they are not liable in case or trespass or other form of civil action for neglect of public duty unless such liability be expressly declared by statute.

In 1829 the Supreme Court of the United States so held in the case of Fowle v. The Common Council of Alexandria, 3 Pet. 408 [7 L. Ed. 719]. In delivering the judgment of the court, Chief Justice Marshall said: "That corporations are bound by their contract is admitted; that many corporations, or those carrying on business for themselves, are liable for torts, is well settled; but that a legislative corporation, established as a part of the government of the country, is liable for losses sustained by a non-feasance—by an omission of the corporate body to observe a law of its own, in which no penalty is provided—is a principle for which we can find no precedent. We are not prepared to make one in this case."

In 1834 the same doctrine was announced in this State, in the case of White v. City Council of Charleston, 2 Hill 571, where it

*was held that: "There is a distinction between private corporations exercising their corporate functions for the benefit of its members, and public corporations instituted for the purposes of government. The former are liable to individuals for an omission or malfeasance of their corporate duties, but the latter, although subject to indictment for a breach of corporate duty, are not liable to an action by an individual unless it be given by statute; and, therefore, it was held that the city council of Charleston was not liable to an action for an injury to the plaintiff, in having his house blown up during a fire, although the fire was extinguished before it reached his house," &c.

Such seems to be the settled law of this State. As lately as 1880, in the case of Coleman v. Chester, 14 S. C. 291, Judge McIver, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "While it is quite true that in some of the States a contrary conclusion has been reached, we think it settled in this State, by the case of White v. The City Council of Charles- ton, supra, that an action to recover damages for a tort, unless it be provided for by statute, cannot be maintained against a municipal corporation, characterized by Marshall, C. J., in Fowle v. Alexandria, as 'a legislative corporation established as part of the government of the country.' The case of White v. City Council, so far from being shaken, is rather confirmed by the subsequent case of Main v. Railroad Company, 12 Rich. 82 [75 Am. Dec. 725]. In the last case it was held that an action of trespass could be maintained against a railroad company—a corporation formed and exercising its functions for the pecuniary benefit of its members—and not a public corporation, instituted for the purposes of government, &c. * * * Hence, whatever may be the rule elsewhere, we are bound to declare it as established by White v. City Council, unless we overrule that case, which we do not feel justified in doing," &c.

As suggested in the foregoing opinion, in some of the later cases of other States modifications of the general rule as to the non-liability of municipal corporations have been adopted. Many of the cases upon the subject, cited at the bar, have been examined, and we confess that we are unable to see clearly the principle upon which these modifications rest. The general doctrine, as announced by Marshall and Harper, is clearly recognized in all of them; but the view seems to be, that all the powers granted to a municipal corporation are not civil or governmental in their character, but that some of them are what is called merely corporate; and the effort is made, first to separate these powers, distinguishing those which are civil or public from those which are private and local, and then, in regard to those assigned to the latter class, to impose responsibility for negligence only where the duty is not discretionary but purely ministerial in character.

With all due respect, it seems to us that if the powers granted to a municipal corporation are susceptible of such division and separation, it would be exceedingly difficult to carry the doctrine into anything like uniform practice. Opinions must certainly differ, both as to the proper classification of the powers and the character of the duty imposed by them. The necessity of determining in each case, whether a particular power should be ranked in the class of corporate as distinguished from civil powers; and, if the former, whether its exercise imposes a duty, discretionary or merely ministerial, must be the source of constantly-recurring difficulties, and tend to great confusion and uncertainty in the administration of the law.

But, be that as it may, we do not regard the question as involved in this case. If we were at liberty, notwithstanding our own decided cases, expressed in general terms without limitation or qualification, to consider the propriety of the modifications suggested to the general rule, we do not think that the non-feasance complained of here can be properly said to be in reference to a power merely corporate in character, or that the duty imposed was merely ministerial. The system of water works and its management required, on the part of the city authorities, the exercise of discretion and judgment. The power was granted by law to a municipal corporation, and we do not see how it can be properly regarded as imposing a duty purely ministerial in its character.

In the case of Wheeler v. City of Cincinnati, 19 Ohio St. 19, (2 Am. Rep. 368,) the plaintiff's house, situated in the city of Cincinnati, was destroyed in a fire, and he sued the corporation for damages on the ground that the corporation had failed to provide the necessary cisterns and suitable fire engines, and that certain officers of the fire department of the city had neglected to perform their duty in extinguishing the fire which consumed his house. The corporation, as in this case, filed a demurrer, which was sustained. Upon appeal to the Supreme Court it was held that: "The laws of this State have conferred upon its municipal corporations power to establish and organize fire companies, procure engines and other instruments necessary to extinguish fire and preserve the buildings and property within their limit from conflagration; and to prescribe such by-laws and regulations for the government of said companies as may be deemed expedient. But the powers thus conferred are in their nature legislative and governmental; the extent and manner of their exercise, within the sphere prescribed by statute, are necessarily to be determined by the judgment and discretion of the proper municipal authorities; and for any defect in the execution of such powers the corporation cannot be held liable to individuals. Nor is it liable for a neglect of duty on the part of fire companies or their officers charged with the duty of extinguishing fires. The power of the city over the subject is that of a delegated quasi-sovereignty, which excludes responsibility to individuals for the neglect or non-feasance of an officer or agent charged with the performance of duties. The case differs from that where the corporation is charged by law with the performance of a duty purely ministerial in its character. We know of no case in which an action like the present has been held to be maintainable. Brinkmeyer v. Evansville, 29 Ind. 187; Western College of Medicine v. City of Cleveland, 12 Ohio St. 375."

Mr. Dillon, who, in his general views, is very much inclined to make municipal corporations liable, in commenting on the case of Wheeler, says: "Nor is such a corporation liable to the owner of property destroyed or damaged by fire in consequence of its neglect to provide suitable engines or fire apparatus, or to provide and keep in repair public cisterns. In that case (Wheeler's) a liability on the part of the corporation was sought to be sustained upon the ground of the neglect of a corporate duty, but the court considered that powers of this nature, conferred upon municipal corporations, were legislative and governmental, and excluded the notion of responsibility to individuals, based on neglect or non-feasance, and distinguished the case from those in which the duty is purely ministerial," &c. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp., § 474, and many authorities there cited in the notes.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the complaint dismissed.

19 S. C. 425

LIPSCOMB v. SEEGERs.

(April Term, 1883.)

[1. Convicts ⇨12.]

The superintendent of the penitentiary may sue in his own name for the amounts due to the State by a hirer of convicts, on account of the loss of so many of them as were permitted to escape.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 34; Dec. Dig. ⇨12.]

[2. Prisons ⇨7.]

Since 1878 the superintendent of the penitentiary holds his office under election by the general assembly, and not by executive appointment. The act of 1878 (16 Stat. 702) was, in effect, an amendment of the General Statutes, which had repealed the act of 1868, but, at the same time, re-enacted its provisions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prisons, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-9; Dec. Dig. ⇨7.]

[3. Convicts ⇨12.]

A statute permitted the hiring of convicts, upon bond being given for their safe keeping, and the statute provided that the person so hiring should forfeit and pay to the State the sum of fifty dollars per annum for each year of the unexpired term of any convict who escaped through the negligence of the hirer. One of the directors hired convicts upon these terms, but did not give the required bond. Held, that he was liable for convicts negligently permitted to escape.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Finch v. Finch, 28 S. C. 170, 5 S. E. 348, 13 Am. St. Rep. 665.

For other cases, see Convicts, Cent. Dig. § 34; Dec. Dig. ⇨12.]

[4. Damages ⇨79; Limitation of Actions ⇨35.]

The amount of fifty dollars stated as a forfeit for each year of the unexpired term of the escaped convict was not a technical penalty, but stipulated damages, and action therefor was not barred in two years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 164; Dec. Dig. ⇨79; Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 161; Dec. Dig. ⇨35.]

[5. Convicts ⇨12.]

This fifty dollars was the rate per annum fixed upon as compensation to the State for the loss, and for fractions of a year the amount would be a proportionate sum.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 34; Dec. Dig.  $\S$  12.]

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, July, 1882.

The opinion states the case. The brief does not contain the judge's charge in full, but only so much thereof as is complained of in the exceptions, which correctly state the propositions charged and those requested and declined.

Mr. J. D. Pope, for plaintiff.

*Messrs. Melton, Clark & Muller, contra.

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This was an action brought by T. J. Lipscomb, superintendent of the penitentiary, against John C. Seegers, for $1,100, alleged to be due the State on account of five convicts, which the said Seegers hired from the superintendent, and negligently allowed to escape while in his employment. In the year 1879, Seegers, being at that time one of the directors of the penitentiary, entered into an agreement with the superintendent to hire thirty male convicts to work on a farm in the neighborhood of Columbia. During the year, five of them escaped, and this action was for the damages thereby caused to the State.

The complaint alleged: "1. That by the tenth section of the act of assembly entitled 'An act to utilize the convict labor of the State,' as amended and approved March 1st, 1878, it was, among other things, provided as follows: 'That the contractor or company hiring said convicts shall enter into a bond payable to the State, in the sum of ten thousand dollars for every hundred convicts, and a bond in like proportion for a less number, for the safe keeping of the convicts; and for each convict that shall escape through negligence of any kind, the contractor or company shall forfeit and pay to the State therefor the sum of fifty dollars per annum for each year of the unexpired term of the sentence of such escaped convict; provided, further, that if the convict shall be captured within two months and returned to work free of cost to the State, no penalty shall attach.' 2. That some time thereafter the said defendant, who then was one of the directors of the penitentiary, did, under the provisions of the said act, agree to hire thirty male convicts, for which he agreed to pay $3.66 per month per capita. 3. That in pursuance of said agreement the said convicts were delivered to the said defendant on or about the 20th day of January, 1879, but the defendant did not then secure, and has not since secured the State by entering into a bond for the forfeiture imposed by the said act for the safe keeping of the said convicts which were delivered to and received by him as aforesaid. 4.

That the *said defendant did not safely keep the said convicts, but negligently did suffer five of them so hired, by deed delivered to him, to escape. The several names of the said escaped convicts, their several terms of sentence, the several dates of their delivery to defendant, and the several dates of their escape, being as hereinafter set forth," &c.

After stating the names of the five who escaped, the different times at which they respectively escaped, and the unexpired term of the sentence of each, the plaintiff demanded judgment for the aggregate amount of $1,100.

The defendant demurred to the complaint upon two grounds: First, that the plaintiff was not superintendent of the penitentiary and had not legal capacity as such to sue; and second, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Judge Wallace overruled the demurrer, and granted leave to the defendant to answer. He excepted, but, reserving his exceptions, answered, denying the plaintiff's capacity to sue, denying that he agreed to hire the convicts in accordance with the requirements of the "Act to utilize the convict labor of the State," and, also, denying that any of the hired convicts escaped through negligence. Upon these pleadings the case came on for trial before Judge Witherspoon. After the pleadings were read the judge allowed the defendant to amend his answer by pleading the statute of limitations, applicable to an "action upon a statute for a forfeiture or penalty to the State."

It appeared that the plaintiff had been elected superintendent of the penitentiary by the legislature, and he produced two commissions as such—the first bearing date January 3d, 1879, and the other, April 14th, 1882; that as such superintendent he entered into an agreement with the defendant, Seegers, to hire him thirty male convicts for the year 1879; that the contract was according to the requirements of the act upon the subject: that Seegers was to be responsible for the safe keeping of the hired convicts; that the contract and bond, as required by law, were reduced to writing, and handed to Seegers to be signed by him, but he failed to sign the papers, although the convicts had been delivered to him on the faith of the said agreement. *There was some proof as to the time and circumstances under which the different convicts had escaped from the farm.

The Circuit judge held that the amounts sought to be recovered on account of the escape of the convicts, were technical penalties imposed by statute, and as it appeared from the face of the complaint that the action had not been brought within two years and three months after the escape of any of the convicts, except that of David Spry, he sustained the plea of the statute of limitations as barring the action as to the sums alleged to be due on account of the escapes of all the convicts, except the said Spry. The case went to the jury only on this one (Spry's) item of the claim.

When Spry escaped, the unexpired term of his sentence in the penitentiary was something less than three years, viz., two years, one month and twenty days; but the plaintiff claimed damages to the extent of $150, being $50 each for three full years, insisting that the act, which was embraced in the contract, takes no account of fractions of a year, but requires that the contractor shall pay for the negligent escape of a convict "the sum of fifty dollars per annum for each year of the unexpired term of the sentence of such escaped convicts," &c.; whilst the defendant insisted that if he should be held liable at all he ought to be charged only for the actual unexpired term of the convict's sentence, at the rate of $50 per annum. The judge charged in accordance with the defendant's view, and the plaintiff had a verdict, not for $150 compensation for three full years, but for the actual time lost by the escape, $104. Both the plaintiff and defendant appeal to this court.

The defendant's exceptions: "1. For that his Honor refused to charge the jury as requested by the defendant, that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was elected by the general assembly and not appointed by the governor, superintendent of the penitentiary, then he was not de jure superintendent and could not sustain this action. 2. For that his Honor refused the defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. 3. For that his Honor charged the jury, that if they believed from the evidence that this action was commenced within two years after the expiration of three months from the escape of the convict, David Spry, then the defense of the statute of limitations set up in the answer did not apply so far as regarded the forfeiture claimed on account of the escape of that convict," &c.

The plaintiff's exceptions, for the purposes of this case may be condensed into the following:

"1. Because the agreement of the parties, although not reduced to writing, and the bond not given by defendant's own fault, was nevertheless made with reference to the provisions of the act upon the subject; and when the convicts were delivered to and received by the defendant under that agreement he was bound by all the provisions of the law embodied in that agreement.

"2. Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge that the act authorizing the contract and its terms, and the sums to be forfeited under it, does not create a penalty imposed by statute, but, on the contrary, was clearly intended to define and limit the amount of damages for which any 'contractor or company,' should be held liable in the event of the violation of the stipulations, not of the act, but of the contracts made in pursuance of the requirements of such law, and as such the amounts so limited constitute stated damages and not a penalty.

"3. Because his Honor refused to charge that a year was the minimum of the division of time authorized by the act, and the fifty dollars each year applies in whole to every year and the fractional part of any year of the unexpired term of the sentence of the escaped convict, until the maximum of two hundred and fifty dollars shall be reached," &c.

As to the exceptions of the defendant, and first as to the legal capacity of the plaintiff to sue as superintendent of the State penitentiary. The state of the law upon the subject is as follows: The act of 1868 provided that the penitentiary should be under the direction of a superintendent to be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and also provided, "That all actions or suits at law for the recovery of any debt or demand accruing from the business transactions of the penitentiary, or for the recovery of damages for injuries *done to any of the property or effects of said prison, shall be brought and maintained in the name of the superintendent thereof for the time being; and the said superintendent is authorized and empowered to sue for and collect all such claims and demands, of every description, now due or which may hereafter become due and payable on account of said prison." Act of 1868, § 12, 14 Stat. 94; Gen. Stat. 763. The act of 1868 was expressly repealed by the general statutes (1872), but the provisions cited were reenacted therein.

In 1877 an act was passed "to utilize the convict labor of the State," which authorized the board of directors to lease or hire out the convicts upon certain terms. 16 Stat. 264. In 1878 an act was passed to amend the act of 1877 by adding thereto several sections, and providing that the superintendent should be elected by the legislature. 16 Stat. 393 and 702. Under this act the plaintiff was elected superintendent by the legislature, and has his commission as such officer signed by the governor. It is said, however, that the last act of 1878, changing the mode of the appointment of superintendent, is not and never was law, for the reason that it purported to be an amendment of the old law of 1868, which gave the appointment to the governor, but which law had been expressly repealed by the general statutes, and that an attempted amendment to a law repealed is itself necessarily void. If such were the case the effect would be that we have no such officer as the superintendent of the State penitentiary, for the law authorizing his appointment by the governor has been expressly repealed, and that requiring him to be elected by the legislature is void.

But, fortunately, such is not the correct view. The amending act of 1878 does not, in express terms, refer to the act of 1868 as such. It is true, the act of 1868 was repealed by the general statutes, but, as before stated, its provisions, in terms, were re-enacted therein, and the amendment of 1878 manifestly had reference to the law as it stood in the general statutes, which had not been repealed, but, on the contrary, as now amended, giving the election to the legislature, is contained in the new general statutes, and is now the law of the State. Gen. Stat., § 2713. The plaintiff is now superintendent of the State penitentiary, both de jure and de facto, and under the law giving him the right as such officer to sue "for any debt or demand arising from the business transactions of the penitentiary," he had the right to sue. "An executor or administrator, a trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue," &c. Code, § 134.

We cannot say that Judge Wallace erred in overruling the demurrer for the alleged reason that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer admitted the facts stated in the complaint, which alleged that the defendant agreed with the plaintiff to hire thirty male convicts, under the provisions of the act upon the subject, for which he agreed to pay $3.66 per month per capita; that he did not, as he agreed, safely keep the said convicts, but negligently suffered five of them to escape, naming them and giving the unexpired term of the sentence of each of those who were never recaptured. And the plaintiff, as the superintendent of the penitentiary, and the person with whom the agreement was made, demanded payment of the aggregate sum of $1,100, on account of the said escapes. In our judgment this was a sufficient statement of a cause of action upon the agreement of the defendant, on the faith of which the convicts were delivered to him.

It is unnecessary to consider the alleged error of the Circuit judge in his ruling upon the statute of limitations as applicable to the claim on account of the escape of the convict David Spry, as the jury, from their verdict, must have found that the statute, even as expounded by the judge, did not apply to that one item of the demand. Upon that subject we do not think that the exception of the plaintiff is well founded. It was not error in the Circuit judge to apportion the unexpired term of the sentence of an escaped convict, when it was less than a full year. The words of the act, which we regard as incorporated in the contract, are: "The sum of fifty dollars per annum for each year of the unexpired term of the sentence of such escaped convict." We do not understand the words "for each year" as properly meaning for each part of a year, be it large or small, but for the actual time at that rate. As will hereafter more fully appear, we cannot regard the fifty dollars per annum, stipulated to be paid for each convict allowed through negligence to escape, as a technical penalty to be recovered by suit on the statute, but we consider it rather compensation for the time of the convict thus lost to the State by his escape; and according to this view it would seem to be only just and proper that the State should receive compensation only for the services actually lost to it by the escape. We see no error in the charge of the Circuit judge as to the amount of compensation allowed for the escape of the convict Spry, and to this extent the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

The plaintiff's exceptions. He complains that the Circuit judge allowed the defendant at the trial to amend his answer by putting in the plea of the statute of limitations, applicable to "an action upon a statute for a forfeiture or penalty to the State," and ruled that the same so pleaded was applicable to the case, and barred recovery of the amounts claimed to be due on account of the escaped convicts, viz.: John Williams, Richard Robinson, William Talbert and James Blakely; the action as to them not having been brought within two years from the times the said convicts respectively escaped from the defendant. Was this error? Section 114 of the code provides that "an action upon a statute for a forfeiture or penalty to the State" must be brought "within two years." The first inquiry is whether the action was brought upon the statute for a penalty or on a contract made by the defendant in conformity with the terms of the statute.

It seems to us clear that the action was not brought upon the statute, but on the contract of the defendant made in conformity with its requirements. The complaint so states, and the plaintiff testified that all the convicts named were delivered to Seegers, who was to be responsible for their safe keeping. It is true that the defendant testified that he did not make an agreement to pay $50 a year for the unexpired time in the penitentiary of those that might negligently escape. But all the circumstances tend to show conclusively that he received the convicts upon such a contract and none other. Without such a contract he had no right whatever to receive the convicts at all, and might have been indicted for intermeddling with and harboring *prisoners under sentence. Lipscomb was the superintendent, and it was his especial duty to keep the custody of the convicts, unless they were let out according to law, and Seegers was at the time a director of the penitentiary and well knew the terms made necessary to hire them.

To entertain the view that Seegers got and retained control of the convicts for a year without a contract with the superintendent, would be to admit that both the superintendent and the director violated their plain duty. Under these circumstances the court cannot assume that they violated their duty in the premises or allow averments contrary thereto. That there was a contract appears also from the fact that it was reduced to writing and received by Seegers. It can not alter the case that he, after getting possession of the convicts under the contract, refused to sign the papers. If he was unwilling to comply with the terms, he should have declined to take or returned the convicts. He can not escape responsibility by simply declining to sign the contract, which only put in writing what he had already verbally agreed to, and under which contract alone he had obtained possession of the convicts. The case must be considered precisely as if Seegers had signed the contract as reduced to writing.

This contract, though not in writing, must be regarded as corresponding in its terms with the requirements of the act. It was the duty of the parties to make such a contract or none at all; and thus considered we do not think that it imposed upon the defendant technical penalties for the negligent escape of convicts, but was the agreement of the defendant himself voluntarily assumed as a necessary condition to getting control of the convicts. It being the first and highest duty of the superintendent to keep the convicts safely, the legislature did not give him authority to let them go beyond the walls of the prison without positive voluntary agreement on the part of the hirer, not only to keep them safely, but in case of escape to be responsible for $50 per annum as compensation to the State for so much of the unexpired sentence of each as was lost by such escape. This part of the agreement required by the act was not intended to be a technical penalty recoverable by the attorney-general on the act itself, but was to become the agreement of the parties in the nature of liquidated damages for services lost.

Considering the provisions of the act as incorporated into the contract, it is said that the act itself uses the words "forfeiture" and "penalty." That is true, but we think if the act is read carefully, it will be seen that the words are not used in their strict technical sense. The words used are not conclusive of the question. As was said by Mr. Justice Coltman in Sainter v. Ferguson, 7 Man. G. & S. 716: "Although the word 'penalty,' which would prima facie exclude the notion of stipulated damages, is used here, yet we must look at the nature of the agreement and the surrounding circumstances to see whether the parties intended the sum mentioned to be a penalty or stipulated damages. Considering the nature of this agreement and the difficulty the plaintiff would be under in showing what specific damage he had sustained from the defendant's breach of it, I think we can only reasonably construe it to be a contract for stipulated and ascertained damages."

The question whether a sum mentioned in an agreement to be paid for a breach is to be treated as a penalty or as liquidated damages, is a question of law to be decided by the judge, upon a consideration of the whole instrument. And the principle upon which he is to proceed, is simply to ascertain the real intention of the parties, from the language they have used. Wood's Mayne Dam., § 163. After citing the cases, the author in a note says: "To summarize, it may be said, when the damages are uncertain and not susceptible of ready ascertainment, and the sum fixed upon as damages is not unreasonable or unconscionable in view of the probable damages, and from the whole contract and the surrounding circumstances, such appears to have been the intention of the parties, such sum will be treated as liquidated damages."

Apply this rule to the case under consideration. The value of an unexpired sentence of a convict is, in its nature, "uncertain," and $50 per year for each is not "unreasonable or unconscionable" in view of the probable damage, and from the surroundings, especially from the official knowledge of both parties of what was absolutely necessary, such must be considered to have been the *intention of the parties. The amount to be paid was, like ordinary hire, in proportion to the time. See Allen v. Brazier & Randolph, 2 Bailey 293; Worrell v. McClinaghan, 5 Strobb. 115.

The plaintiff's claim consisted of an aggregate of different amounts for five escaped convicts, viz.: John Williams, Richard Robinson, William Talbert, James Blakely and David Spry. Each distinct, somewhat in analogy to different causes of action. The plaintiff's recovery for what was due on account of the convict Spry has already been affirmed. But as to the other four convicts, viz.: Williams, Robinson, Talbert and Blakeley, the Circuit judge held that the plaintiff's claim was barred by the statute of limitations applicable to an action for a penalty. In this we think there was error.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, so far as concerns the claim on account of the escaped convicts, Williams, Robinson, Talbert and Blakeley, be reversed, and to that extent the case be remanded for a new trial.

Before Witherspoon, J., Spartanburg. March, 1883.

*The presiding judge thus reports the case:

The defendant, Lang Hill, was indicted and convicted for horse stealing. Evidence on the part of the State, the defendant offering no testimony, showed that the defendant, on or about October 10th, 1882, was at the house of one Thomas J. Neely, who lived in Transylvania county, N. C. Defendant was engaged in repairing sewing machines, and was several days at said Neely's and in his neighborhood. Defendant represented to Neely that he had a horse and buggy and some tools on Cane creek, in Henderson county, N. C., and desired to get the use of Neely's horse to go for them. He obtained said horse from Neely and promised to return the same in a week.

Neely received information in a few days that defendant was trying to sell his (Neely's) horse in the town of Hendersonville, N. C. He went in pursuit of his horse, and on the following week found it at the livery stable of one G. D. Carrier, in the town of Spartanburg, S. C. The proof was that Carrier had purchased the horse from defendant, who represented to him that it was his (defendant's) property; that Carrier had paid him a portion of the purchase-money; that the prosecutor, Neely, identified the horse as his, and the defendant admitted that it was the horse of Neely. The defendant was then arrested. The proof was that Cane creek was not in the direction of Hendersonville or of Spartanburg, but in the opposite direction, and towards Asheville, N. C.

The jury found the defendant guilty, and the defendant was sentenced to two years at hard labor in the penitentiary. A motion for new trial was made and argued before me, which I refused because I thought the evidence sustained the verdict. A motion in arrest of judgment was made upon the exceptions presented, which was also refused, because I could see no error in my rulings.

I charged the jury that the defendant was indicted for stealing a horse in Spartanburg county, S. C., and not for stealing a horse in North Carolina, and that if they were satisfied from the circumstances and facts of the case, that when defendant obtained the horse he intended to steal him, or convert it feloniously to his own use, and that the hiring or borrowing was only a pretext to obtain possession, the intent being to steal, and defendant brought the horse to Spartanburg and converted the property feloniously to his own use, and to deprive the owner of the same, it would be larceny. But of all this they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt from the proof. That the question of intent was one for the jury, which they must determine from all the facts and circumstances of the case, and that they were bound to give the benefit of every reasonable doubt which might arise to the defendant. Requests one, two and five were charged as requested.

There was no proof whatever offered tending to show in any way the purpose of defendant to return proceeds of the sale of the horse to the owner, and I therefore declined to charge a supposed case, which is embraced in the third request to charge.

The defendant only challenged three jurors. On the first day of the term I ordered that the names of five persons be drawn from the tales or five-mile-box to fill the deficiency in the number of petit jurors, which was drawn under my direction by the jury commissioner in the presence of the clerk and sheriff, and the said order directed them be "summoned when so drawn forthwith." I regarded the venire facias for grand and petit jurors as sufficiently regular, and that there was no irregularity in either writ, or in the drawing, summoning, returning or impaneling of the jurors, by which the defendant making objection had been injured, or to which any objection was made or exception taken before the returning of the verdict.

At the trial the defendant presented the following requests to charge:

1. "That unless the horse was taken from Neely with a larcenous intent, then the defendant cannot be convicted of horse stealing.

2. "That if the horse was hired with intent to return him to the owner, and afterwards determined to convert him to his own use, then the defendant cannot be convicted under this indictment.

3. "That if the prisoner sold the horse to Carrier with intent to account for his value to Neely, he cannot be convicted under this indictment.

*4. "That if the horse was taken in North Carolina with a felonious intent and brought into this State, he cannot be convicted here of horse stealing.

5. "That the prisoner cannot be convicted under this indictment if the facts show only a breach of trust with fraudulent intent."

The defendant appealed upon the following grounds:

1. "That his Honor erred in refusing to arrest judgment upon the following grounds: That neither the grand jury, which presented a true bill, nor the petit jury which rendered the verdict herein, was a legal jury; that neither of said juries was drawn, summoned or impaneled according to law in this case: (1). That neither in the original nor additional writs of venire are any names of persons who were to sit as either grand or petit jurors at the present term of this court. (2). That the names of said jurors were not even annexed to said writs of venire. (3). That no one of said writs are or were issued in the name of the attorney-general or of the solicitor of the Circuit. (4). That the original writs of venire contained no proof whatever of the summoning of many of the aforesaid grand or petit jurors. (5). That the said grand or petit jurors were not summoned either by the sheriff or deputy sheriff. (6). That the said writs do not show that they were summoned within the time required by law. (7). That the original writs of venire were not returned to the clerk before the time of opening and holding said court. (8). That the record shows no proof that any of said writs of venire were ever served upon the jury commissioners. (9). That no one of said writs of venire runs in the name of the State of South Carolina. (10). That neither of the writs of venire for grand jury, nor the writ of venire for the original petit jury, were issued under the seal of this court. (11). That the writ of venire issued for additional jurors in term time, and on the first day of the present term of this court, was not issued under the seal of the court. (12). That the additional jurors were not drawn as required by sections 2631 and 2637 of the general statutes. (13). That E. W. Cummings, one of the jurors who tried the case, was drawn as an additional juror.

2. "Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in not *charging as requested, 'That if the horse was taken in North Carolina with a felonious intent and brought into this State, he cannot be convicted here of horse stealing.'

3. "Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that if they believed that when the defendant borrowed the horse in North Carolina he intended to commit larceny, and afterwards brought the horse into South Carolina and sold him, the defendant could be convicted in South Carolina under the indictment.

4. "Because his Honor erred in not granting a new trial, as asked, no larceny having been proved, but only a breach of trust."

Mr. Solicitor Duncan, contra.

June 29th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant having been convicted under an indictment for horse stealing, moves in arrest of judgment upon the ground of sundry alleged defects in the writs of venire, by which the jurors were summoned, and also for a new trial upon the grounds of certain alleged errors in the charge of the Circuit judge.

The grounds relied upon in arrest of judgment may be divided into two classes: 1. Those which rest upon alleged defects in the writ of venire, issued to summon five additional jurors, drawn from the tales-box to supply a deficiency in the number originally summoned. 2. Those which allege defects in the original writs of venire under which the grand and petit jurors for the term were summoned. Inasmuch as there was *not only no necessity, but also no authority, for issuing a writ of venire to summon the five additional jurors drawn from the tales-box. (State v. Williams, 2 Hill 381; State v. Stephens, 11 S. C. 319.) the several objections urged to this writ require no further notice.

The principal objections urged to the original writs of venire are: 1. That they are not signed by the attorney-general or solicitor of the Circuit. 2. That they do not run in the name of the State of South Carolina; the other objections being either abandoned or so plainly untenable that they were not relied upon in the argument here. The first objection rests upon the provisions of section 742 of the General Statutes of 1882, but that section only requires the clerk "to issue every execution, bench warrant or other process issuable or directed to be issued by the courts of sessions, in the name of the attorney-general or solicitor of the Circuit," and has no application to a writ of venire to summon jurors both for the Courts of Sessions and Common Pleas.

The next objection rests upon the provisions of section 31, article IV. of the constitution, which provides that, "All writs and processes shall run and all prosecutions shall be conducted in the name of the State of South Carolina." The writs of venire in this case are in the following forms:

"State of South Carolina, }
"County of Spartanburg County;"

"To the Sheriff of Spartanburg County:

"You are hereby strictly required and commanded," &c.

And it is urged that this is not the proper form, but that it should be as follows:

"The State of South Carolina.

"To the Sheriff of Spartanburg County, Greeting:

"You are hereby strictly required and commanded," &c.

It appears to us that this is a distinction without a difference. If it anywhere appears in the writ that it is issued in the name *of the State, there is a sufficient compliance with the constitutional requirements; and surely the mere location of the words upon the paper can have no special virtue. Nor can the addition in the caption of the words, "County of Spartanburg," impair the validity of the mandate, for they may well be regarded as mere surplusage. Indeed, they may perhaps be treated as serving only to indicate that the officer who issued the writ, whose authority is limited to that county, was properly invested with authority to use the name of the State in that particular locality.

These views are well supported by authority. In State v. Smouse, 49 Iowa 634, the information was for violating one of the ordinances of the city of Washington. It was in the following form: "The State of Iowa, City of Washington v. Charles Smouse," and the objection taken was, that it should have been in the name of the city and not of the State. The court held that the words "State of Iowa," should be regarded as descriptive merely, or rejected as surplusage, as it clearly appeared from the body of the information, that the prosecution was by and in the name of the city. In Mississippi, where the constitutional provision is like ours, it was held in Greeson v. State, 5 How. (Miss.) 33, that a formal statement in the indictment that it was found by the authority of the State, is not necessary if it appears from the record that the prosecution was in the name of the State. In White v. Commonwealth, 6 Binn. 179, (6 Am. Dec. 443.) the objection to the process for summoning the jury was, that it should have commenced: "The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to the Sheriff, Greeting:" whereas it commenced: "The Judges to the Sheriff, Greeting: In the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, you are hereby commanded, &c." The constitution then in force in that State, Article V., section 12, declared: "The style of all process, shall be, 'The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania,'" &c. The court held the objection untenable, saying: "It is of no consequence in what part of the process the Commonwealth is introduced, so that the command is given in its name."

We think that the writs of venire in this case conformed, substantially, to the constitutional requirement, and, therefore, the motion in arrest of judgment cannot be sustained.

The motion for a new trial presents a question which has been before the courts of the several States upon frequent occasions, and the decisions are conflicting. In this State we have no distinct adjudication upon the question, though there is a case hereinafter referred to, which, by analogy, seems to control it. The question is, whether one who steals a horse in another State and brings him into this State, and here converts him to his own use, can be indicted here for larceny. In 1 Bish. Cr. L. (6th edit.), §§ 136-143, the question is discussed, and the conclusion reached that such an indictment can be sustained.

This conclusion is well supported, both by reason and authority. The principle upon which this doctrine rests is, that the possession of stolen property, in contemplation of law, remains in the owner, and the thief, therefore, is guilty of larceny in every place into which he carries the goods, as "every moment's continuance of the trespass and felony amounts to a new caption and asportation."

The case of Watson v. State, 36 Miss. 593, furnishes an able and elaborate discussion of the question. In that case the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court, Harris, J., shows that both upon principle and authority a person who steals goods in the State of Alabama, and carries them into the State of Mississippi, and there converts them to his own use, may be indicted for larceny in the latter State, for the reason that the legal possession still "remaining with the owner, every moment's continuance of the trespass and felony amounts, in legal contemplation, to a new caption and asportation." He also shows that the cases which hold a contrary doctrine, resting, as they do, ultimately, upon Butler's Case, cited in 13 Coke Rep. 53, are based upon a misconception of the real ground upon which that case was founded. Again, he says: "The proof involves the intent and the act. The existence of the intent may be shown in any locality, county, State or country. The commission of the act must be shown in the county where the indictment was had. There is a wide difference between the proof of the act and the evidence of the intent with which it *was done. The intent precedes the act, and may evidence at different times and in various jurisdictions. It may be shown by the declarations of the actor, or by facts and circumstances happening in a distant country or a different jurisdiction from that where the actual offense occurred."

Hence, we may well look to the felonious taking in another State for the purpose of ascertaining the intent, and when the act is consummated in this State by bringing the stolen property here and converting it to the use of the thief, the offense is complete here. In State v. Ellis, 3 Conn. 185, it was held that the stealing of a horse in another State and carrying him into the State of Connecticut constituted the crime of larceny there. In Massachusetts there are several cases holding a similar doctrine. Commonwealth v. Cullins, 1 Mass. 116, followed by Commonwealth v. Andrews, 2 Mass. 14, in which the decision is said to rest upon the principle "that the original taking being felonious, every act of possession continued under it by the thief is a felonious taking, and wherever he carries the articles stolen he may there be indicted, convicted and punished for the felony." These cases were recognized and followed in Commonwealth v. Holder, 9 Gray 7, and Commonwealth v. White, 123 Mass. 433, decided as late as 1877.

It is true that in the case of Commonwealth v. Uprichard, 3 Gray 434, it was held that one who steals goods in one of the British Provinces (Nova Scotia) and carries them into the State of Massachusetts, cannot be indicted there for larceny. Shaw, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court, while recognizing the authority of the two cases above cited from 1 and 2 Mass., distinguishes the case of a larceny committed in a foreign country from one committed in another State. While plainly intimating the opinion that if the question were an open one it might be decided differently, he undertakes to put those decisions upon the ground of the peculiar relations existing between the States of the Union, which, as he says, are somewhat analogous to the relations existing between the several counties of a State—a ground which we do not find taken anywhere else, and one which we are by no means disposed to adopt, and wholly ignores the true ground upon which these decisions, as well as *others of the like character, do rest, viz.: that where one takes goods from another in any place, under circumstances which make the taking felonious, the possession of the owner, in contemplation of law, continues, and where the goods so taken are carried into another State, that constitutes a new taking and asportation in that State, for which an indictment for larceny will lie.

In Worthington v. State, 58 Md. 403, a very recent case, it was held that where a person steals goods in one State and carries them into another, the act of carrying the stolen property into the latter State is a new larceny for which the thief may there be indicted. This case furnishes a full collection of the authorities.

In this State, as we have said, the point under discussion has never been distinctly decided. In the State v. Bryant, 9 Rich. 113, our court held, that where a horse is stolen in one district (county) and is carried by the thief into another, and there sold, an indictment under the statute for horse stealing might be maintained in the latter district; but they declined to express any opinion upon the question now presented for our decision, as it was not then before them. It seems to us, however, that the reason given for the decision applies with equal force to the case now under consideration, and is practically the same reason as that given for the decisions in the other States, which we have hereinbefore cited. Judge Whitner, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language: "The property in the goods is not changed, and the law considers them in the possession of the proprietor until he is legally divested. The continuance of the trespass is as much a wrong as the original taking, and therefore the continued possession of the wrong-doer is a continued taking and at each moment manifests the same disposition (animus furandi) that prompted the original act." This case, then, may well be regarded as authority for the view which we have taken, as it really rests upon the same principle.

The ground taken in most of the cases which hold a contrary doctrine, that the view which we have adopted may render a person liable to be indicted twice for the same offense, we do not think entitled to any weight.

In the first place, it may well *be doubted whether it is the same offense; and even if it were, we know of no law which exempts a person from liability to answer for a violation of the criminal law of this State simply because he may be liable to indictment elsewhere for the same offense. What effect an indictment and conviction for the larceny committed in the State, where the property was originally stolen, might have, we are not now called upon to consider. Indeed, we are at a loss to see with what reason a felon who has rendered himself amenable to the laws of this State, can claim exemption simply because he has violated the law of another State. As is said in 1 Bish. Cr. L., § 142: "The common law either admits of two convictions in such a case, or it does not. If it does, there is nothing in the objection; if it does not, then the first conviction, in whichever locality it takes place, may be pleaded in bar of the second. The common law, however, knows no such plea in defense of a prosecution as liability to indictment elsewhere."

We see no error, therefore, either in the refusal to charge as requested or in that part of the charge which is excepted to. The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

6. The appeal sustained nisi.

[This case is also cited in Ludden & Bates Music House v. Dusenbury, 27 S. C. 464, 4 S. E. 60, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Kershaw, J., Richland, October, 1882.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. N. K. Perry, for appellant.

Mr. W. L. Lyles, contra.

June 29th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action on four notes under seal, all of the same tenor, except as to the time of payment, and the following copy of the first note will, for the purposes of this case, serve as a copy of each of the notes:

"$120. Columbia, S. C., April 2d, 1880.

"On or before the second (2) day of November, 1880, I promise to pay A. W. Straub, or order, one hundred and twenty dollars, for value received in delivering to me of three 20" mills, and if not punctually paid at maturity, with interest from that time at 7 per cent. ~~(per annum and compound from of 10 per cent on the amount, if collected by law)~~, and I hereby waive the benefit of the homestead exemption, as to this debt. It is furthermore the express condition of the delivery of said three mills to me that the title, ownership or possession does not pass from the said A. W. Straub until the note and interest is paid in full, and he may take possession of said three mills now at Grange, Transylvania county, N. C., and sell the same for my account, at any time, in case this note is not punctually paid, ~~for which cause I hold myself liable for any and all loss or damage caused by my failure to meet this note.~~

"Witness: E. W. Screven, [L. S.]

"Newman K. Perry."

The erasures indicated in the foregoing copy, and relied upon by appellant in his argument, were made before the notes were signed.

*447

*The plaintiff, in his complaint, admitted that he had taken possession of one of the mills, which, he says, he had been unable to sell without a sacrifice, but he alleges that the value of said mill is not more than $125. He also admitted the receipt of $50 from one Dial for his interest in another mill which he had seized; and in making up the statement of the balance due he allows the defendant credit for this $125, as well as for the $50 received from Dial, and only demands judgment for $325.30, with interest from November 2d, 1881. The defense was that the notes had been satisfied by the seizure of the mills by the plaintiff, under the authority contained in the notes.

The case was tried by the Circuit judge, without a jury, and he found, as matter of fact, that one of the mills which had been taken possession of by the plaintiff, had been sold since the commencement of this action, and brought the sum of $100, and that it cost the plaintiff $9 to transport the same to place of sale; that the notes sued upon were left by defendant in the hands of his attorney to be delivered to the plaintiff, but that defendant took possession of the mills as soon as the notes were signed; that after the notes were signed, but before June 18th, 1880, the defendant gave to Dial a mortgage on said mills, giving him notice of plaintiff's claim, and on that day, after the mortgage to Dial was executed, the said notes were delivered to the plaintiff; that the mills were taken to North Carolina by the defendant, and plaintiff had his mortgage recorded there; that Dial sent his mortgage to North Carolina, and seized the mills thereunder, denying notice of plaintiff's mortgage; that plaintiff threatened Dial with suit, and he proposed to divide the mills, to which plaintiff agreed, and each took one mill, Dial paying $50 to plaintiff and retaining the other mill. And, as matter of law, he found: "That plaintiff is entitled to recover against the defendant on said notes, with interest, according to their tenor and effect, less the amount actually received by him from Dial and from the sale of the mill, which he recovered less expenses."

He therefore rendered judgment for the sum of $359.30, with interest from November 2d, 1881, which, it will be observed, exceeds the sum for which judgment was demanded in the complaint, by the sum of $34. This difference, doubtless, arose from the fact that the plaintiff, in computing the balance due on the debt, gave credit for $125, the estimated value of the mill, of which the plaintiff had taken possession, which had not been sold at the time the complaint was filed, whereas the Circuit judge only gave defendant credit for the actual amount which the mill brought when it was sold—$100—less the expenses of such sale, $9.

*448

The defendant appeals upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his Honor erred in holding 'That plaintiff recover against the defendant on said notes, according to their tenor and effect.'

2. "Because his Honor erred in holding that the defendant pay expenses attending sale of one of said mills.

3. "Because his Honor erred in not holding that Dial, being a subsequent creditor with notice, and receiving one-half of the mills with consent of plaintiff, defendant was not liable for mills so released.

4. "Because his Honor erred in not holding that the plaintiff, having taken possession of said mills and detained the same with Dial, was an extinguishment of defendant's notes.

5. "Because his Honor erred in not holding that plaintiff's declaration of part possession of mills, and subsequent disposition by compromise to Dial of the other part, was possession of the whole, and such possession was a satisfaction of defendant's obligations.

6. "Because his Honor erred in adjudging for plaintiff $359.30 and interest, while plaintiff only demands judgment for $325.30, with interest from November 2d, 1881.

7. "Because his Honor erred in not holding that the complaint be dismissed with costs to defendant."

It is very clear that the plaintiff and defendant, by virtue of their contract, as evidenced by the notes, stood towards each other in the relation of mortgagee and mortgagor. The plaintiff had a right, upon default in the payment of the notes, to seize and sell the mortgaged property, or any part thereof, accounting to the defendant for the proceeds of such sale; but he was not bound to do so, and, on the contrary, he might altogether have disregarded the mortgage clause in the notes and brought his action for the money secured thereby, just as if no such clause was contained therein. So, too, he had a right to seize one of the three mills, without being bound to seize them all, and all that the defendant could require of him, in that event, would be to allow him credit for the proceeds of the sale of the mill so seized, and this is exactly what the Circuit judge required of him.

*449

It does not appear from the facts, as found by the Circuit judge (and these are the only facts before us), that the plaintiff ever had possession of but one of the mills, and that has been sold and the proceeds applied as a credit to the debt of defendant. On the contrary, it appears that it was Dial, and not the plaintiff, who took possession of the mills under his mortgage, and that he, upon being threatened with a suit by the plaintiff, surrendered one of the mills to the plaintiff and paid him $50, for which, likewise, the defendant has been allowed credit. It seems to us, therefore, very clear that the defendant has been allowed all the credits which he could, by any possibility, claim against the plaintiff. To make the plaintiff responsible for the value of the other mills seized by Dial, would not only be unwarranted by any principle of law or justice, but would probably result in giving the defendant credit twice for the same thing; for, as far as we can see, there is no possible reason why the defendant should not be entitled to credit on his debt to Dial for the proceeds of the sale of the mills seized by Dial, and to allow him credit also for such proceeds, or for the value of the mills, as he claims, on his debt to the plaintiff, would certainly be giving him credit twice for the same thing.

Under the view which we take of the sixth ground of appeal, the point suggested by the second ground—that defendant was not liable for the expenses attending the sale of the mill—cannot now arise. But it may be well for us to say that we do not think the point well taken. There can be no doubt of the general proposition, that the mortgagor can only claim credit for the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property after deducting therefrom the expenses incident to the seizure and sale of the property. But it is contended that the erasures in the notes show that it was the intention of the parties in this case that the defendant should not be liable for such expenses. We cannot concur in this view. In the first place, the words erased do not distinctly point to the expenses that might be incurred in the sale of the mortgaged property; and, even if they did, we think the notes must be read as if the words erased had never been inserted, and when so read the contract falls within the general rule as to mortgages. Those words were not at all necessary to create a liability on the part of the defendant for the expenses of the sale, and if he had desired to exempt himself from such liability he should have inserted in the contracts words of exemption, as contracts must be construed by the words which they contain, and not with reference to words omitted or erased.

We are unable, therefore, to see how any of the grounds of appeal can be sustained, except the sixth, which we will now proceed to consider. The plaintiff, in his complaint, stated his several causes of action, together with the credits which he admitted to be applicable thereto, and demanded judgment for a specific sum of money, as the balance due after deducting the admitted credits; and we do not see how judgment could be rendered for a larger sum without an amendment, which was not asked for or ordered. The Code of 1882, § 297, provides that: "The relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint; but, in any other case, the court may grant him any other relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." Here there was an answer, and hence the question is, whether the relief granted was "consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." The case made by the complaint was that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in a certain specified sum of money, which was the balance due on the notes sued upon after deducting certain credits stated and admitted in the complaint. Upon this and this alone was issue joined, and it seems to us that to vary the amount of one of these admitted credits, and more especially to allow an additional sum, nowhere alluded to in the pleadings, was granting relief not consistent with the case made by the complaint and not embraced within the issue presented for trial.

*The cases relied upon by the plaintiff to sustain the judgment below (Kaphan v. Ryan, 16 S. C. 352; and Chapman v. Lipscomb, 18 S. C. 235,) do not appear to be in point. In the former case the Circuit judge simply corrected an error in the calculation of interest, the complaint itself furnishing the materials for making such correction, and, therefore, it is clear that, in that case, the relief granted was entirely consistent with the case made by the complaint.

In Chapman v. Lipscomb the action was not brought on a money demand, but was for the recovery of possession of personal property as well as damages for its detention, and it was for the jury or referee by whom that case was tried, instead of a jury, to assess the value of the property as well as the damages, and the judgment, as rendered, was for an amount much less than the total amount demanded in the complaint. Indeed, the exceptions in that case were so extremely general and indefinite that the point now raised did not distinctly appear, and, therefore, it did not receive the attention which it would otherwise have received.

We are of opinion, therefore, that there was error in rendering judgment for $34 more than the amount demanded in the complaint, the same not being warranted by the case as made in the complaint, and that the defendant is entitled to have the judgment corrected in this particular.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case remanded to that court for a new trial, unless the plaintiff shall, within ten days after written notice of this judgment, remit upon the record in the Circuit Court $34 of the recovery, in which event the judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, so reduced in amount, be affirmed.

BÜRGES &amp; CO. v. POLLITZER.

(April Term, 1883.)

[Judgment  §4, 113.]

Complaint for goods sold and delivered was verified and its allegations were admitted by the answer, which set up a counter-claim. Plaintiff then filed with the clerk of court, an admission of the counter-claim, and on the call of *the default docket at the next term, moved for judgment for the excess. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to judgment for such excess in like manner as in cases of default, and that notice to defendant of application for judgment was not necessary.

*452

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 139, 207; Dec. Dig.  §4, 113.]

Before Fraser, J., Beaufort, June, 1882.

Action by George Burges & Co., against Mr. Pollitzer. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Verdier & Talbird, for appellants.
Messrs. Elliott & Fowles, contra.

July 2d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This action was brought to recover $5,780.43, the price of goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendant between the first day of September, 1880, and the first day of April, 1881. The complaint was verified. The defendant answered, admitting plaintiff's complaint to be true and setting up a counter-claim for $365.72. At the June Term of the court succeeding, the plaintiff filed a statement with the clerk of the court admitting said counter-claim, and after the close of the court of sessions for said term, upon the call of calendar No. 6, moved for a judgment in the action for the excess of his demand over the counter-claim so admitted.

Defendant objected on the grounds, first, that his Honor the judge had no power to render the judgment; that the defendant having answered, the case could not be disposed of at said term, it not being a term for the trial of jury causes; and second, that if the case could be considered as one of "default" so far as the excess of demand over counter-claim was concerned, then the plaintiff, not having given notice to the defendant of the time and place of application to the court for judgment, the defendant having appeared by his answer, judgment could not be rendered. The Circuit judge overruled the objections and held that as to the excess over counter-claim the defendant stood as in default, and was not entitled to notice of application for judgment, and *rendered judgment for the excess of plaintiff's demand over the counter-claim.

The defendant appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because the defendant having answered in the action admitting part of plaintiff's demand and setting up counter-claim for the balance, his Honor erred in holding plaintiff entitled to judgment by default for balance of his claim after filing statement admitting counter-claim, and his Honor erred in making the order for judgment.

2. "Because the defendant having appeared in this action by his answer, was entitled to eight days' notice of the time and place of application to the court for judgment, and his Honor erred in ruling that the defendant was not entitled to notice, and in making the order for judgment in the absence of notice to the defendant."

It may be this was not a case of technical "default," as the defendant filed an answer, but we think it is covered and provided for by sub-division 1 of section 267 of the code, which is as follows: "In any action on contract, the plaintiff may file proof of personal service, &c., and that no appearance, answer or demurrer has been served on him; it shall be the duty of the clerk to place all such cases on the calendar No. 6, and said calendar shall be called on the first day of the term. When the action is on a complaint for the recovery of money only, judgment may be given for the plaintiff by default if the demand be liquidated; and if unliquidated, upon proper proof of his demand. In all other cases the relief to be afforded the plaintiff shall be ascertained either by the verdict of a jury, or, in cases in chancery, by the judge, with or without reference, as he may deem proper. The order for judgment in such cases shall be endorsed upon or attached to the complaint. Where the defendant, by his answer in any such action, shall not deny the plaintiff's claim, but shall set up a counter-claim amounting to less than the plaintiff's claim, judgment may be had by the plaintiff for the excess of said claim over the said counter-claim, in like manner in any such action, upon the plaintiff's filing with the clerk of the court a statement admitting such *counter-claim, which statement shall be annexed to and be a part of the judgment roll."

The defendant contends that the second paragraph of the above refers only to the action described in the last sentence of the first paragraph as "all other cases," and has no reference to the actions previously described in the same paragraph as "actions for the recovery of money only." We do not think that the words "any such action" in the second paragraph refer only to the class of cases described in the first as "all other cases," but refer to all actions described in the whole of the preceding paragraph, including as well those "for the recovery of money only" as all other actions.

The last paragraph is not merely a continuation of the last sentence of the first, but a separate and distinct provision, giving a remedy in a class of cases where the defendant has put in an answer, which is, at least, as necessary and proper in actions for recovery of money only as in any other. This construction makes intelligible the other words, "in like manner." That is to say, if the action is one for the recovery of money only, then as above described in that case; and if it belongs to the other class, then as above described as to such class. In no other sense can the words "in like manner" have their proper and natural force.

The action in this case was "for money only," and, according to the views taken, the proper course, after the statement admitting the counter-claim was filed, was to proceed for judgment as to the excess over the counter-claim precisely as if, to that extent, there had been no answer. The only question which could arise was whether judgment should be taken by default, as upon a liquidated demand, or upon proper proof, as upon a demand unliquidated. We gather from the case submitted that the action was not upon a note of the party, but upon an account "for the price of goods sold and delivered," and if there had been no answer it would have been necessary to prove the account. But we cannot doubt that the account in excess of the counter-claim, admitted by the defendant's answer, was, at least, a liquidated demand, and established without further proof.

By the code, as it stood before the late general statutes, which *went into effect May 1st, 1882, before this question arose, it seems that in such case, where the defendant had give notice of appearance, he was entitled to eight days' notice of the time and place of application to the court for the relief demanded by the complaint. See sub-division 2 of section 269 of the original code. But in the revised code, now of force, that provision seems to have been omitted, and there is now no such requirement. This would seem to be in accordance with principle, as there was no issue to be tried between the parties as to the excess of the plaintiff's demand over the counter-claim, which was admitted in the answer. And it would seem, also, to be in analogy to another provision of the code, which declares that "When the answer of the defendant expressly, or by not denying, admits part of the plaintiff's claim to be just, the court, on motion, may order such defendant to satisfy that part of the claim, and may enforce the order as it enforces a judgment or provisional remedy." Code, § 265.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

This provision of law as to costs where there is a specification of the particulars complained of in the judgment appealed from, relates only to appeals seeking a modification of the judgment below, and not to appeals which demand a reversal.

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, October, 1882.

*Action by R. J. F. Wall against J. B. Davis, commenced in a trial justice's court, August 2d, 1880. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson and Duncan & Sanders, for appellant.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

July 4th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff having recovered a judgment before a trial justice for the sum of $39.38, defendant gave the following notice of appeal to the Circuit Court: "Please take notice that the defendant appeals from the judgment in the above stated case upon the following grounds: 1. Because the trial justice erred in admitting testimony to vary the terms of the written contract. 2. Because the trial justice erred in allowing a calculation made by a witness to be used by the jury in making up this verdict. 3. Because the verdict of the jury was contrary to the law and the evidence, in that they did not find for the defendant. 4. Because the trial justice had no jurisdiction of the case."

At the trial in the Circuit Court the plaintiff obtained a verdict for $19.57, whereupon the Circuit judge passed the following order: "This action having been tried before me on appeal from a trial justice's court, and the verdict of the jury having been more favorable to the appellant than the judgment of the court below, by an amount exceeding the sum of ten dollars, on motion of Bobo & Carlisle, attorneys for the appellant, ordered that the appellant have leave to enter up judgment for the costs and disbursements of the appeal, to be taxed by the clerk of this court, and that he have leave to issue execution thereon."

From this order the plaintiff appeals on various grounds, but under the view which we take of the fifth and sixth grounds of appeal, the questions presented by the other grounds cannot arise, and, therefore, it will be unnecessary to state or consider them. The fifth ground of appeal is as follows: "Because his Honor erred in allowing any costs and disbursements to the defendant." And the sixth is in the following words:

"Because *the defendant having failed to state in his notice of appeal from the judgment rendered against him in the trial justice's court, in what particular or particulars said judgment should have been more favorable to him, the plaintiff is entitled to costs and disbursements in the action and on the appeal."

The question raised by this appeal involves the construction of the language used in section 373 of the code of 1882, which reads as follows: "Costs shall be allowed to the prevailing party, in judgments rendered on appeal, in all cases, with the following exceptions and limitations: In the notice of appeal the appellant shall state in what particular or particulars he claims the judgment should have been more favorable to him. If he claims that the amount of judgment is less favorable to him than it should have been, he shall state what should have been its amount. Within fifteen days after the service of the notice of appeal the respondent may serve upon the appellant and trial justice an offer, in writing, to allow the judgment to be corrected in any of the particulars mentioned in the notice of appeal. The appellant may, thereupon, and within five days thereafter, file with the trial justice a written acceptance of such offer, who shall thereupon make a minute thereof in his docket, and correct such judgment accordingly; and the same, so corrected, shall stand as his judgment and be enforced accordingly, and any execution which has been issued upon the judgment appealed from shall be amended by the trial justice to correspond with the amended judgment. If such offer be not made, and the judgment in the appellate court be more favorable to the appellant than the judgment of the court below, or if such offer be made and not accepted, and the judgment in the appellate court be more favorable to the appellant than the offer of the respondent, the appellant shall recover costs; provided, however, that the appellant shall not recover costs unless the judgment appealed from shall be reversed on such appeal or be made more favorable to him to the amount of at least ten dollars. If the offer be made and accepted by the appellant, the appellant shall recover all his disbursements on appeal and all his costs in the court below. But the appellant shall not recover costs except as provided in this chapter. The respondent shall be entitled to recover *costs where the appellant is not. Whenever costs are awarded to the appellant, and when the judgment in the suit before the court below was against such appellant, he shall further be allowed to tax the costs incurred by him, which he would have been entitled to recover in case the judgment below had been rendered in his favor. If, upon an appeal, a recovery for any debt or damages be had by one party, and costs be awarded to the other party, the court shall set off such costs against such debt or damages and render judgment for the balance. * * * If the judgment appealed from be reversed in part, and affirmed as to the residue, the amount of costs allowed to either party shall be such sum as the appellate court may award, not exceeding five dollars. If the appeal be dismissed for want of prosecution, as provided by section 366, no costs shall be allowed to either party. In every appeal the trial justice before whom the judgment appealed from was rendered, shall receive sixty cents for his return. If the judgment be reversed for an error of fact in the proceedings, not affecting the merits, costs shall be in the discretion of the court. If, in the notice of appeal, the appellant shall not state in what particular or particulars he claims the judgment should have been more favorable to him, he shall not be entitled to costs unless the judgment appealed from shall be wholly reversed."

We think it plain that the object of this section was to enable one who appeals from a judgment rendered by a trial justice, which he regards as erroneous in one or more particulars, while admitted to be correct in other respects, to take the judgment of an appellate tribunal as to such alleged errors without incurring the costs of the appeal, if the same should prove to be errors, provided he would in his notice of appeal specify the particular or particulars in which he claims the judgment appealed from is erroneous, so that the respondent may, if he desires, consent to the correction of such errors without further costs; or, refusing to do so, that he shall then take the risk of the costs to be incurred in determining the question of the correctness of the judgment in the particulars specified. So that, according to the scheme of the section, the first step is to be taken by the appellant by stating in his notice of appeal "in what particular or *particulars he claims the judgment should have been more favorable to him;" and, unless he does this, the last sentence of the section expressly provides that "he shall not be entitled to costs unless the judgment appealed from shall be wholly reversed."

Inasmuch as the judgment appealed from was not wholly reversed, the practical question is, whether the defendant, who appealed from the judgment of the trial justice, complied with this condition precedent. We have set out in full his notice and grounds of appeal, and it is perfectly manifest that he has nowhere stated "in what particular or particulars the judgment should have been made more favorable to him." The only thing relied upon for this purpose is his third ground of appeal, which is in the following language: "Because the verdict of the jury was contrary to the law and the evidence, in that they did not find for the defendant." This, so far from stating any particular in which the judgment appealed from should have been more favorable to the defendant, could not well have been couched in more general terms. Indeed, as has often been held, an exception or ground of appeal taken for the purpose of an appeal to this court, in such general terms as these, would not be entitled to any consideration as it would not serve to point out the error which the court is asked to correct. But, more than this, we are satisfied that the provision in the section under consideration, for the benefit of one who appeals from the judgment of a trial justice, was only designed to apply where it was sought by the appeal simply to modify the judgment appealed from by correcting it in certain particulars wherein it is claimed to be erroneous, and that it was not designed to apply in a case where the object of the appeal is to reverse the judgment appealed from.

There may, possibly, be good reason for exempting a party from the hazard of costs who, while admitting the justice of the claim brought against him to a certain amount, only desires to protect himself from a judgment for more than he admits to be due, provided he succeeds in making good his claim to such protection; for, in such case, he is really the prevailing party so far as the real points of litigation are concerned; but there is no reason why an appellant should be entitled to an exemption from *costs by simply asserting in general terms that the judgment from which he appeals is wholly erroneous, and should, therefore, be reversed in toto. If he desires to litigate the whole case he must do so upon the same terms that are required of all other parties, and incur the hazard of costs like all other losing parties.

We think, therefore, that under a proper construction of this section of the code, one who appeals from a judgment recovered before a trial justice, must, in order to entitle himself to the benefits of the provisions of this section in respect to costs, state in his notice of appeal the particular or particulars in which he claims that the judgment appealed from should have been more favorable to him, in such a manner as will enable his adversary to offer to have the judgment corrected in the particulars stated; and that a mere statement that the judgment appealed from is wholly erroneous and should be reversed, will not entitle the appellant to the benefits of this section in respect to costs. When the appeal seeks an entire reversal of the judgment appealed from, then "costs shall be allowed to the prevailing party," inasmuch as such an appeal does not fall within the exceptions and limitations provided for in section 373. The defendant, in his notice of appeal from the judgment recovered before the trial justice, having failed, as we have seen, to "state in what particular or particulars he claims the judgment should have been more favorable to him," could not, by the express provision of the section, recover costs, unless the judgment was wholly reversed, which was not done; and, therefore, by another provision of the section, the plaintiff was entitled to recover his costs.

The defendant in his argument here has also attempted to sustain the order appealed from, upon the ground that the Circuit judge had a right to exercise his discretion as to who should pay costs, and that, having done so, this court will not interfere. As to this position, it is quite sufficient to say that is very apparent that the order appealed from did not proceed from the exercise of any discretion on the part of the Circuit judge, but was manifestly based upon what we have seen to be an erroneous construction of the provisions of section 373 of the code of 1882. The question, therefore, whether, in a case like this, *costs are in the discretion of the court, is not before us for decision and we do not propose to pass upon it now.

The judgment of this court is, that the order appealed from be reversed, and the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

LAWRENCE v. GRAMBLING.

(April Term, 1883.)

[1. Execution ⚡326.]

The proceeds of a sale made under a junior judgment is satisfaction pro tanto of an execution then in the sheriff's office issued upon a senior judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 966-973; Dec. Dig. ⚡326.]

[2. Execution ⚡353.]

Where property was sold under a junior execution for an amount sufficient to pay a senior execution, a subsequent payment on the senior execution by the judgment debtor does not raise a presumption that the debtor consented to an application of the proceeds of the sale to the junior execution.

[3. Homestead ⚡109.]

Semble. Money realized by the sheriff from a sale of defendant's property under an execution issued upon a judgment for the purchase-money should be applied to the oldest liens in the sheriff's office, although under them, by reason of the homestead laws, such property could not have been levied and sold.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 173; Dec. Dig. ⚡109.]

[4. Execution ⚡326.]

In the absence of testimony showing defendant's right to a homestead, it cannot be assumed that no application of money was made to an execution because of the homestead exemption laws.

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, March, 1882.

This case, once before on appeal to this court, will be found reported 13 S. C. 120. The case is fully stated in the opinion of this court, but it should be added that the execution issued on the Means judgment had been returned to the clerk's office "at least six years prior to this trial," so that no execution upon that judgment was in the sheriff's office when he made the sale under the McMakin judgment in August, 1877.

Messrs. Duncan & Cleveland, Bobo & Carlisle, for appellant.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

*July 5th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. There were two judgments in the clerk's office for Spartanburg county against the plaintiff, Joseph Lawrence—one known as the "McMakin judgment," and the other as the "Means judgment." The first was for $46.30, and was the senior judgment. It was entered and dated October 28th, 1859. The second was entered on May 9th, 1870. This last was upon a note for $698.87, given to Means in August, 1859. Both of these claims antedated the constitution of 1868. The last was contracted in the purchase of a tract of land by Lawrence (the land now in controversy), and upon the judgment rendered on this note the judge certified that it was for the purchase-money for 551 acres of land, on which Lawrence then resided.

On September 8th, 1871, by virtue of an execution issued on this judgment, the sheriff of Spartanburg county levied upon this land, and on December 4th, 1871, sold the same to J. W. Carlisle for $219, the highest amount bid. This bid was transferred by Carlisle to Lawrence, who paid the same to the sheriff, and Lawrence received titles. At the time of this sale the McMakin judgment, which was older than the Means judgment, was standing open and unsatisfied, but no application of the proceeds of the sale was made to this judgment. Lawrence was in possession and still retained possession, being the purchaser under the transfer of the Carlisle bid to him. Afterwards, to wit, on September 1st, 1875, the sheriff levied on 300 acres of this land, by virtue of an execution issued on the McMakin judgment, and on August 6th, 1877, sold the same to Bobo and Cleveland for $20, which sum was paid to the sheriff; upon which payment the sheriff executed titles to the said Bobo and Cleveland, who conveyed by deed of quitclaim to the defendant, Grambling. On November 5th, 1877, Lawrence paid off the McMakin judgment, the sheriff receipting to him for $117.96, in full, of the balance in the case of McMakin v. Lawrence.

Shortly after this conveyance to Grambling, he began to cut timber from the premises, and this action was commenced by Lawrence for damages. By consent of the parties, however, the *presiding judge, by order, embraced the question of title in the issue as well as damages.

At the trial, some request was made by defendant's attorney that the judge should charge as to certain alleged irregularities in the McMakin judgment, but no exception has been taken as to this matter, the judge having charged generally that the McMakin judgment had been sufficiently proved, with which defendant was satisfied. It will not be necessary, therefore, for this court to consider this question. The defendant further requested the judge to charge: "That the fact that Lawrence paid the balance due on the McMakin judgment after the sale of the land under the Means and junior judgment, raises the presumption that he (Lawrence) consented to the application of the proceeds of said sale in some other way than to the McMakin judgment." The judge, it seems, declined this request, and charged: "That the payment of his bid by Lawrence to the sheriff at the sale under the Means judgment was a satisfaction, in full, of the McMakin judgment, and that said judgment and execution were satisfied and could not afterwards support a sale of the land, and that the jury must find a verdict for the plaintiff for the land in dispute.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, together with damages, in the sum of $500. The defendant appealed upon the following grounds: 1. "Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge the jury: That the payment by the plaintiff of the balance due upon the judgment of Jas. McMakin against plaintiff was a satisfaction of the act of the sheriff, and validated the sale of plaintiff's land under said judgment and execution. 2. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the sale of plaintiff's land under the Means judgment and execution was a satisfaction in full of the McMakin judgment, and that said last judgment and execution were void and could not support a sale of plaintiff's land. 3. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that from all the evidence it was their duty to render a verdict for the plaintiff."

It will be seen at once that the only question in the case is whether the judge erred in holding as matter of law under the facts, about which there was no dispute, that the sale of the land *under the Means judgment satisfied the McMakin judgment. If there was no error in this, then it followed, as matter of law, that the plaintiff was entitled to the verdict, and the judge was right in directing the jury to render a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant bought under and claimed through the McMakin judgment, and if, in law that had been already satisfied, the sale by the sheriff thereunder was a nullity, and, of-course, his deed conveyed no title.

Now, it will be conceded, as a general proposition, that where there are two or more judgments against a common debtor, of different dates, and his property, or any portion thereof, is sold by the sheriff under execution issued upon any of said judgments, that the proceeds of such sale amount to a satisfaction of the oldest judgment pro tanto, whatever may be the application by the sheriff. The authorities are abundant to this point. Lynch v. Hanahan, 9 Rich. 186; Davis v. Barkley, 1 Bailey 140; Davis v. Hunt, 2 Bailey 416; Furman v. Christie, 3 Rich. 1; O'Neill v. Lusk, 1 Bailey 220.

This general proposition is not contested by the appellant, but it is insisted that there are exceptions to this rule, and the appellant contends that while it is true that the senior judgment creditor has the legal right to have such proceeds applied to his judgment in preference to all others, yet that this right may be waived, and when this is done, either by word or act, the application may be made by the sheriff to junior judgments, leaving the senior open and still of force. And it is urged that such waiver was made here. As far as we can see from the brief, the question of waiver generally was not made below.

The defendant relied upon one fact, viz.: the payment by Lawrence of the McMakin judgment after the sale of the land under the Means judgment, as raising a presumption that he had consented to the application of the proceeds of that sale otherwise than to the McMakin judgment—in other words, that he thereby recognized that the McMakin judgment had not been satisfied by that sale, and he requested the judge to charge as law that such should be the legal inference. This fact relied on by the defendant was not contested; it was admitted, and, therefore, in determining the question of law raised by the appel*lant as springing from it, it was wholly unnecessary for the judge to submit it to the jury as a question of fact. The appellant claimed that, admitting the fact to be true, the judge should charge that in law it raised the presumption that Lawrence had consented to the postponement of the McMakin judgment, and therefore, that it was open and valid when the sale to Bobo and Cleveland took place. This the judge declined, and we see no error in this, as we know of no principle of law which would have authorized him thus to charge. So, the question comes back whether, under the facts as admitted, the judge erred in applying the general rule, viz.: that the proceeds of sale by the sheriff must go to the senior judgment.

It is urged that at the time of the sale under the Means judgment, the case of In re Kennedy [2 S. C. 216] had not been overruled, and inasmuch as in that case the Supreme Court of this State had held that the homestead exemption of the constitution of 1868 applied as well to debts antedating the constitution as to those subsequently contracted, and inasmuch as the debt to Means was a debt contracted in the purchase of the land, which in the constitution itself was excepted from the homestead provision, that the land could only have been sold under the Means judgment and the proceeds only have been applied thereto. It may be admitted, for the sake of the argument, that as long as In re Kennedy remained undisturbed, the McMakin judgment could not have been enforced by the sheriff against the homestead of Lawrence, and yet it would not follow that the proceeds of the sale arising from the enforcement of a judgment which could effect a sale would demand a different application than that required by the well-established principle referred to above, viz.: to the senior judgment first.

The homestead provisions do not undertake to extinguish the claim of creditors against their debtors, either in whole or in part, nor do they create any new estate in the debtor. They merely prevent a sale of a certain portion of the debtor's property by mesne or final process. They stay the hands of the sheriff or other officer of the law, but this is all. The lien of judgments is not disturbed, nor is any preference given to creditors beyond *that which their own vigilance may secure. Whether a certain judgment can be enforced against the homestead of a debtor is a very different question from that arising upon the application of the proceeds of such homestead when brought into the office by a sale under an execution authorizing the sale.

But it is unnecessary to decide this question in this case, because it does not appear that the homestead was involved. It is true it does appear that the note to Means, upon which his judgment was founded, was given for the land in controversy. But it does not appear that it was sold under that judgment because of that fact. There may have been other reasons, for aught that appears in the case, why Lawrence could not have claimed a homestead as to either of the judgments against him. We cannot assume that he was the head of a family and otherwise entitled under the constitution to the homestead exemption.

All that appears in the case is, that there were two judgments in the office against him, one junior to the other; upon which last the judge had certified that it was founded on a note given for the land then in the possession of Lawrence; but it does not appear, except by inference, that he had no other lands, or that he could otherwise claim a homestead out of this. It further appears, that the land was sold under the junior judgment, and that the proceeds were sufficient in amount to discharge the senior judgment. Under these facts we think the Circuit judge was correct in applying the general rule, and in holding that the McMakin judgment should be regarded as paid, and consequently that the subsequent sale thereunder was void.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit court be affirmed.

GREEN v. BOOKHART.

[1. Execution ⚡420.]

Judgment was obtained against two defendants, one of whom resided in another county. Upon execution returned unsatisfied in the county of the judgment, the judge granted an order in supplementary proceedings for the appearance in that court of the absent debtor, who appeared without objection and was examined, and an order was then passed appointing a receiver. Held, that such debtor had thereby waived his right to an examination in his own county, nor could he afterwards object to the appointment of the receiver upon the ground that no execution had there issued.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Union Bank v. Northrop, 19 S. C. 475.]

[2. Receivers ⚡59.]

And in action by this receiver to recover from a third person property belonging to the judgment debtor, such defendant cannot interpose these irregularities as an objection to the appointment of the receiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 103; Dec. Dig. ⚡59.]

[3. Execution ⚡407.]

Although the application for the appointment of receiver was made under subdivision 1 of section 312 of the code, the order might be granted under subdivision 2 of that section, if the facts appearing justified it, and under subdivision 2 the issue of execution is not a prerequisite to such appointment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1160; Dec. Dig. ⚡407.]

Before Kershaw, J., Richland, November, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. A. J. Green, for plaintiff.

Mr. J. M. McMaster, contra.

July 5th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This was an action brought by the plaintiff, as receiver of the property of S. W. Bookhart, for the possession of a note for $650, belonging, as alleged, to the said S. W. Bookhart, and in his possession or that of Cynthia W. Bookhart, having been executed to the said S. W. Bookhart by A. G. Bookman and Mrs. M. A. Holmes about October, 1880. The defendants are man and wife, and reside in Fairfield county, where the action was originally brought, but was transferred to Richland county. They answered separately, simply denying each and every allegation of the complaint.

It appeared that in May, 1879, Jones, Davis & Bouknight recovered in Richland county a judgment against the said S. W. Bookhart and one Thomas W. Entzminger, as signers of a joint and several note, the latter of whom was a resident of Richland county, and entered judgment and issued execution against both in that county. Upon the return of the execution unsatisfied the judgment creditor, in July, 1879, instituted supplementary proceedings against both the defendants in execution, who were served with an order to appear and answer concerning their property at Columbia, Richland county, where the judgment was entered and the execution returned. S. W. Bookhart appeared and was examined. He denied that he owned any property not exempt by law; but another witness (A. G. Bookman) testified that he, with M. A. Holmes, were indebted to the said S. W. Bookhart on the note for $650, before referred to. Whereupon Judge Wallace appointed the plaintiff, Allen J. Green, receiver, and ordered S. W. Bookhart to turn over to him the said note. A copy of this order was served on Bookhart and he again appeared and made affidavit "that he is not owner of the note of A. G. Bookman and Mrs. Holmes, and has never been such; that all of his doings in reference to said note were had as agent of his wife, Cynthia E. Bookhart." There was no appeal from the order appointing the receiver in Richland county or proceedings instituted to set it aside.

At the argument here it was admitted that there was some evidence tending to show that the said note was given to S. A. Bookhart but was in the possession of and claimed by Mrs. Cynthia E. Bookhart. At the close of plaintiff's testimony the defendant moved for a non-suit on the ground "that, inasmuch as it appeared from the record in the case of Jones, Davis & Bouknight v. S. W. Bookhart and Thomas W. Entzminger, that the execution had been issued to and returned, unsatisfied by the sheriff of Richland county while the defendant Bookhart lived in Fairfield county, Judge Wallace had no jurisdiction in supplementary proceedings against said Bookhart, and that the appointment of the plaintiff as receiver was void, and he, not being legally appointed receiver, or the real party in interest, could not maintain the action."

The Circuit judge granted the non-suit as to Cynthia E. Bookhart but refused it as to S. W. Bookhart. Both plaintiff and defendant S. W. Bookhart appeal to this court, the plaintiff upon the ground that the judge erred in granting the non-suit as to Cynthia E. Bookhart, and the defendant upon the ground that the non-suit should have been granted as to both defendants.

The judgment of Jones, Davis & Bouknight, under which the supplementary proceedings were instituted, was obtained and the execution issued regularly in Richland county against S. W. *Bookhart as well as Entzminger, although the former lived in Fairfield. "If there be more than one defendant, then the action may be tried in any county in which one or more of the defendants reside." Code, § 146. In this view it was urged for the plaintiff that Richland county was the proper place for all proceedings which took place in the case; that the judgment and execution, properly entered in Richland, carried with them all proceedings based upon them, and there are cases in the New York practice, under a similar provision as to supplementary proceedings, which look that way. In Wait's Anno. Code, p. 573, note, it is said: "The issuing of an execution, the supplementary proceedings and the appointment of a receiver are proceedings in the action (not special proceedings), and where the court has authority to award an execution, jurisdiction to appoint a receiver in supplementary proceedings is also conferred." Wegman v. Childs, 41 N. Y. 159, and other authorities.

But subdivision 1 of section 312 of the code does not seem to make provision for such a case. The words are very explicit: "When an execution against property of the judgment debtor, or any one of several debtors in the same judgment, issued to the sheriff of the county where he resides or has his place of business, * * * is returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, the judgment creditor, at any time after such return made, is entitled to an order from the judge of the Circuit Court, requiring such judgment debtor to appear and answer concerning his property, before such judge, at a time and place specified in the order, within the county in which the execution was issued," &c.

Here the execution was "issued" in Richland county, but we suppose that, under the above provision, the regular course would have been to issue an execution against S. W. Bookhart in Fairfield county and had it returned by the sheriff of that county. If so, S. W. Bookhart might have objected when the application was made in Richland that the execution should have issued to Fairfield county, and he could not be required to answer elsewhere. But, when summoned to Columbia, in Richland county, he made no objection. He appeared and was there examined, and upon such examination the judge appointed the plaintiff receiver, and from that order there was no appeal.

*It seems to us that it is now too late for him to object. The provision seems to have been intended for the protection of the defendant in execution, that he might not be required to answer out of his county, or until the creditor had exhausted his remedy by execution. It was a right personal to him, and when he chose to waive it and to appear and answer in another county, he could not afterwards make the objection. "When a judgment debtor appears before a referee and submits to an examination without objection, this will amount to a waiver of any irregularity, and an order for the appointment of a receiver founded on such voluntary appearance and waiver will be valid, and cannot be affected by an objection to the jurisdiction in an action brought by the receiver." Viburt v. Frost, 3 Abb. 119; Bingham v. Disbrow, 37 Barb. 24; S. C., 14 Abb. 251; Wait's Anno. Code, p. 575, and authorities in note; Ridd. Sup. Pro. (2d edit.) 25. We think there was no error on the part of the judge in refusing the motion for a non-suit as to S. W. Bookhart.

It is insisted, however, that the judge was also right in granting the non-suit as to Cynthia E. Bookhart; that she was no party either to the judgment or the supplementary proceedings, and the doctrine of waiver or estoppel could in no way be applied to her; and that when sued by the receiver for property of the debtor, she had the right to defend herself by showing that he had not been legally appointed receiver. It is true she was not a party to the proceedings in which the plaintiff was appointed receiver, and for that very reason she could not object to his title in an action brought by him as such. When the debtor has waived an irregularity, a third party cannot avail himself of it." Riddle 213. The plaintiff presented his commission as receiver appointed by a judge who had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and entitled to make the appointment. There was a presumption that the appointment was rightly made, at least until the contrary appeared, and she had not the right to attack it for irregularities in a collateral manner. The proper way to make that question was upon motion to set aside the proceedings. "A third person, when sued, cannot object to the *regularity of the receiver's appointment when the judgment debtor has waived the objection; nor can he object to an irregularity in the return of the execution." Supplement to Ridd. Sup. Pro. 138 and 193, and authorities; Wait's Anno. Code 563 and 575.

If the defendant Cynthia, in an action against her, had the right to show that the appointment of the receiver was without jurisdiction and absolutely void, we do not think that the omission to have an execution issued to the sheriff of Fairfield county and returned by him, especially after the waiver of that privilege by the defendant in execution himself, was a jurisdictional defect or amounted to more than a mere irregularity, if that. Riddle 33. In the case of Viburt v. Frost, supra, it was said by Mr. Justice Duer that, "If the original order for the debtor's appearance was a nullity, he was not bound to appear; nor was he bound, when he appeared, to submit to an examination. His appearance and submission to an examination must, therefore, be regarded as voluntary acts, and it cannot be reasonably doubted that a valid order for the appointment of a receiver may be founded upon a voluntary appearance and examination of a judgment debtor."

Besides, we see no good reason why the order of Judge Wallace appointing the receiver, may not be referred to sub-division 2 of section 312 of the code, which does not require as preliminary to the order that there should be any "return of the execution." It is in these words: "After the issuing of an execution against property, and upon proof by affidavit of a party or otherwise, to the satisfaction of the court or judge thereof, that any judgment debtor has property which he unjustly refuses to apply towards the satisfaction of the judgment, such court or judge may by an order require the judgment debtor to appear at a specified time and place to answer concerning the same; and such proceedings may thereupon be had for the application of the property of the judgment debtor towards the satisfaction of the judgment as are provided upon the return of an execution." It cannot be doubted that the proceedings here referred to as "upon the return of an execution," include, *when necessary, the appointment of a receiver. It is well supported, both by reason and authority, that the remedies provided by the different sections of the code as to the appointment of receiver, are concurrent and cumulative.

"There is no incompatibility between the remedies afforded by the different sections of the code as to the appointment of receivers. They are granted on different states of fact." Heroy v. Gibson, 10 Bos. 591; Wait's Anno. Code 574.

It is true that the affidavit upon which the supplementary proceedings in this case were initiated, stated that "the execution had been issued and returned unsatisfied," indicating possibly that the application was made under subdivision 1 of section 312 of the code. Upon this affidavit, however, the judgment debtors were summoned to answer and witnesses to testify, and there appeared, as to S. W. Bookhart, the identical state of facts which authorize proceedings under subdivision 2 of said section of the code. It was shown that the execution had been "issued." There was at least prima facie "proof" that the judgment debtor had property (the note) which he unjustly refused to apply towards the satisfaction of this judgment, claiming that it belonged to his wife, which brought the case within the very terms of subdivision 2 aforesaid.

Under these circumstances, if it were necessary, we do not see why the fact that the proceedings were originally instituted under subdivision 1, should have excluded Judge Wallace from basing his order for the appointment of a receiver, upon the authority of subdivision 2, when the facts as proved authorized it. It seems that this very point has been decided in New York. "The second subdivision of section 292 (312 of our code) provides that the same proceedings may be had as for the application of the property of the judgment debtor towards the satisfaction of the judgment, as are provided upon the return of an execution. This would authorize the appointment of a receiver if necessary; and I think sufficient appeared from the defendant's examination to warrant the order made." Union Bank of Troy v. Sargeant, 35 How. Pr. 87.

The judgment of this court is, that so much of the judgment of the Circuit Court as granted the non-suit as to the defendant *Cynthia E. Bookhart, be reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred. Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred in the result.

UNION BANK v. NORTHROP.

(April Term, 1883.)

[1. Execution  420.]

A judgment debtor has the right in supplementary proceedings, under subdivision 1 of section 312 of the code, to have his examination conducted in his own county, but this right he may waive, and does waive, by submitting, without protest, a written statement which is accepted by the plaintiff as a sufficient compliance with the order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1205; Dec. Dig. ⚡420.]

[2. Exemptions ⚡3.]

Prior to the amendment of 1880, the constitution did not exempt money from seizure for the payment of debts.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Norton v. Bradham, 21 S. C. 384; Gray, Sullivan & Gray v. Putnam, 51 S. C. 100, 28 S. E. 149; Ex parte Goldsmith, 68 S. C. 539, 47 S. E. 984.

For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. §§ 2, 3; Dec. Dig. ⚡3.]

[3. Exemptions ⚡48.]

An order for examination of a judgment debtor was passed in supplementary proceedings eighteen months after the termination of a litigation in which such debtor was attorney, and while the amount of his fee was under reference. During the next month the amount of the fee was fixed by the court, and five months afterwards the order in the supplementary proceedings required such fee to be paid over to the judgment creditor. Held, that this fee was not an earning of the debtor within sixty days next preceding the order, and, therefore, exempt under section 317 of the code.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. §§ 64, 72; Dec. Dig. ⚡48.]

[4. Execution ⚡367.]

This fee was due by a corporation which was in the hands of a receiver, who, upon obtaining his discharge, turned it over to the master of the court. Held, that this money might be reached under supplementary proceedings and ordered to be paid to the judgment creditor.

Before Wallace, J., Richland, May, 1882. The opinion states the case.

Mr. R. A. Lynch, for appellant.

Mr. W. S. Monteith, contra.

July 7th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On June 28th, 1878, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendants in Richland county for $515.56. It does not appear in the "Case," but, from the argument in this court, we infer that the judgment was rendered on a cause of action older than the constitution; but, be that as it may, it is clear that the exemption of the fund here in question could not be claimed under the homestead law then of force, as it was not of that character of personal property which the constitution then exempted.

L. C. Northrop resides in Charleston, and an execution was issued against him in that county and returned unsatisfied. Whereupon, in November, 1881, the plaintiff instituted supplementary proceedings against him in Richland county. He was required by an order of Judge Cothran "to appear in Columbia before N. B. Barnwell, Esq., master of Richland county, on November 21st, 1881, and answer concerning any property he may have." Northrop did not make the objection that he could not be required to answer out of his own county, but proposed to answer by written statement, which was allowed. He filed his statement before the master of Richland county, who reported the facts as follows:

"During the year 1880, L. C. Northrop, as district attorney of the United States for the State of South Carolina, filed a petition In re Jas. S. Gilbes et al. v. Greenville & Columbia Railroad Company, for taxes due by the said company to the government of the United States. The receiver of that company resisted the claim, but it was compromised by paying to the government $500, and whatever should be a proper fee for Mr. Northrop, as attorney. On April 9th, 1880, it was referred to the master to ascertain what would be a proper fee, who recommended $200, and his report was confirmed and the money ordered to be paid to Mr. Northrop, December 15th, 1881. At the time Northrop answered in the supplementary proceedings he filed a petition setting forth that he was a citizen of the State and the head of a family, and claiming homestead; that he was not worth $300 in personal property, and that he was very much dependent upon the said fee of $200 for the support of a large and helpless family, and he prayed that it might be paid out to him."

The matter was heard by Judge Wallace, who disallowed the *claim of homestead, and directed that the fee of $200 in the hands of the master, belonging to the defendant, L. C. Northrop, should be applied towards the satisfaction of the judgment. From this order the appeal comes to this court upon the following exceptions: "1. Because his Honor, W. H. Wallace, had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, L. C. Northrop. 2. Because his Honor, W. H. Wallace, had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter in this action, it being a fund in the custody of the court, and otherwise exempt from process."

As to the first exception. There is no doubt that in supplementary proceedings, under subdivision 1 of section 312 of the code, the defendant in execution has the right to insist on being examined in the county where he resides or has an office. This right extends no further than the examination, and was given, probably, to relieve him from the inconvenience of being dragged to another county, possibly in a distant part of the State. But this is a personal privilege given to him, and, if he chooses, he may waive it. Green v. Bookhart, ante p. 466, lately decided by this court. In that case it is said that "The provision seems to have been intended for the protection of the defendant in execution, that he might not be required to answer out of his county. It is a right personal to him alone, and when he chose to waive it, and to appear and answer in another county, he could not afterwards make the objection."

Mr. Riddle, in his late work on Supplementary Proceedings, lays down the rule as to what is a jurisdictional defect, and what a mere irregularity, in these terms: "An objection on the ground of irregularity in the proceedings, to be valid, must be taken at the earliest possible opportunity, that is, when the exercise of jurisdiction is first claimed by the officer. If not taken then it is deemed to be waived. The question upon this point in any of these proceedings is: Would the court or judge have had jurisdiction to grant the order or warrant, provided all the necessary existing facts had been properly brought before him at the time, or to proceed in the matter in controversy if it had duly come before him, as it could have come? and did the debtor or adverse party fail to object to the irregularity complained of in due season? If both questions are affirmatively answered, the error is *but an irregularity and has been waived, and the proceedings are regular." Riddle (2d edit.) 213. There is no doubt that both questions must be answered in the affirmative in this case, and, therefore, after the waiver the proceedings were regular.

Under the second exception several exceptions urged against applying the fee to the judgment: First, it is claimed that the defendant, Northrop, is entitled to the fee as homestead, or as within the exemption of $500 of personal property, allowed by the constitution; but, as before indicated, the money fee did not come within the class of articles exempted by the constitution before the amendment of 1880, and, therefore, homestead or exemption against it cannot be allowed in this case.

Second, it is then insisted that if defendant is not entitled to have this fee exempted as technical homestead, he is entitled to the benefit of section 317 of the code, which gives authority to the judge to have applied towards satisfaction of judgments all property and money of the defendant in execution, "except that the earnings of the debtor for his personal services, at any time within sixty days next preceding the order, cannot be applied where it is made to appear by the debtor's affidavit, or otherwise, that such earnings are necessary for the use of a family supported wholly or partly by his labor." The showing was sufficient that the fee aforesaid was due for the personal services of the defendant in execution, and, also, that such earnings are necessary for the use of a large and helpless family; but we cannot hold that it was "earnings within sixty days next preceding the order."

Even if "the order" here referred to was the order for examination in supplementary proceedings, granted by Judge Cothran, November 7th, 1881, we could not say that the fee was earned within the sixty days next preceding that time, for the reason that the court had already referred it to the master to report what fee should be allowed L. C. Northrop for his professional services as far back as April 9th, 1880. But, according to the New York construction of a provision identical with ours, the words "within sixty days next preceding" the order have reference to the order directing the money to be applied toward the satisfaction of the judgment. That order, in this case, was made by Judge Wallace on May 9th, 1882, more than four months after the final order of court allowing the fee, viz., December 15th, 1881. "Only such earnings are exempted as have been earned within sixty days previous to the date of the order requiring such earnings to be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment, and not those that may have been earned within sixty days previous to the service of the order for examination. Bush v. White, 12 Abb. 21; Wait's Anno. Code 571 and notes.

Third, it is said that the money, being in the hands of the master, is in the custody of the court itself, and could not be reached by these proceedings. This money was in the hands of James Conner, receiver of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, who owed it to the defendant, Northrop, and in whose favor it had been adjudged. When the receiver was discharged, pending the litigation, the money was deposited with the master as matter of convenience, and, for the purposes of this case, must be considered as still in the hands of the receiver as a debtor of Northrop. There is no attachment here seeking a lien, but the question is simply as to the proper application of the money under supplementary proceedings. We think it a mistake to suppose that the money is in custodia legis in such sense as not to be subject to the order of the court.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

July 11th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff brings this action for the purpose of setting aside a certain deed upon the ground of *fraud. The circumstances out of which the alleged fraud arises are as follows: In 1869, one A. C. Fuller, suing for the use of the plaintiff, commenced an action on a note against Hogan Motes, the father of the defendant, Sarah A. Mounce, in which judgment was not obtained until May 28th, 1875, when an execution was issued thereon and returned unsatisfied. Whilst said action was pending, to wit, on November 7th, 1870, a valuable tract of land belonging to Hogan Motes, containing 500 acres, was sold by the sheriff under an execution against said Motes, and bid off by the defendant S. A. Mounce, for the sum of $700. The sheriff's deed to said S. A. Mounce for said land bears date November 7th, 1870, but it was not recorded until May 8th, 1879. On November 15th, 1879, S. A. Mounce executed a mortgage on said tract of land to the defendant E. H. Frost, to secure debts due to the firm of E. H. Frost & Co., as well by the said Hogan Motes as by the said S. A. Mounce.

On November 6th, 1880, the present action was commenced against S. A. Mounce and E. H. Frost & Co., by which the plaintiff seeks to have the alleged deed from the sheriff to the defendant S. A. Mounce, set aside upon the ground that the purchase-money was furnished by Hogan Motes, and the title taken in her name with a view to defeat the creditors of said Hogan Motes. The answer of S. A. Mounce denies all the allegations of fraud and also sets up the plea of the statute of limitations. The answer of E. H. Frost & Co. does not appear in the "Case," as they do not seem to have appealed from the judgment of the Circuit Court.

The issues of law and fact were referred to the master for trial, and he found as matter of fact that the money with which the bid of S. A. Mounce for the land in question was paid, was furnished by Hogan Motes, who said that this arrangement, which he characterized as "sham work," was made because he was largely involved as surety and desired to secure a home for himself and his daughter; and as matter of law the master found that the sheriff's deed to S. A. Mounce should be set aside as fraudulent and void, and that the land should be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the costs of this action, and to the judgment of this plaintiff against the said Hogan

Motes, *and any other judgments which may have become liens prior to the execution of the bond and mortgage to E. H. Frost, if there be any such, and then to the payment of said mortgage debt to E. H. Frost. The master also found as matter of law that the statute of limitations was not a bar to the action because it did not appear that the alleged fraud had been discovered more than six years before the commencement of this action. To this report the defendants excepted, alleging errors both in the findings of fact and in the conclusions of law, and also upon the ground that the master erred in holding that the declarations of Hogan Motes, made after the date of the deed from the sheriff, though while he continued in possession of the land, were competent evidence against the defendants in this case. The Circuit judge overruled all the exceptions and confirmed the report of the master, and the defendant S. A. Mounce appealed upon the same grounds upon which the exceptions to the master's report were based.

This appeal, therefore, raises three questions: 1. As to the competency of the declarations of Hogan Motes; 2. As to the findings of fact on the question of fraud; 3. As to the statute of limitations.

Since the case of McCord v. McCord, 3 S. C. 577, supported as it is by the authorities cited in the argument of that case, as well as in the argument here, there cannot be any doubt as to the first question, and that there was no error in receiving the declarations of Hogan Motes, made while he continued in possession of the land, after the alleged sale to the defendant S. A. Mounce, for the purpose of showing fraud in the pretended sale. It is true that the appellant has, in the argument here, denied that the possession of Hogan Motes continued after the sale the same as before, and, on the contrary, contended that, according to the evidence, after the sale he was in possession only as the tenant of his daughter. But this is a question of fact, and it has been found otherwise by the master upon testimony which is certainly sufficient to support such a finding, and, having been concurred in by the Circuit judge, it is binding upon us.

Again, it will be observed that it is not declarations alone of Hogan Motes which are relied upon, but his acts accompanying *such declarations, such as offering to sell a portion of the land, saying: "He could give as good titles as there was in the State," and his continuing in the use and control of the land after the sale just as before.

The fact that in this case the sale was not a voluntary private sale, as in McCord v. McCord, but was a public sale made by the sheriff, can make no difference as far as this point is concerned. As is said in Bump Fraud. Conv. 256: "If a debtor, for instance, at a public sale under a mortgage or execution, advances the money with which another purchases the property, there is no sale against the creditors. * * * In such cases there is no distinction between a conveyance directly from the debtor and one from the sheriff or other public officer. In reality, the conveyance is from the debtor through the sheriff or other public officer." The same rule applies to a purchaser at a sheriff's sale who allows the judgment debtor to remain in possession, as was applied in McCord v. McCord, where the vendee at a private sale allowed his vendor to retain possession, for, in the former case, the purchaser, in reality, buys from the judgment debtor through the agency of the sheriff.

If these declarations of Hogan Motes were, as we have seen, competent evidence in this case, then certainly there is no ground upon which we could, under the well-settled rule, disturb the findings of fact in the court below; for, there is not only testimony sufficient to support such findings, but we think the weight of the evidence is decidedly in favor of the conclusions reached by the master and by the Circuit judge.

It has been argued, however, by the counsel for appellant, with much force, that the effect of retention of possession by the vendor is not the same where the parties occupy the position of father and daughter, as it would be in ordinary cases. Some of the cases cited by counsel do seem to look that way, though all of them, except Howard v. Williams, 1 Bailey 575 [21 Am. Dec. 483], limit the proposition to cases where the child is an infant living with the parent; for there, as is said in Kid v. Mitchell, 1 N. & McC. 339 [9 Am. Dec. 702], the possession by the father is in accordance with the terms of the deed which purports to transfer the property, inasmuch *as the father, as natural guardian of the child, would be regarded as holding the possession merely as the representative of the infant. These cases were, however, reviewed in the case of Farr v. Sims, Rich. Eq. Cas. 135 [24 Am. Dec. 396], and the doctrine which they announce was very much shaken, if not overthrown.

But this question is not really involved in the present case. Here, the allegation is that the property of the judgment debtor, though bid off at the sheriff's sale by the defendant S. A. Mounce, was actually paid for with the money of the debtor, Hogan Motes; and this allegation is fully sustained by the testimony, to say nothing of the very significant circumstance that although it is denied in her answer, it is not denied when she went upon the stand as a witness subject to cross-examination. There was, therefore, a resulting trust in favor of Hogan Motes, which his creditors have a right to subject to the payment of his debts. Brown v. McDonald, 1 Hill Eq. 305-6.

The only remaining question is whether the action was barred by the statute of limitations. Since the decision in Suber v.

Chandler, 18 S. C. 526, there can be no doubt upon this question, as the action was commenced within six years after the judgment at law was obtained. Aside from this, however, the statute, according to code of 1882, section 112, did not commence to run until "the discovery * * * of the facts constituting the fraud." In the complaint the plaintiff alleges that the knowledge of the fraud came to him within six years next preceding the commencement of the action, and there is no testimony showing that the plaintiff had any knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud, or that he was in possession of any clue which, if properly pursued, would have led to a knowledge of such facts, more than six years before this action was commenced, and in the absence of such testimony the plea of the statute cannot be sustained. Shannon v. White, 6 Rich. Eq. 101 [60 Am. Dec. 115]; Beattie v. Pool, 13 S. C. 384. The plaintiff, doubtless, knew of the sale, and of the continued possession by the judgment debtor, but that was not information of the facts constituting the fraud. The furnishing the money by Hogan Motes, with which the appellant made the purchase, was the important fact constituting the fraud, and when that fact first came to the *knowledge of the plaintiff does not appear, and the burden of showing it was upon the appellant.

The sale having been a public sale, the retention of possession by the real vendor, Hogan Motes, was not a circumstance as well calculated to arrest attention and excite suspicion, as if it had been a voluntary private sale, (Guignard v. Aldrich & Harley, 10 Rich. Eq. 262,) and there does not appear to be any other fact tending to show fraud except the fact that the means of making the purchase were furnished by Hogan Motes for the avowed purpose of securing a home for himself and his daughter which would be exempt from the claims of his creditors, and as we have said, it does not appear when this fact first came to the knowledge of the plaintiff, or when he first acquired such information as, if properly pursued, would have led to the discovery of such fact. It is plain, therefore, that the plea of the statute could not be sustained.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Lexington, June, 1882.

This was an action by Enoch Hendrix against M. D. Harman for the recovery of a watch, commenced February 9th, 1876. The defendant denied that he had plaintiff's watch, but said he did hold a watch, which plaintiff claimed, for the benefit and as the property of defendant's son, to whom it had been given by Reuben Harman, the grandfather, prior to his death. The referee's finding was, "that R. Harman claimed and owned *the watch, and before his death gave it to Charlie, an infant son of this defendant." The Circuit judge says the watch was delivered by Hendrix to R. Harman, "as a pawn to secure the amount, * * * to be paid in sixty days, with interest at the rate of one and one-half per cent. a month, and if not then paid the watch was to become the property of Reuben Harman." Messrs. Boozer & Graham, for appellant.

*484

Mr. H. A. Meetze, contra.

July 3d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The complaint in this case alleges that the defendant had become possessed of, and wrongfully detained from the plaintiff, appellant, a gold watch of the value of $125, and plaintiff demands judgment for the recovery of the watch, and damages to the amount of $200 for its detention. The case was referred to a referee to take the testimony, and report his conclusions of law and fact. After a final report by the referee the case came to a hearing before Judge Witherspoon, who, on August 15th, 1882, pronounced judgment, dismissing the complaint with costs. From this judgment this appeal has been taken upon several grounds, which will be considered below as far as may be necessary.

The facts of the case, as found by the Circuit judge and the referee, are as follows: "1. That on December 15th, 1872, one Reuben Harman, since deceased, paid for the plaintiff, at his instance and request, $45.25, and plaintiff consented to the transfer of the watch in question to Harman, to be held by him to secure the payment of said sum and interest from December 15th, 1872; that said sum and interest still remains due and owing by plaintiff. 2. That Reuben Harman died intestate during the summer of 1874, and held the watch at the time of his death, subject to the payments by plaintiff of the indebtedness aforesaid: that there is no legal representative of Reuben Harman, deceased."

The conclusions of law were: "1. That

Reuben Harman at the time of his death held the watch in controversy under a lien, with plaintiff's knowledge and consent, to secure the payment of $45.25, with interest from December 15th, 1872; that said lien still exists and that plaintiff is not entitled to recover the possession of said watch in this action." Upon this finding he ordered and adjudged that plaintiff's complaint be dismissed with costs.

The plaintiff has appealed upon fourteen exceptions, the greater number of which assign error to the findings of fact by the Circuit judge. As to these, without considering them seriatim, it is only necessary to say that this case is a case at law, although tried by a judge with the aid of a referee; and being a case at law, the facts are beyond our jurisdiction. It is only in chancery cases that we can take cognizance of the facts, and it is only in such cases that the rule referred to by appellant's counsel applies. In cases at law our jurisdiction is confined to errors of law applicable to the facts as found by the jury or the judge, as the case may be. The facts thus found we must take as absolute verity. This is a provision of the constitution itself and is controlling.

Assuming the facts, then, as found by the Circuit judge to be true, was there error in his holding as matter of law that the lien of Reuben Harman, imposed by the plaintiff, still existed, and that plaintiff was not entitled to recover possession in this action? We see no error in this. Assuredly, if the watch was placed in the possession of Harman, as a pledge or pawn, as found by the judge, to secure the payment of plaintiff's indebtedness to Harman, this created a lien in favor of Harman, and if, by contract, this state of things was to continue until Harman was refunded the amount advanced by him for the plaintiff, the lien, as matter of law, would continue to exist also.

This being so, it would follow, also, as matter of law, that so long as the lien existed plaintiff had no cause of action entitling him to recover the possession. He had parted with the watch with the express understanding and condition that he was not to retake it until he paid the amount due Harman. This was not illegal, nor is there any allegation that he was seduced into this agreement, or that any fraudulent devise was practiced upon him in any way. It was a plain voluntary contract entered into and executed by him upon a sufficient consideration, and we can see no reason whatever why he should be released from it without complying with the terms agreed upon.

We do not find that the Circuit judge ruled that plaintiff could not recover upon payment of the amount for which the watch was pledged. The plaintiff seems to have contended that he had paid Harman. This was, however, a question of fact, and the judge found the other way, and there being no tender or offer of payment during the trial, the judge made no ruling as to the rights of the parties in that event. The exception involving a question as to such facts is, therefore, inapplicable.

Nor do we see that the Circuit judge allowed any counterclaim of the defendant; on the contrary, the complaint was simply dismissed because the plaintiff failed to make out his case.

Neither is there anything found in the argument as to the exception involving the admission of incompetent testimony. We suppose, therefore, that this exception was abandoned, but whether this be so or not, there was no sufficient reason to have the testimony of the two Harmans ruled out on the ground of irrelevancy or upon any other ground, so far as we have been able to discover.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Witherspoon, J., Newberry, February, 1883.

Action by A. J. Kilgore against J. S. Hair, commenced in February, 1883. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Y. J. Pope, for appellant.

*Messrs. Moorman & Simkins, contra.

July 3d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This was an action to recover possession of a tract of land situate in Newberry county, as well as damages for its detention. A judgment enjoining the defendant from any further use or occupancy of the land, and for the appointment of a receiver, is also demanded.

The trial of the cause upon its merit has not been had, but an order has been obtained at chambers from Judge Witherspoon, after notice that an application would be made to him "for the appointment of a receiver to take possession of the property described, and to manage the same according to law," directing Silas Johnstone, the master for Newberry county, to rent the land for the present year to the highest bidder for cash, and in case that the matters in dispute shall not be finally adjudicated by the end of this year, then to rent the land for the year 1884 upon the same terms; and further, that the defendant, J. S. Hair, or any other person that may be in possession at the time of renting, be required to vacate said premises and deliver the possession thereof to whomsoever may rent them from the master, as provided therein.

The appeal arises upon this order, the defendant having excepted as follows: 1. "Because said order was granted at chambers without the consent and against the protest of the said John S. Hair. 2. Because the said order was granted at chambers upon a notice to show cause why a receiver should not be appointed to take charge of the property in controversy. 3. Because said order was contrary to law. 4. Because the plaintiff was not entitled to said order from the presiding judge under the pleadings in this action."

We do not propose to inquire into or express any opinion as to the merits of the controversy, or as to rights of the parties respectively to the land in dispute. The order of the Circuit judge appointing the receiver is the only matter before us, and the questions raised are, first, whether such motion could be heard at chambers; and, second, whether the master should have been appointed.

*The first may be dismissed by a simple reference to section 265 of the code, which provides that a receiver "may be appointed by a judge of the Circuit Court either in or out of court;" so that if there was nothing else in the way except this objection, the order below should be affirmed without delay.

The more serious matter, however, is the fact that the master has been appointed. We must assume that the purpose of the order was to appoint the master a receiver. The order was based on a notice that an application would be made for the appointment of a receiver, and it was issued in response to that application. Assuming, then, this to be the true interpretation of the order, we desire to take this occasion to say, that we cannot sanction the appointment of masters as receivers in such cases as this, nor in fact should a master be appointed in any case.

As to the one appointed here, the gentleman who so worthily fills the office of master for Newberry county, there certainly could be no objection in respect to his qualification. He is well known to the court, and we have no doubt that he would discharge the duties incident to the office of receiver faithfully and to the entire satisfaction of all parties interested; but in our judgment it is contrary to the policy of the law, that a master should occupy such a position. His official duties as master are more or less in conflict or may become so with his duties as receiver; certainly in the special case in which he may be appointed he could not act as master, if, in the progress of the case it became necessary for the court to have the aid of a master in adjusting his accounts, &c., &c.

We appreciate fully what was said in Ex parte Fletcher, 6 Ves. 427, on the subject. The court said: "Nor will a man be appointed receiver whose position may cause difficulty in administering justice. A master in chancery accordingly was disqualified from being appointed a receiver, because, being an officer whose duty it might be to pass upon the accounts and check the conduct of the receiver, his appointment was open to objection on very obvious grounds." So, too, in Ex parte Pincke, 2 Mer. 452, it was said: "The same reason which disqualifies a master applies with equal force to one who acts as solicitor under a commission of lunacy." See also Kerr Rec. 130.

*The master is an officer of the court, whose duties require his constant attendance thereon. He is frequently called upon to prepare cases for the consideration of the court, and his presence at all times is necessary. To permit him to assume the duties of receiver, might not only call him from his office, but in many cases would deprive the court of that aid and assistance which sometimes is so necessary in ascertaining the facts of a case, and which, on account of his experience and knowledge of parties and witnesses, he is so well qualified to give. If he can be appointed in one case, why not in every case? and, if so, this would in effect destroy the office of master.

We think the practice is a bad one, and we avail ourselves of this case to express our disapprobation of such appointments. Besides, it is by no means certain that the bond of the master, as master, would cover his liabilities, if any, as receiver. It is true we have found no direct authority in this State forbidding the appointment of a master as receiver, but our judgment is supported by analogy derived from the action of the court in other matters. In Ex parte Hunter, Rice Ch. 293, the court declined to sanction the appointment of a husband as trustee of the wife's property. The position taken there will apply to some extent to the question now under consideration.

As we have already said, we do not wish to be understood as passing any judgment upon the merits of this case, nor of indicating any opinion that this is not a proper case for the appointment of a receiver. This is left open so that the respondent may adopt such course as he may be advised.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, October, 1882.

Action by W. W. Thompson against C. Lee, commenced December 26th, 1881.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

July 4th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action to recover possession of personal property (a horse), and the plaintiff, having given the undertaking required by the code, the sheriff seized the horse and delivered him to the plaintiff. The defendant, in his answer, admitted that the plaintiff was the owner of the horse, but denied plaintiff's right to possession or value of the horse, alleging that the horse was found trespassing on the lands of defendant, and had been taken up by him and retained in his possession until taken from him by the sheriff, under the proceedings in this action. The defendant also pleaded, as a counter-claim, the damages which he had sustained ($5) by reason of said trespass, and demanded a return of the horse, $25 for the taking thereof, and $5, the damages as aforesaid. The plaintiff, in his reply, denied the allegations upon which the counter-claim was based.

At the trial the Circuit judge charged the jury "that plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for a retention of the horse in his hands for actual damages so suffered, and that the counter-claim of defendant could not be considered in this action." The jury, however, seem to have taken a different view of the law, and *returned the following verdict: "We find for the defendant one dollar." A motion was thereupon made to set aside the verdict and for a new trial. After hearing argument the Circuit judge refused the motion upon condition that the defendant release his claim to the possession of the horse, and held that the counter-claim would be sustained in this action. The defendant then entered on the record a release to the possession of the horse. A motion was thereupon made that the plaintiff have judgment for costs, or at least that the defendant be not allowed to have them. His Honor overruled the motion and held the defendant entitled to costs.

The defendant having entered judgment against the plaintiff for the amount of the verdict, together with costs, the plaintiff took this appeal, alleging that the Circuit judge erred: "1. In refusing the motion for a new trial. 2. In holding that the new trial should not be granted, although the verdict was directly contrary to his charge and to the testimony in the case. 3. In allowing the defendant to enter a release of claim to the horse and thereafter to enter up judgment against the plaintiff for damages on counter-claim and for costs. 4. In not giving judgment for the plaintiff, notwithstanding the verdict. 5. In holding that, upon the verdict, the defendant was entitled to costs."

We think that there was error in refusing the motion for a new trial, as is conclusively shown by the case of Dent v. Bryce, 16 S. C. 14. The jury are bound to take the law of the case from the court, and whenever they undertake to disregard the instructions of the court as to the law, their verdict should be promptly set aside and a new trial ordered. We need not undertake to add anything to what is so well said in the case cited, upon this point, as it must be manifest that any other course would be utterly at variance with the principles governing a trial by jury, and would tend to undermine the authority of the court.

In this case the Circuit judge had clearly and explicitly instructed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, and that the counter-claim could not be allowed in this action, and yet in the face of such instructions, the jury, usurping the province of the court, have undertaken to render a verdict directly in violation of such instructions. The jury were correctly charged that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, whether the counter-claim could be pleaded in this action or not—a question upon which we are not now called upon to express any opinion—for the plaintiff was unquestionably entitled to judgment for the retention of the possession of the horse, which was admitted to be his. Upon this ground, if there were no other, the plaintiff was entitled to a new trial, even if it be conceded that the counter-claim could be set up in an action like this.

But even if the defendant had been entitled to a verdict, the form of the one rendered is not sufficient, as it should have been in the alternative. Robbins v. Slatterly, Mss. Dec. No. 712, filed April 15th, 1879, recognized and followed in the recent case of Eason v. Miller & Kelly, 18 S. C. 381. The subsequent action of the defendant in releasing his claim to the possession of the horse cannot have the effect of supplying the deficiency in the verdict, and certainly cannot be allowed to have the effect of throwing the costs upon the plaintiff. If the jury had found their verdict as they were directed to find, and as the law required them to find, that the plaintiff was entitled to retain possession of the horse, then no question as to costs could have arisen, as the plaintiff would undoubtedly have been entitled to recover the costs which he had incurred in an action to recover possession of a horse admitted to be his.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 173; Dec. Dig. ⇨101, 102.]

3. The decision in Gunter v. Graniteville Manufacturing Company, 18 S. C. 262 [44 Am. Rep. 573], stated.

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, July, 1882.

The case is thus stated in the Circuit decree:

On November 17th, 1879, a locomotive engine of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, called No. 21 or Chatooga, attached to a material train, exploded, so severely injuring the engineer, William E. Milligan, William Johnson, the fireman, and Henry Toliver, a train hand, that they each died very soon thereafter from the effects of said injuries. At the time of the explosion the Greenville and Columbia Railroad was in the custody and control of James Conner, who had been appointed by the court receiver of said road. The deceased parties were employes of the said James Conner as receiver.

Mary Johnson, as administratrix of William Johnson, the deceased fireman, by leave of the court filed her petition in this cause, alleging that her intestate came to his death as an employe of James Conner, receiver, through the carelessness, negligence and fault of the said James Conner, receiver, and that she, as administratrix aforesaid, is entitled to recover $5,000 damages. The petition was amended so as to allege the incompetence of William E. Milligan, the engineer.

It was referred to N. B. Barnwell, master, "to hear and determine all issues of law and fact arising upon the pleadings." On May 4th, 1882, the master filed his report, in which he concludes and finds as matter of law and fact, that the petition herein should be dismissed. Mary Johnson, administratrix, excepts to the report of the master, and the cause has been heard by me on said exceptions.

The relation of master and servant having existed, it is proper to consider some of the duties, obligations and liabilities that are incident to this relation. The master is bound to the exercise of reasonable care in reference to all the appliances of his business and to protect his servant from injuries by reason of latent or unseen defects, so far as human care and foresight can reasonably *accomplish that result. He is bound to the exercise of ordinary care in the selection of competent servants, to see that they continue to be competent during their retention in service, and to see that the machinery originally suitable for the work is kept in proper repair. The measure of the master's duty and liability to his servant is ordinary reasonable care, having reference to the business in which his servants are employed. The master cannot be held liable unless the injury is the result of his fault or negligence.

In an employment where dangerous machinery is used, the servant knows, or is bound to know, that there may be latent defects in such machinery that ordinary care upon the part of the master would not detect, and from such latent defects injuries may occur to him which are to be regarded in law as unavoidable and as risks assumed by the servant as incident to the employment. Before the servant can recover for injuries occasioned by defective or unsuitable machinery, it must appear that the machinery was in fact defective, that the injury was occasioned by such defect, and that the master had notice of the defect, or would have known of it if he had exercised ordinary care. Wood M. & S. 743. The burden of proving negligence is on the servant, as the master is presumed to have discharged his duty and obligations to the servant. Did the master err in concluding that Milligan was a competent engineer? [Here follows a statement of the evidence.] From the testimony I must concur with the master, as a matter of fact, that Milligan was a competent engineer.

Was the explosion the result of a defect in the engine, or was it occasioned by the tying down of the safety valve? [Here follows a further statement of the evidence.] From the testimony I conclude that the explosion resulted from the carelessness of the engineer in tying down the safety valve, and not from the defective or unsafe condition of the engine. The employé assumes the risks incident to his employment, one of which is the negligence of his fellow-servant. This is implied in the contract between the parties. Such has been the law in this State from Murray v. South Carolina Railroad, 1 McMull. 385 [36 Am. Dec. 268], to the recent case of Gunter v. Graniteville Man- *ufacturing Company, 15 S. C. 444. It does not satisfactorily appear from the evidence that at the time of the explosion the engine was unsafe or defective. On the contrary, it appears from the testimony that the engine had but recently been overhauled, repaired and put in good order by competent machinists. The engine had been personally tested by the master mechanic before being put to service after repairing; with a view to safety the balances were adjusted so that the engine would relieve herself at the pressure to which she was limited by instructions.

Whilst it appears from the testimony that before being overhauled and repaired there was some apprehension among the employés as to the safety of the engine in consequence of her age, and from the fact that an engine of the same make had, several years before, exploded on the road, yet there is no evidence of any objection to the engine after she was overhauled and repaired, or of any notice thereof to the receiver, nor could he reasonably know of any defect. It does not appear to me, from the evidence, that the receiver failed to exercise ordinary care in the selection and superintendence of his operatives and machinery. I cannot conclude, from the testimony, that the petitioner's intestate came to his death in consequence of the carelessness or negligence of James Conner, receiver, and must, therefore, concur in the conclusions reached by the master.

I conclude as matter of fact: 1. That petitioner's intestate, William Johnson, was a fellow-servant with William E. Milligan in the employ of James Conner, receiver; 2. That William E. Milligan was a competent engineer; 3. That James Connor, receiver, exercised ordinary care in the selection and repairs of the engine, No. 21 (Chatooga), as well as in the selection and superintendence of competent employés to operate and repair said engine; 4. That the explosion of the engine No. 21 (Chatooga) was not the result of carelessness or negligence on the part of James Conner, receiver.

I conclude as matter of law: That the petitioner is not entitled to recover damages against James Conner, receiver, on account of the death of her intestate, William Johnson. It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged that the petition of Mary Johnson, administratrix, be dismissed with costs.

*From this decree the petitioner appealed to this court.

Messrs. J. T. Sloan, Jr., and W. H. Lyles, for appellant.

Messrs. Conner & Cheves, contra.

July 4th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This is a petition in the causes above stated, asking leave to bring an action against the receiver of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company to recover damages for the killing of petitioner's intestate, by the explosion of a boiler on one of the locomotives used on said road, which was alleged to be due to the negligence of the receiver in supplying suitable machinery, &c., and in employing an incompetent engineer. The receiver filed an answer denying the allegations of the petition, pleading contributory negligence on the part of the intestate, and resisting the prayer of the petition. The Circuit Court refused to grant leave to sue the receiver in a separate action, but referred it to the master "to hear and determine all issues of law and fact arising upon the pleadings." To this action of the court there was no exception, and no appeal has been taken therefrom. On the contrary, the hearing before the master was proceeded with without objection, and he made his report, in which he finds, substantially, as matter of fact, that the death of intestate was not due to any negligence on the part of the receiver, and, as matter of law, that the petition be dismissed.

To this report the petitioner filed sundry exceptions, and the case came before the Circuit judge upon this report and the exceptions thereto, and he, concurring in the views of the master, rendered judgment dismissing the petition. From this judgment the petitioner appeals upon several grounds, all of which, except the seventh (not to mention the eighth, which is of too general a character to require notice,) raise simply questions of fact. As to these questions it is sufficient for us to say that we are not only unable to discover any ground which, under the well-settled rule of this court, would warrant us in disturbing the finding of fact by the master, concurred in by the Circuit *judge, but, on the contrary, a careful examination of the testimony incorporated in the "Case" satisfies us that such findings are well supported by the evidence.

The seventh ground of appeal, which is the only one raising a question of law, is in the following words: "Because he (the Circuit judge) concluded, as matter of law, that the measure of the receiver's duty was the exercise of ordinary care in the selection of machinery, &c." We see no error in this. The receiver was not bound to exercise extraordinary care, and we do not know what terms the Circuit judge could have employed that would have more appropriately indicated the degree of care required of the receiver. The basis of the claim is the negligence of the receiver, and the definition of that term, as given by Wharton and approved by this court in Gunter v. Graniteville Manufacturing Company, 15 S. C. 450, necessarily implies that ordinary care is all that is required. Wharton, § 1, p. 1, says: "Negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person, under existing circumstances, would not have done, the essence of the fault being either in omission or commission." This is no more than saying that negligence is the want of ordinary care.

The appellant's counsel, in his argument, seems to contend that the true measure of liability is the want of "all reasonable and proper care," but we confess that the difference between those terms and the terms "orinary care" appears to us inappreciable. Self-interest usually prompts those engaged in any enterprise to bestow upon it all reasonable and proper care, and hence the words "ordinary care" imply reasonable and proper care, inasmuch as that is the degree of care which we find that persons ordinarily bestow upon their affairs. The citation of the second decision in Gunter v. Graniteville Manufacturing Company, 18 S. C. 262 [44 Am. Rep. 573], to sustain the view contended for by appellant betrays a misconception of that case. There the doctrine was distinctly recognized, that an employer was not bound to furnish the best and most approved machinery, but only such as a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have used under similar *circumstances; that is, he must use ordinary care in the selection of his machinery, &c.

This doctrine is fully sustained by the authorities. As is said in 2 Thomp. Negl. 982, without citing others, in speaking of the duty of the employer in selecting and maintaining safe machinery and competent servants: "He is not an insurer of the safety of his servants in this respect. He does not warrant the competency of his servants or the sufficiency of his machinery. His duty to them is discharged by the exercise of reasonable or ordinary care."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[2. Judgment ⇨282.]

A judgment regularly obtained in open court, and prepared by the plaintiff's attorney in proper form for entry, and lodged in the clerk's office, and by such clerk regularly entered on his journal and in his abstract of judgments, but not tested, and the date of signing and entry not written on the margin, and the time of filing not endorsed, is a valid judgment, and has lien from its entry in the abstract of judgments.

[3. Judgment ⇨282.]

The judgment is the judicial determination of the rights of the parties, and that being had) the omission by the clerk to sign and date it, and to mark it filed, was a mere irregularity, and may be corrected at any time.

Before Witherspoon, J., Richland, July, 1882.

The facts are stated in the opinion of this court.

The Circuit decree, omitting its statement, was as follows:

The sole issue before the master was a contest between these two creditors as to priority in the distribution of assets. The master finds and reports as matter of law that the Ann E. Wright judgment is entitled to rank first in the distribution of the assets *of C. D. Melton, deceased. Mary B. Melton, a judgment creditor, excepts to the findings and the report of the master, giving priority to the alleged judgment of Ann E. Wright, and the case came on to be heard, upon said exceptions, at July Term of the court for Richland county. The exceptions are based upon the invalidity of the alleged judgment of Ann E. Wright to rank as a final judgment in the distribution of assets, inasmuch as the writ in debt offered was neither signed nor sealed by clerk, and that the judgment formula offered was not officially signed by clerk, with statement of time when signed and entered, as provided by law.

When the existence of a judgment is put in issue by the plea of nul tiel record, it must be proved by the record itself, which is inspected by the court wherein it is, if it be a record of the same court. 2 Tidd 942. It has been decided in this State that the act of 1789 does not apply to interlocutory, but only to final judgments, and that reference must be had to the period of the death of intestate to ascertain the rights of conflicting creditors. Does the record offered by Ann E. Wright establish a final judgment according to law, against C. D. Melton at the time of his death?

In Miller & Leckie v. Jones, 2 Speers 315, speaking of the clerk's assessment, as making plaintiff's chose in action res judicata, or a debt of record, ascertained and adjudged, the court say: "Nothing remained but to enter up the written formula of such judgment." This was done within the time required by law, and accordingly the entry by a fiction of law related back to the first day of the term, when the judgment debtor was alive, although dead at the time of the entry. This entry at common law could be made at any time during the next vacation, after the assessment term, and still relate back to the term, except in respect to purchasers. Dibble v. Taylor, 2 Speers 308 [42 Am. Dec. 368]. In McIntosh v. Wright, Rich. Eq. Cas. 385, the judgment on assessment of clerk was not entered up until nearly two years after the assessment, and it was held to constitute only an interlocutory judgment. The judgment had been in its nature final, for, until the expiration of the time limited, nothing remained but the final entry, after which scire facias became necessary, be*fore entry, which rendered the judgment, upon assessment, only interlocutory.

It would appear from these cases, that besides interlocutory judgments as such (quod computet) and final judgments as such, when finally and properly entered up, there is an intermediate class—final orders for judgment—which may become final as such or be relegated back to the condition of interlocutory judgments, accordingly as the judgment creditor enters up or fails to enter up final judgment, according to law. In Dibble v. Taylor it is held in presumption of law, that every entry of judgment is then the regular and formal registry and enrollment of what was adjudged by the court. Referring to the assessment by clerk, it is stated that the final consideration of the court has been had, and nothing remains but the final entry. Our rule of court which prohibits the entry of judgment during term time, does not at all affect its relation back when entered in proper time. In Mills v. Jones, 2 Rich. 394, it is held that, under act of 1789, judgments take rank from date of entry, and the entry is the evidence and authentication of the judgment.

It will be remembered that this is a trial by the record itself, in which legal rights are to be determined by rules of evidence, and legal assets are to be distributed according to the character of the demands established. Under the former practice, applicable to this issue, the record of the judgment was in the judgment-roll. The judgment formula offered by Ann E. Wright as part of the record of a judgment, is a paper signed by an attorney, without the official signature of clerk, and does not show the time when signed and entered, as provided by law. See Act of 1839. It does not furnish evidence of filing or recording, nor does it state amount of costs or show the taxation of costs by clerk. The formula shows no evidence of authentication as a record of the court. The "abstract of judgments," under act of 1839, contains entries in cases "wherein judgment may be signed." It is but a summary of original entries; and, as secondary evidence, cannot be resorted to when the original record is produced before the master, and fails to furnish the evidence of its validity.

I concur with the master, that the acceptance of service by (C. *D). Melton, on the writ in debt, cures the defect arising from the omission of clerk to sign and seal the writ. I cannot, however, agree and concur in the master's conclusion, giving construction to the act of 1839, the effect of the revival of judgment against W. A. Clark, administrator, or the authority of the court to amend the record so as to give validity to the alleged judgment of Ann E. Wright. At common law, final judgments were signed by the master or prothonotaries. 2 Tidd's Pr. 930. Under the act of 1712, 2 Stat. 528, the day of the month and year was required to be entered on the margin of the roll by the officer signing judgments.

I must, therefore, conclude that the signing of judgment officially by clerk, under act of 1839, is declaratory of the common law, and that the official signing and entry are essential to the validity of a final judgment according to law; that reference must be had to the period of C. D. Melton's death to ascertain the character or rank of the claims of creditors, which cannot be affected by the subsequent revival of judgment against the administrator, or the amending of the record. The case of Farrar, Adm'r, v. Carmichael, 1 Brev. 392, cited by the master, does not appear to be decisive of this issue. In that case the judgment was regularly entered, and the error was as to date of judgment. The record, in this case, does not show the entry or date of judgment according to law.

I conclude, as matter of law, first, that the record of the alleged judgment of Ann E. Wright, as offered before the master, does not entitle the said Ann E. Wright to rank as a judgment creditor in the distribution of the assets of C. D. Melton, deceased, as said judgment has not been signed and entered up according to law, and as said record does not furnish evidence of the final rendition of judgment by the court. Second, that the claim of Ann E. Wright can only rank as a sealed note demand in the administration of the estate of C. D. Melton.

It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed that the master's report, allowing the claim of Ann E. Wright, executrix, to rank first in the administration of the assets of C. D. Melton, deceased, be overruled and set aside, and that said claim take rank as a sealed note demand against said estate.

*Mrs. Ann E. Wright appealed to this court upon the following exceptions (omitting two not considered):

1. "Because of error in holding that the judgment offered by Ann E. Wright, executrix, as obtained against C. D. Melton, does not entitle the said Ann E. Wright to rank as a judgment creditor in the distribution of the assets of the estate of said C. D. Melton, because the judgment formula was not signed on margin by the clerk.

2. "Because of error in holding that the record of the judgment of 'Ann E. Wright, executrix, v. C. D. Melton' does not furnish evidence of its rendition by the court, and is thereby invalid as a judgment.

3. "Because of error in holding that the claim of Ann E. Wright against C. D. Melton can only rank as a sealed note in the administration of the assets of his estate.

4. "Because of error in holding that the revival of the judgment in 1877, by summons against the administrator of the judgment debtor, did not cure any defects or irregularities in the original record.

5. "Because of error in not holding that (the cause having been matured by regular proceedings in 1867—entered on inquiry docket at a regular term of the court—referred to the clerk, by the presiding judge, to assess damages—the assessment made and entered on minutes—judgment formula regularly made out and filed with the clerk—judgment entered in the book called 'abstract of judgments'—execution issued—and judgment revived in 1877) the misprision of the clerk, in failing to write his name on the judgment formula at time of original entry, has been cured, if it ever was a fatal irregularity.

7. "Because of error in holding that the 'abstract of judgments' furnished only secondary evidence of the entry of judgments."

July 4th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. C. D. Melton, late of Richland county and State aforesaid, died intestate in December, 1875. The respondent, W. A. Clark, administered upon his estate, and immediately possessed himself of the personal assets, from which he realized the sum of $5,788.44. In the life-time of Mr. Melton many judgments were recovered against him in the Court of Common Pleas for Chester county, where he at one time resided. These judgments, with the exception perhaps of the one now attempted to be set up by the appellant, Mrs. Ann *E. Wright, were purchased after the death of the intestate by and assigned to Mrs. Mary B. Melton, the widow of the deceased.

Mr. Clark, shortly after obtaining letters of administration, advertised in the Columbia papers for creditors, and supposing that all claims had been presented, proceeded to administer the estate, and with the consent of Mrs. Melton paid off many claims which were junior to her judgments, until he has now exhausted the personal estate. Recently he has received notice of the claim of Mrs. Wright, now presented as a senior judgment. Under these circumstances this action was commenced by the administrator on which the above facts were stated, the administrator complaining that, having in hand no assets or other personal estate, he cannot proceed further with the administration without the intervention and protection of the court, and giving information to the court that the intestate died seized and possessed of a lot of land with improvements thereon in the city of Columbia, containing about one acre, and demanding judgment, that he be permitted to account before the court, that creditors be called in, and that the real estate be sold and the proceeds be applied to the payment of such debts as might be established, and to that end that Mrs. Mary B. Melton be required to elect whether she will claim dower out of said real estate.

Under a call for creditors by the master, Mr. Barnwell, to whom the case was referred, various claims were presented. No objection, however, was made to any except to that of Mrs. Wright, the appellant here. This claim was resisted by Mrs. Melton, the owner of the junior judgments, on the ground that no legal judgment had ever been entered in favor of Mrs. Wright, and the sole question in the case is in reference to this judgment. Is it entitled to take rank in the settlement of the estate as a senior judgment, having priority over those held by Mrs. Melton?

The facts are as follows: At the fall term of the Court of Common Pleas for Chester county, 1869, there stood upon the inquiry docket, an action in debt of Ann E. Wright, executrix, v. C. D. Melton. The declaration had been filed October 28th, 1867, and interlocutory judgment endorsed thereon by the clerk *on same day with assessment of the amount due. During term time it was regularly referred to the clerk by the presiding judge and damages assessed and entered on the journal according to the then existing practice. After the term, to wit, November 2d, 1867, the judgment formula was made out by the attorney of the plaintiff and delivered to the clerk and fi. fa. lodged. The clerk filed this formula, recorded it, entered it in the "abstract of judgments," signed and tested the fi. fa., but omitted to endorse on the formula the date of the filing and also to sign it officially.

It remained in this condition for ten years, when, at the October Term of the court, 1877, by regular summons to the administrator, Mr. Clark, it was revived without objection "in accordance with the force and effect of the original recovery, with leave to issue execution." It appears also that the original writ in this case had not been signed or sealed by the clerk, but Melton had accepted service by an endorsement in his handwriting and signed by himself.

The record in the case of Ann E. Wright, executrix, v. C. D. Melton, with the defects referred to above appearing on its face, was introduced before the master and relied on by Mrs. Wright as evidence of a valid judgment in her favor, which, being senior to all other judgments, she claimed should be entitled to priority in the application of the assets of the deceased. Mrs. Melton, holding the junior judgments about which there was no dispute, objected to all testimony outside the record and pleaded nul tiel record as to the judgment of Mrs. Wright, claiming that the absence of the clerk's official signature from the judgment formula and of the date of the filing was fatal to that paper as a judgment. The master overruled the objection of Mrs. Melton, and, finding as matter of law that Mrs. Wright had a valid judgment against the deceased which was senior to that held by Mrs. Melton, he reported that Mrs. Wright's judgment was entitled to priority in the distribution of the assets of the deceased.

Upon exceptions this report was overruled by Judge Witherspoon, who held as matter of law: First, "that the alleged record of the judgment in question did not entitle the said Ann E. *Wright to rank as a judgment creditor in the distribution of the assets of C. D. Melton, deceased, as said judgment had not been signed and entered up according to law, and as said record did not furnish evidence of the final rendition of judgment by the court; and second, that the claim of Ann E. Wright could only rank as a sealed note in the administration of the estate of C. D. Melton."

*506

Some objection was made below to the record because the writ had not been signed or sealed by the clerk, but Mr. Melton having accepted the legal service thereof, this was held by the master—which conclusion was sustained by the Circuit judge—to be sufficient. This ruling has not been assailed seriously here, so that, as already stated, the only question before us is whether the omission by the clerk to do his duty in signing and dating the judgment prepared by the attorney of Mrs. Wright prevents the paper from having the rank and character of a judgment of record, notwithstanding the fact that it was regularly filed and entered in the abstract of judgments with all the required formalities.

The argument of the respondent is: First. That under the plea of nul tiel record, the existence of the judgment is denied, and that that fact can be determined alone, when thus denied, by an inspection of the record itself; and if such inspection shows an omission in said record of any essential feature it is fatal, and that no outside testimony dehors the record can supply the omission or cure the defect. In other words, the judgment must stand or fall upon the record. Second. That an inspection of the record in this case shows the omissions stated above, which respondent contends are fatal.

The first proposition is doubtless correct, but the second is open to examination and is really the question in this case. Was it absolutely essential to the validity of the Wright judgment, that the formula prepared and lodged in the clerk's office by the attorney should have the date of filing and the official signature of the clerk endorsed thereon? And did the omission by the clerk to do his duty in these respects, although he entered it properly in the "abstract book," deprive the paper of the *character of a judgment in a contest over the application of the assets of a deceased debtor?

We think the Circuit judge was in error in holding these omissions by the clerk as fatal. A judgment is the application of the law to the facts found in a case, and it has been defined to be the legal determination of the rights of the parties before the court. Ordinarily it is pronounced upon a verdict ascertaining the facts, but, under the former practice, when a party was sued upon a note or other contract where the amount involved was capable of being ascertained by a mere computation, and the defendant interposed no defense, judgment was supposed to be pronounced by the court by ordering a reference to the clerk for assessment, the order of reference being in substance and fact the judgment of the court for whatever sum might be assessed by the clerk.

To give force and effect, however, to this judgment, it is true that a formula was required to be prepared and filed in the clerk's office, and to be entered in the book entitled "abstract of judgments," and, under an act of the general assembly, the clerk in whose office this formula was filed was required to date it and endorse his official signature. It will be observed, however, that this formula, &c., did not constitute the judgment of the court, nor did the dating or signing by the clerk with his official signature add anything to its intrinsic character. The judgment issues from the court, not from the attorneys or the clerk; it precedes the formula, and is authority upon which the formula is prepared, but the formula constitutes no part of the judgment. It is only the evidence of the existence of the judgment, and entitles the plaintiff to have it enforced.

The judgment, as we have said, is the judicial determination of the rights of the parties, but it is not self-operative; it cannot enforce itself; it becomes necessary, therefore, that some machinery should be adopted to secure to the successful party the fruits of his recovery. Hence, it was provided by act, that a supposed copy of the judgment pronounced by the court should be filed in the clerk's office, which, being done, gave a lien on the property of the debtor, and authorized the issuing of a fi. fa. for its enforcement, and the object of the act in requiring that *this paper should be dated and signed officially by the clerk no doubt was that all parties should have the means of knowing of the lien, so that all persons dealing with the debtor might be put upon their guard.

So far as the parties themselves were concerned, the dating and signing amounted to nothing. And even as to third parties, while the date and the official signature of the clerk would best authenticate the judgment and put it beyond dispute, yet as to its effect as a notice, the filing is the main matter. When entered and filed in the proper office its existence could be as well ascertained without the date and signature as with them. The entry and filing are the essential facts, and whether this had taken place at a particular time could be discovered by an examination of the office as certainly where the formula had not been signed and dated by the clerk as if these things had been done.

The first step in the proceeding is the lodgment and filing of the formula. The date and signature of the clerk follow, but it is the existence of the paper in the office which gives notice to third parties, and the absence of the date and signature cannot be discovered without disclosing the existence of the paper itself, because before these can be affixed the paper must be in existence and in the proper office. Before a party can safely deal with a debtor, or, in fact, with any one, he should examine the clerk's and sheriff's office and see his condition, and where a judgment has been entered and filed against him this fact can be as well ascertained, though it may not be dated and signed, as if it had been, and especially would this be so where the judgment had been entered in the "book of abstracts," as was done in this case, with all the required formalities.

To hold, then, that the failure of the clerk in the matter suggested here destroyed the judgment, would, in our opinion, be sacrificing substance to a shadow, and would overthrow established and adjudicated rights upon the merest technicality. There is no pretense that this debt is not due or that it has ever been paid, nor is it denied that it was sued upon and prosecuted to judgment, nor is it claimed that the failure on the part of the clerk to date and sign the formula misled any one. It is claimed *that because of this failure simply, not of Mrs. Wright, but of the clerk, she would lose her debt.

The recording acts are much more stringent in their provisions requiring record of certain instruments, deeds and mortgages, &c., than the act of 1839 as to this matter. The failure to record such papers within the time prescribed renders them, in the language of the acts, absolutely void, and yet the courts have always construed these acts liberally, and have uniformly held that where the object of the recording, to wit, notice, has been accomplished or could have been accomplished by proper inquiry, the instruments in question should be declared valid. The act of 1839 does not declare that judgments not dated and signed shall be void; it simply directs the clerk to date and sign. If the failure to do this had a tendency to shut the door upon the judgment and to conceal it from the public, or if a third party could show that because this was not done he was misled to his injury, then there might be reason in holding that such omission would be fatal: but when no such effect has followed, and the judgment has been lodged and filed, it would be a most stringent construction to hold that because of such failure the whole proceeding is void.

This we cannot suppose was the object of the act. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that the omission here was a mere irregularity in a matter not vital to the judgment, but simply directory to the clerk, and may be corrected at any time. Farrar v. Carmichael, 1 Brev. 392; Harrison v. Manufac- turing Company, 10 S. C. 297. The record shows that the judgment was filed, recorded and entered in the "abstract book" on November 2d, 1867, and we think it should take rank from that date, and being the senior judgment should have priority in the settlement of the estate of the intestate.

The view which we have taken of the question already discussed renders it unnecessary to consider the other points raised in the argument.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

*SANDERS v. ETIWAN PHOSPHATE COMPANY.

(April Term, 1883.)

[1. Trial ⇨139, 159.]

Whether there is any evidence to support the allegations of the complaint is always a question of law for the court, and if there is a total lack of evidence to sustain its material allegations, a non-suit is not only proper but is demanded.

Before Fraser, J., Charleston, March, 1882.

Action by R. B. S. Sanders against the Etiwan Phosphate Company, commenced December 20th, 1881. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Lee & Bowen, for appellant.

Mr. A. T. Smythe, contra.

July 5th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, appellant, while in the employment of the defendant, respondent, as carpenter, received an injury by the falling of a building which was undergoing repairs, and upon which the appellant with others was employed, and he seeks to recover damages for this injury, claiming in his complaint $10,000 damages.

As a cause of action against the defendants, he alleges that he was, on or about

September 27th, 1881, in the employment of the defendants as a carpenter upon a building of the defendants; "that it was the duty of the defendants to provide good, safe and secure braces and stays in the repairing of said building; that the defendants, not regarding their duty, employed careless, negligent and unskillful workmen in propping said building *with braces and stays in an unsafe, defective and insecure manner, of which they had notice; that for want of due care and attention to their duty in that behalf on the day and at the place aforesaid, and while said building was undergoing repairs aforesaid, for the use and service of the said defendants, and the plaintiff was on the same in the capacity aforesaid for the defendants, the said building by reason of unsafeness, defectiveness and insecurity thereof fell with the plaintiff," thereby causing the injury complained of.

At the hearing, upon the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant moved for a non-suit, which was granted, Judge Fraser presiding. The plaintiff has appealed upon exceptions as follows: 1. "Because there was ample evidence to sustain the complaint of the plaintiff. 2. Because his Honor erred in ruling that there was no proof of the defendants' negligence, and that Whaley was only an employé, when there was evidence showing said Whaley to be a managing agent of the defendants, and also showing that there was negligence on the part of both the said Whaley and the said defendants, all of which were questions of fact and should have been referred to the jury. 3. Because there was evidence going to sustain every material allegation of plaintiff's complaint, and the plaintiff was entitled to the verdict of the jury upon it, and his Honor erred in not so ruling."

The only question before us is, whether the presiding judge committed error of law in granting the non-suit. A plaintiff's cause of action is found in the allegations of his complaint. Whether there is any evidence to support these allegations is always a question of law for the court. Whether the testimony, if any, when submitted, sustains their truth is for the jury. If, therefore, there is a total lack of evidence as to such of the allegations as are material—one or all—there is nothing to be submitted to the jury, and a non-suit in such case is not only proper but demanded. Hence, when the point is made whether a non-suit has been properly granted, the questions to be considered, are, first, what are the material allegations? and, secondly, whether there is a total failure of testimony as to these allegations.

*The plaintiff in this case has brought his action to recover damages for an injury resulting, as alleged, from the conduct of careless, negligent and unskillful workmen in the employment of the defendant; and the defendant is sought to be made liable because such careless, negligent and unskillful workmen were employed. In other words, the cause of action relied on is that defendants employed such workmen with knowledge of their character. To have entitled the case, then, to go to the jury, there should have been some testimony that the workmen were careless, negligent and unskillful; that this was known to the defendants, or by proper attention might have been known, and that notwithstanding this they were employed by the defendants either directly or by an authorized agent.

Was there any testimony to these facts? The witnesses were Sanders, the plaintiff; T. L. Judson, Thornal and J. C. Judson. We have examined the reported testimony of these witnesses, and we fail to find a particle of positive evidence directed to the point of carelessness, negligence or unskillfulness on the part of the employés. These witnesses were all employed and seem to have been the leading carpenters. They claim to be mechanics of some experience. A number of others were engaged in the work, and the plaintiff himself says of them, that, taken as "a rule, they were pretty well fitted to the work." He does say, at another stage of the examination, that some of them were not fair hands, and he says that he complained to Mr. Whaley and had told him that he had better get rid of them.

This latter is the only statement in the entire examination which approaches the point of carelessness or negligence in the employés. This amounts to nothing more than that, in the opinion of the witnesses, those that he complained of could not be embraced in the category of "fair hands." This might be so in the sense that some were inferior to others and yet no responsibility attach to the employer on that account. There is no evidence that these were engaged in any part of the work for which they were unfitted. No doubt the character of the work required laborers and servants of different degrees of skill and experience, and that some were better than others is what is found in all work where a number is employed. The testimony

*here appears to us to amount to nothing more than this, and it entirely fails to bear upon the precise question which the case required.

The indirect testimony as to this point is found in the description given by these witnesses of the manner in which the building was propped, braced and stayed, and manner in which it fell. These witnesses were the carpenters who were engaged in this work. They do not say that the failure to brace the building properly was because those employed were careless, negligent or unskillful, and but for this carelessness the bracing would have been better done; but it appears that all was done that was thought necessary, and that the building afterwards fell was not such a fact as by itself should have carried the case to the jury in an action against the employers for having employed careless and unskillful servants, knowing them to be so.

In Gunter v. Graniteville Manufacturing Company, 18 S. C. 262 [44 Am. Rep. 573], this court held that in cases like this the employer was responsible for his own negligent acts, or those of his representatives, and that he was under obligation to use due care in the employment of his underservants, co-laborers, &c., and also in furnishing proper material and machinery and implements, according to the nature of the work, and that due care should be observed as to these matters while the work was continued, and that negligence, or the want of due care in these respects, would render him liable for injuries resulting therefrom.

The appellant in his complaint here relied upon but one of these causes of action or grounds of responsibility, viz., the employment of careless and negligent workmen. This we have discussed, and, finding no reason to reverse the order of the Circuit judge upon the case as made in the pleadings, we might close without further remark; but the second ground of appeal assigns error to the presiding judge in that he ruled that there was no proof of the defendants' negligence and that Whaley was only an employé, when there was evidence showing said Whaley to be a managing agent of the defendants, and also showing that there was negligence on the part of both the said Whaley and the said defendants, all of which were questions of fact and should have been referred to the jury.

So far as the question of defendant's negligence was embraced in the complaint as to employing careless and negligent workmen, that has been disposed of. As to negligence of any other character committed through Whaley, as the representative of the defendant, occupying a higher position than a common workman or co-laborer with the others, there was no such question embraced in the pleadings, nor does it appear in the "Case" that the presiding judge made any ruling upon the subject. We suppose that the non-suit was granted because of the absence of all testimony to support the allegations in the complaint, and when we look to the complaint, the ground assigned was negligence by the defendant in employing the workmen. This did not involve the relation of Whaley to the company, except so far as Whaley may have been the agent through whom the workmen were employed, and whether this was so or not, still there was no testimony showing negligence in that respect on the part of either. Under the pleadings the general conduct of Whaley, even though he may have been a representative of the defendant, was not involved, nor, so far as we can see, did the judge consider that question.

We do not, therefore, regard the second ground of appeal as before us. Nor is the question of liability of the defendant for negligence in not providing proper braces and stays, or for propping the building with braces and stays in an unsafe manner, properly involved, though it was discussed in the argument of counsel, yet there was no evidence implicating the defendant in this respect. On the contrary, the material for these things was abundant and there was no restraint upon the workmen as to its use.

It is the judgment of this court that the order below be affirmed.

Before Pressley, J., Barnwell, April, 1883.

This is an appeal from an order dissolving an attachment in the case of J. C. H. Claussen & Co. against J. R. Easterling. The action was commenced in February, 1883, and the motion to dissolve was noticed March 27th, and heard April 2d, 1883. The attachment had been issued upon an affidavit of one of the plaintiffs, setting forth the indebtedness, and charging a fraudulent sale of goods and mortgage of chattels by the defendant to his mother, made to defeat this claim, no delivery having been made and the defendant continuing in possession. The motion to dissolve was based upon affidavits in which a bona fide indebtedness by the defendant to his mother was shown, and a fair and open sale of the goods and chattels made, and no retention of possession by the defendant. There were also affidavits in reply.

On April 6th, 1883, Judge Pressley filed the following order:

The motion before me in this case is to dissolve plaintiffs' attachment. It is founded on allegations of fraud by defendant in conveying to his mother a portion of his stock in trade and his other personal property, and yet retaining possession of it. The testimony is very clear that before said conveyance the mother had a bona fide, valid, recorded mortgage on said prop*erty, and that the debt secured by it had not been paid. In December last she took a second mortgage of the same property to secure the same debt. That may or may not have been necessary, but it was certainly a wise precaution in view of the fact that the stock in trade had been changed after the first mortgage.

But the mortgage not being disputed by plaintiff, he still claims and alleges that the release of defendant's equity of redemption to his mother was pretensive, and that he is still in possession. He does not attempt to prove that said release was for an amount less than the full value of the property, and he filed an affidavit of Mr. Dowling which directly corroborated the affidavit of defendant. He decided to sell out and quit that kind of business; besides, the sale of the stock offered to Mr. Dowling was not for cash, which could be concealed from defendant's creditors, but on credit for good security, which could easily be reached by defendant's creditors if his mother's claim was not superior to theirs. Failing to make the proposed sale, a portion of defendant's stock and fixtures were bona fide sold on like credit to Vogel & Co., and the remainder was sold to his mother for the consideration of her assuming a portion of defendant's debts, as principal, for which before she was only a surety.

But plaintiffs file an affidavit of Mr. Christie to the effect that defendant had expressed a willingness to use the Vogel notes in payment of his debts to plaintiff, if defendant had been so requested before the attachment against him. Knowing nothing of his character, and judging him solely by the statement and said affidavit, the only legitimate inference which I can possibly draw from it is that, to satisfy plaintiffs, defendant was willing to presume still further on the affections and indulgence of his mother and obtain her consent to his paying the plaintiffs out of assets already pledged to her on a bona fide debt.

As to his having traded away one of the mortgaged horses, I think that a fair construction of the mortgage allowed such changes by him.

But it is alleged that he is still in possession of the stock in the trade. The affidavits of the nearest neighbors to the store *say otherwise. Plaintiffs' attorney swears that once since the transfer of the merchandise the defendant conducted sales to said attorney as previously, when defendant was owner of the store. It would be very strange if, after having involved his mother as surety for his debts, defendant should fail to do everything in his power to save her from loss on his account. If he were to assist her clerk to sell said goods, even a dozen times, that would be even less than the duty he owed for having involved her in his wild venture. As to the statement that her alleged clerk offered to insure the mere stock in the name of defendant, that is only competent in so far as it impeached his affidavit, and I disregard that in making up this judgment. The whole testimony fails to impress my mind that there is even the shadow of a proof of fraud in the testimony between the defendant and his mother.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that said attachment be set aside and the attached articles be forthwith released; further ordered that plaintiffs pay the costs of this motion.

From this order plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. James E. Davis, for appellant.
Mr. Robert Aldrich contra.

July 5th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiffs, appellants, brought action against the defendant upon an open account, and at the same time, upon an affidavit of J. H. Clausen, alleging a fraudulent bill of sale by the defendant to his mother, L. C. Easterling, of all of his stock of goods, and a mortgage also to his mother of all of his other personal property, of which he, defendant, still retained possession, issued an attachment, serving the summons and complaint as well as the attachment, on the same day, viz.: February 12th, 1883. The defendant put in a general denial to the complaint and moved, upon affidavits which will be found in the brief, for a dissolution of the attachment in advance of the trial of the cause.

*This motion was heard by Judge Pressley, who ordered and adjudged that said attachment be set aside, and that the articles attached be forthwith released, and further, that plaintiffs pay the costs. This order was based on the finding of the Circuit judge that the allegation of fraudulent acts by defendant upon which the attachment had issued, was unsupported by the testimony. The plaintiffs appealed on exceptions assigning error in this finding of the judge, and especially, because "the defendant having alleged that he held no interest in the property at the time of the issuing of the attachment, that he was not even in possession, his Honor committed error of law in not holding, as earnestly requested by counsel of plaintiffs, that defendant could not come in and have the right of third parties adjudicated, but that Mrs. Easterling was the only party affected according to defendant's own showing, and hence was the proper party to make said motion."

Attachments may be assailed either because they have been improvidently issued, or because of some irregularity in the proceeding. The distinction between the two grounds is, that in the latter case the defect appears on the face of the proceedings, and may be taken advantage of by motion to quash or dissolve. In the former, all the preliminary steps may be regular, and yet the attachment has been improvidently granted because the allegations on which it issued are untrue. Drake Att. (3d edit.), § 397. In this case the attachment is attacked on the latter ground, to wit: Because the allegations on which it issued are untrue.

Mr. Drake says, there can hardly be room for doubt that, without the aid even of express statutory provision, a defendant may, in one form or another, contest the truth of the grounds alleged by the plaintiffs for obtaining the attachment. The mode of doing this is different in the different States, but the right to do so is conceded in most of the States. In some of the States it is held, that a statutory provision is necessary, and where so held the mode prescribed in the statute must be followed. In our State no statutory provision has been made, but the right of the defendant to contest the allegations in the affidavit has been acknowledged, and if successful in disproving them the attachment will be dissolved.

*519

*The mode of accomplishing this has not been definitely adjudicated. In some cases it has been done on motion; in others an issue has been made for a jury, and this, it seems, would be the better practice, at least in doubtful cases. Havis v. Trapp, 2 Nott. & M. 130; Wheeler v. Degnan, 2 Id. 323; Shrewsbury v. Pearson, 1 McC. 331. But the appellant has raised no question of this kind. He did not demand an issue to be submitted to a jury. On the contrary, he acquiesced in the trial by the judge, and he has not in his grounds of appeal questioned the right of the judge to hear the case. It is unnecessary, therefore, to pursue this branch of the subject further.

As to the findings of fact by the Circuit judge, the rule which governs in other cases where the judge passes upon the facts, must apply here. Under this rule, unless the decided preponderance of the testimony is against the finding, it must be sustained. We do not find such preponderance. On the contrary the evident weight of the affidavits is in support of the conclusion of the judge. It is very clear that defendant's mother had become involved for the defendant, and that he had given her a lien upon his property by mortgage, which was duly recorded before the debt of plaintiff was contracted, and the badges of fraud relied on by the plaintiff were sufficiently explained. The defendant had the right to prefer his mother. A debtor has the right to give preference, if the transaction is founded upon a sufficient consideration, and is otherwise bona fide. But in this case there were no other creditors in the way when the original transaction between the defendant and his mother took place, and the fact that she took a second mortgage of the same property for the same debt, has no significance, except that she was anxious to be secured; the subsequent sale to the mother of a portion of the goods appears to have been made upon a sufficient consideration. The finding of the Circuit judge upon this branch of the case must be sustained.

As to the ground most strongly urged by appellant, that defendant having admitted that the property attached did not belong to him, he could not move to dissolve the attachment; we do not see its application here. The motion below was not made on the ground that the property in question did not *belong to defendant. The title to the property was not in issue. The attachment was issued on an allegation of fraud by the defendant, and the only question involved below was the truth of that allegation. If, because that allegation being found untrue, the attachment is vacated and incidentally thereby the property is released, that is a result which does not concern the defendant. He certainly should not be compelled to submit to the charge of fraud, when he has the means of overthrowing it, simply because if he should do so, some one else may be benefited.

*520

In the case of Metts v. Piedmont & Arlington Life Insurance Company, 17 S. C. 120, a third party who claimed the property attached, attempted to intervene and to raise the question of title on motion to dissolve the attachment; and this court held that he could not be permitted to intervene. He did not propose to assail the attachment, because it was issued either improvidently or irregularly; in fact, being a third party he could not have been allowed to do so, if he had desired, but he proposed to come in simply to contest the title. The court held that he had other means of redressing himself, if he had received an injury, more effectual than the mode he suggested.

And so here, if Mrs. Easterling had made the motion below to permit her to intervene so that she might raise the question of title, the case of Metts v. Piedmont Life Insurance Company, supra, would be in point. But Mrs. Easterling is not before the court. The defendant in the attachment, brought into court by the plaintiff, makes the motion on the ground that plaintiff had no legal right to issue such a proceeding against him. The attack goes back behind the execution of the process to the original issue, and raises a question which he above all others is warranted in raising, to wit: the truth of the allegations upon which it had its inception.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the Circuit judge be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, November, 1881.

This was an action by Harriet Ward against the Charleston City Railway Company, a street horse car corporation, commenced July 27th, 1881. The complainant alleged serious injury to herself caused by the carelessness, negligence, &c., of the driver of the car in not giving her proper time to free herself and get out of the way of the car, and she demanded judgment for $10,000, her damages. The opinion sufficiently states the facts and points involved in the impaneling of the jury, and the evidence of the witnesses.

In dismissing the motion for a new trial, the Circuit judge, in addition to what is quoted in the opinion here, said:

But even under the plaintiff's counsel's understanding of the facts, I do not see that an error was committed. * * * Could the plaintiff at this juncture then have challenged peremptorily any one of the nine of the original panel after they had been solemnly accepted? We think not, and base this opinion upon the language of the present jury law, and the aforesaid interpretations of an exactly similar law of 1841. It is too well established in practice to bear questioning, that when a party has accepted a juror and he is sworn in the cause, it is too late then to object to him peremptorily. The plaintiff so accepted eleven of this jury, and the defendant and plaintiff united in accepting nine of the twelve.

Besides, it would be perhaps in many cases greatly prejudicial to the rights and interest of a defendant, were a plaintiff allowed to accept a certain number of jurors, and, after the defendant *rejects his quota, and the panel is filled anew, then to allow the plaintiff to step forward and exercise the right to challenge peremptorily any of those to whom he declared he had no objection. If such a course were allowed to either party, the other might be trifled with. It is possible that were such a rule to prevail, a wary litigant might purposely avoid challenging in the first instance experimentally, in order to take advantage of his opponent's challenges, and the drawing of the supernumeraries. In fact, it is very probable that each side would struggle to gain this vantage ground.

So that, not even from the view of the facts of the case as set forth by plaintiff, do we think she lost any right under the action and ruling of the court. Had the plaintiff, after the defendant had challenged, but before the drawing of supernumeraries had begun, asked the court to allow her to reconsider the matter, and challenge peremptorily, the court would have granted the indulgence, notwithstanding that she had in the first instance deliberately accepted eleven; but after the filling up of the jury it was too late to recommence the peremptory challenge of jurors.

As to the plaintiff's second ground, I cannot see the force of it. The defendant's counsel asked a witness on the stand, who saw the accident to the plaintiff, whether, in his opinion, she had time after alighting from the car to get clear of it before it moved on. This was objected to by plaintiff's counsel. I directed the question to be put thus, viz., whether, as a matter of fact, she did have time to get clear of the car. This was objected to by plaintiff's counsel. The witness answered in the affirmative. I regard the question as tending not to extract a mere opinion, but a fact, to wit: the witness' estimate of the length of time which an occurrence under his observation consumed.

Messrs. Campbell & Whaley, for appellant.
Messrs. Buist & Buist, contra.

July 7th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The appellant, Harriet Ward, brought action against the defendant, respondent, to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's agents and servants. The accident occurred while appellant was leaving the car of defendant, and is alleged to have taken place because she was not allowed sufficient time to free herself from the car.

When the case was called for trial, the plaintiff, being first called upon by the court to know if she had any objection to the jury, replied that she had none, except that if there was any stockholder of the company on the jury he should retire, whereupon one person retired. The plaintiff interposed no other objection. The defendant then peremptorily challenged two jurors. At this juncture, and while the clerk was preparing to fill the panel from the supernumeraries, the plaintiff claimed her right to challenge. The court understood this to be an intimation on the part of the plaintiff, that she would claim the right to challenge the jurors thus drawn to fill the panel, which he ruled could not be done. The understanding, however, of the plaintiff, as afterwards stated by her counsel, was, not that she should have the right to challenge the jurors drawn to fill the places vacated on account of defendant's challenge, but that her right to challenge generally revived after the defendant's challenge.

No objection was made to the charge of the judge, but during the progress of the trial several witnesses who were present and saw what occurred were asked by defendant's counsel, as follows, to wit: To John McPherson, "Whether the lady was or was not far enough from the car to allow it to go on without throwing her down?" To W. E. Vincent, "Was she a sufficient distance from the car to avoid the accident?" And to Philip Fogarty, "You think she was given plenty of time to get off and move away except for the drays?" These questions were objected to as calling for the opinion of the witnesses. The presiding judge directed the question to be put in this form, "Whether as matter of fact she had time to get clear of the car?" This was objected to.

The verdict was for the defendant. The counsel of plaintiff then moved the court for a new trial on the grounds: 1. "Because the plaintiff made no peremptory challenge, only requesting that if there be a stockholder he should retire; that a *juror did retire, whereupon the defendant made two peremptory challenges, and the plaintiff then claimed that her right to challenge reverted, and it was disallowed. 2. Because at the close of defendant's case, the defendant asked of a witness, whether in his opinion the plaintiff had sufficient time to clear herself of defendant's car, and the plaintiff objected to the question and the objection was overruled." There was also a third exception upon another ground (as to the financial condition of the company), but this seems to have been abandoned, and, therefore, not necessary to be noticed further. These grounds were overruled by the Circuit judge, and the appellant now appeals, renewing her motion for a new trial on substantially the same grounds relied on in the motion below.

As to the first ground, it is conceded by both parties that, under the facts as understood by the Circuit judge, his ruling was strictly in accordance with the law, as expounded in several cases from our own court, where the precise question was made and adjudged. See cases Kleinback ads. State, 2 Speers 418; Huff v. Watkins, 15 S. C. 83 [40 Am. Rep. 680]; Gunter v. Graniteville Manufacturing Company, 15 S. C. 448, and Burckhalter v. Coward, 16 S. C. 435.

The appellant insists, however, that there was a misunderstanding as stated above. Admit this and can it help the appellant? The judge ruled that it could not. True, in Kleinback ads. State, Judge Butler, in delivering the opinion of the court, did say, that the act of 1841 did not in terms require either party to be the first actor in making the challenge. On this subject he further says: "Both parties are independent and either may make the challenge without regard to the position of the other. When the plaintiff forbears to make the move in the first instance, it should not be in the power of the defendant to compel him to do so, or otherwise lose it altogether, and if the defendant should think proper to exercise his right it will not then deprive the plaintiff in turn from claiming his. Either has the option to claim the privilege before the jury shall be charged in the case."

In the case now under consideration, however, the plaintiff did not simply forbear to exercise her right in the first instance,

*holding it in reserve to be exercised afterwards, but the judge states that when called upon to speak, her counsel, after surveying the jury, answered that she had no challenge to make except as to stockholders, if any; after a stockholder had retired the counsel then stated that there was no further objection by the plaintiff to the remaining jurors. The defendant was then called upon to challenge if he desired to do so. This was something more than a mere forbearance on the part of the plaintiff; it was an announcement that she waived the privilege of exercising her right. There was no denial on the part of the court; on the contrary the right was tendered to her at the proper time, and having waived the exercise of it then, for the reasons given by the Circuit judge we think it was too late to demand it after the defendant had exercised his right.

There must be system and uniformity in the mode of conducting trials, and in this respect much must be left to the discretion of the presiding judge. It is the general practice, as we understand, in the matter of challenges in civil cases, that the right shall first be tendered to the plaintiff and then to the defendant, and if either declines when tendered and announces the fact that he does not intend to challenge, there is an end of it, unless under peculiar circumstances the judge might allow it revived as to either. In this case we do not think that there was any error of law on the part of the judge in refusing appellant's claim, and, therefore, we cannot disturb it.

The other question raised is as to the competency of certain questions propounded to the witnesses, which were objected to by appellant on the ground that they called for opinions merely, and not facts. It is a general rule of evidence that opinions of witnesses are not competent, but to this there are several exceptions; for instance, experts may give opinions, and even ordinary witnesses, after stating the facts upon which their opinions are founded, may also state their opinions resting on the facts. Seibles v. Blackwell, 1 McMull. 56. And, then, there are many matters in reference to which opinion is the only testimony of which they are susceptible. See the recent case of Jones v. Fuller, ante p. 66 [45 Am. Rep. 761], in which McIver, A. J., fully discusses such cases.

*Time, distance, velocity, form, size, age, strength, heat, cold, &c., are subjects of this character. Whart. Ev., § 612, note, p. 490. The ground upon which opinions are admitted in such cases, says Mr. Wharton, is that, from the nature of the subject, it cannot be stated in such language as will enable persons, not eye-witnesses, to form an accurate judgment in regard to it. In Hackett v. Boston, Concord and Montreal R. R. Co., 35 N. H. 390, the court said: "That in most cases, when a witness is examined as to distances, dimensions, weight, or any quality of matter in question, he cannot testify except by the use of language which necessarily implies his opinion." See, also, the case of Commonwealth v. Sturtivant, 117 Mass. 133. Under the principle upon which these cases were decided, we think the question propounded here was competent, especially as the witnesses were present when the accident occurred, and were speaking from the facts as they occurred within their sight and under their immediate observation.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

DARBY & CO. v. SHANNON.

[1. Judgment ⇨494.]

A. issued an attachment against C., an absent defendant, obtained order of publication and commenced publication, but, upon personal service being made on the defendant in North Carolina, the publication was discontinued, and judgment was taken by default more than twenty days after such personal service, but only forty-two days after order for publication. Under this judgment, the land attached was sold by the sheriff. Before this judgment was obtained, B., having issued a junior attachment upon this land as the property of C., moved to set aside the attachment for insufficiency in the affidavit. The judge ruled that a junior attaching creditor could not make such an objection, and refused the motion. After the sale, B. obtained judgment by default, and then instituted this action to have the sale set aside and the land resold. Held, that the action would not lie.

Before Witherspoon, J., Kershaw, June, 1882.

*The opinion states the case.

Mr. Ernest Moore, for appellant.

Messrs. R. E. Allison and Ira B. Jones, contra.

July 16th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action to set aside a sale to the defendant Ira B. Jones, of a certain tract of land in Kershaw county, alleged to have been made under a judgment of Lewis H. Cole & Co. against the defendant Shannon. The Circuit judge stated the facts as follows:

The defendants Lewis H. Cole & Co., sued the defendant Shannon, in Lancaster county, January 17th, 1881, for $146.87, and, on the same day, upon affidavit alleging "that the said William Shannon departed from this State on the 10th instant with intent to defraud his creditors, among them the plaintiffs: that the said William Shannon is about to dispose of his property to Stevens, English & Bro., of Monroe, N. C. with intent to defraud his creditors." the clerk of the court of Lancaster county issued a warrant of attachment to the sheriff of Kershaw county, which was levied on defendant's land in Kershaw county, referred to in the plaintiffs' complaint, on January 17th, 1881. An order of publication was made January 27th, 1881, but, the defendant having been personally served with copy of summons at Charlotte, N. C., February 10th, 1881, the publication was discontinued, and an order for judgment by default was made at March Term, 1881. A transcript of this judgment was filed in the clerk's office of Kershaw county on — day of —, 1881, upon which execution was issued, under which the sheriff of Kershaw, on May 2d, 1881, sold the land of William Shannon, attached as aforesaid. At that sale Ira B. Jones purchased the land for $195, took sheriff's title and went into possession.

On February 18th, 1881, the plaintiffs also sued Shannon in Lancaster, and procured a warrant of attachment from the clerk of the court directed to the sheriff of Kershaw county. The affidavit alleged that "the defendant, William Shannon, is not a *resident of this State, but resides in the city of Charlotte, in the State of North Carolina." This attachment was also levied upon the same land of Shannon on February 23d, 1881. Judgment by default against Shannon was rendered at Lancaster on June 23d, 1881, and transcript docketed in the clerk's office of Kershaw county on July 16th, 1881.

Prior to both attachments, Shannon had executed a mortgage to Stevens Brothers & English to secure a note for $319.72 and interest. The defendant Ira B. Jones admitted in his answer that he purchased the land subject to the prior lien of this mortgage.

At February Term, 1881, the plaintiffs moved on the attachment papers, to vacate the attachment issued in the case first mentioned of Lewis H. Cole & Co. v. William Shannon, which motion was dismissed by his Honor Judge Fraser, then presiding. They then commenced this action to set aside all the proceedings, attachment, judgment and sale of the land under the judgment, so as to make the said land liable under their attachment and judgment. The defendants Cole & Co. insisted that their attachment and judgment were regular, and the sale of the land thereunder valid, subject to the mortgage debt aforesaid; that, even if the attachment proceedings were irregular, the motion of plaintiffs to vacate them having been dismissed and no appeal taken, the matter is now res adjudicata, so far as the attachment is concerned.

The case came on for hearing before Judge Witherspoon, who held that neither the attachment proceedings in the case of Lewis H. Cole & Co. v. Shannon, nor the judgment and sale under it to Ira B. Jones, were void, and dismissed the complaint. From this judgment the plaintiffs appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because the court erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding that a paper purporting to be a warrant of attachment issued by the clerk of a Circuit Court under the authority of section 252 of the code of procedure, was valid as such, although none of the facts specified in said section were made to appear by the affidavit upon which said paper was issued.

2. "Because the court erred it is respectfully submitted, in *holding that by a levy under a paper purporting to be a warrant of attachment issued by the clerk of a Circuit Court on January 17th, 1881, at the suit of the defendants Lewis H. Cole & Co., against the defendant William Shannon, upon an affidavit, 'that the said William Shannon departed from this State on the 10th instant with intent to defraud his creditors, among them the said Lewis H. Cole & Co., and that the said William Shannon is about to dispose of his property to Stevens, English & Bro., of Monroe, N. C., with intent to defraud his creditors;' the said Lewis H. Cole & Co. obtained a valid lien upon the land of the said Shannon described in the complaint, and one superior to that obtained by these plaintiffs, by a levy upon the said land under a warrant of attachment regularly issued by the said clerk on February 18th, 1881, upon an affidavit alleging 'that the defendant William Shannon is not a resident of this State, but resides in the city of Charlotte, in the State of North Carolina,' and regular in all other respects.

3. "Because the court erred in holding that on March 10th, 1881, the Circuit Court of Common Pleas for the county of Lancaster, in said State, had jurisdiction in the case, Lewis H. Cole & Co. against William Shannon, by virtue of an order for the publication of the summons in said action made by the clerk of the said court on January 27th, 1881, publication thereof commenced on February 20th, 1881, and personal service thereof upon the said Shannon in the State of North Carolina, on February 2d, 1881, and that a judgment rendered in the said cause upon the day first aforesaid in favor of the said plaintiffs and against the said defendant therein was so far regular as to authorize the issuance of an execution thereon and the sale of the land described in the complaint herein thereunder.

4. "Because the court erred in holding that these plaintiffs were not entitled to have the land described in the complaint herein, sold and the proceeds applied, first, to the payment of the mortgage debt due to the defendants Stevens Brothers & English, and next to the satisfaction of the amount due these plaintiffs on the judgment obtained by them against the said defendant William Shannon, set forth in the complaint, which judgment debt *became a lien upon the said land at the date of the attachment aforesaid.

5. "Because the court erred in holding that these plaintiffs were not entitled to have the land described in the complaint sold and the proceeds applied, first, to the payment of the senior liens held thereon by the defendants, Lewis H. Cole & Co. and Stevens Brothers & English, and, next, to the lien of these plaintiffs.

6. "Because the said court erred in dismissing the complaint."

These same plaintiffs, at the February Term of the court (1881) for Lancaster, after regular notice, made a motion to discharge the senior attachment of Cole & Co., upon the ground that the affidavit on which the attachment was issued was not sufficient, in that it averred the removal from the State and the purpose to dispose of his property by the defendant "with the intent to defraud his creditors," without stating any of the facts from which such inference was drawn, so as to enable the court to judge of the correctness of the conclusion. Judge Fraser heard the motion, and rendered judgment as follows: "The affidavit should have stated the facts on which the inference of the fraudulent intent was based. See 2 Wait Pr. 145, 146, and Smith & Melton v. Walker, 6 S. C. 174, 175, and [Brown v. Morris] 10 S. C. 467. The code, section 265, provides that in all cases a defendant may move to discharge an attachment as in other cases of provisional remedies. This, however, does not give the right to third parties. 'This privilege is not so extended as to allow a subsequent attachment creditor to move to vacate the prior attachment on the ground that it was irregularly issued. The only exception is where the attachment is founded on fraud, or what amounts to fraud.' See 2 Wait Pr. 184, and the cases there cited. It is, therefore, ordered that the motion be dismissed." From this judgment there was no appeal.

But now, ignoring that judgment, the plaintiffs are seeking to accomplish the same result in another way by this action, in which Judge Witherspoon held that the matter submitted to Judge Fraser was adjudged; and there is no specific exception to that part of his judgment. Whilst it was admitted in the argument here, that the ruling of Judge

Fraser was right, and, not *appealed from, was binding on the plaintiffs, yet it was contended that that ruling did not affect the question made in this action, as the plaintiffs here are not seeking to have the senior attachment set aside, but only "a determination of the question as to whether the lien acquired by them is not superior to any rights of Cole & Co." We confess we do not see the difference suggested. The new expression only states the same matter in a different manner. The "superiority" of the liens is unalterably fixed by their respective dates, unless that of Cole & Co. is set aside as void, which was the real question in the motion, and, so far as the attachment is concerned, is the question here. The form of this proceeding, being an action, is somewhat different from that on the motion; but, with reference to the distinction between direct and collateral assaults, this does not differ from that. The actors in both proceedings are the same persons, and both involve the same question as to whether strangers to the attachment could make the point.

There was no possible need of further testimony in the action, for the point was purely legal, and heard "upon the papers." We regard the question raised here, as to the invalidity of the attachment lien, as identically the same as that made in the application to Judge Fraser, and decided by him without appeal. The truth is, as to form, the proceeding by motion was the proper one, and in accordance with the universal practice upon the subject. It is clear that no other form of proceeding was contemplated by the code. See latter part of section 263, which declares that "in all cases the defendant, or any person who establishes a right to the property attached, may move to discharge the attachment as in cases of other provisional remedies." It has been decided that this provision includes a motion to discharge the attachment on the ground of invalidity or irregularity. Cureton v. Dargan, 12 S. C. 122. And, in the following cases, the question was made by motion of the defendant or his representative, and appealed to this court. Smith & Melton v. Walker, 6 S. C. 169; Brown v. Morris, 10 S. C. 468; Claussen v. Fultz, 13 S. C. 476. "Defenses and causes of action once presented and considered cannot be again asserted in another *suit without a violation of the principles of res adjudicata." Freem. Judg., § 284.

It is true, that the doctrine of res adjudicata does not apply to mere interlocutory orders made in the ordinary progress of the case. In such orders, granted or refused upon summary application, it has been held that they are not so far conclusive as to prevent the same matter being drawn in question again in the regular form of a suit. But the reason of that rule does not apply where the matter, conclusive and final in its character, is gravely discussed and the decision is appealable. Dwight v. St. John, 25 N. Y. 203. In that case, the plaintiff gave in evidence the papers upon a motion by the defendant in the Supreme Court to have the judgment canceled. Upon the coming in of the referee's report, the court denied the motion. The party brought an action to have the judgment canceled, and the court sustained the plea. The court said: "Upon this point it is to be observed that some decisions (made before the existence of the code), especially that of Simpson v. Hart, 14 Johns, 63, are chiefly based upon the ground that such summary proceedings as they passed upon, were heard without full proof, and were not reviewable; whereas, in the case before us, the hearing was upon full proofs, and the code has entirely taken away the other ground by making the proceedings liable to review. Since, then, a full hearing, with the right of appeal, was open to the defendant on that motion, how is he to avoid the binding effect of that decision, so far as it covers what was actually and necessarily tried?" Freem. Judg., § 325. So far as concerns the right claimed by the plaintiffs to question the validity of the attachment lien of Cole & Co., for alleged irregularity in the proceedings, the matter is res adjudicata. Exrs. of Tate v. Hunter, 3 Strobb. Eq. 145.

But, conceding this, it is insisted that the decision of Judge Fraser related only to the attachment, and did not undertake to decide the validity of the judgment obtained by Cole & Co. against Shannon, and the sale of the land thereunder to Ira B. Jones; that if the attachment itself is beyond their reach, they may still impeach the judgment, and set aside the sale upon another and distinct ground, viz.: On account of an alleged jurisdictional defect in the rendition of said judgment. It seems that the defendants Cole & Co. sued Shannon, and on the same day had the attachment above spoken of issued against him; that, as Shannon was absent from the State, they procured an order for publication against him January 27th, 1881, and publication was actually commenced on February 2d, but the summons having been personally served on the defendant in North Carolina, on that day the publication was discontinued, and on March 10th following, forty-two days after the order of publication, and more than twenty days after the actual service of the summons, the order for judgment was entered.

The defendant Shannon makes no objection to the judgment, and the plaintiffs, subsequent judgment creditors of Shannon, claim that they have the right to set aside said judgment, for the reason that it was rendered prematurely before sixty days from the order of publication had expired.

It will be observed that the plaintiffs were not parties to the action of Cole & Co., and had no possible connection with the judgment rendered in that case, except that they also were creditors of Shannon, and had attached the land in controversy when the judgment was pronounced.

This must, therefore, be regarded as a proceeding on the equity side of the court, for, as a new action at law, it could not be maintained even by the defendant Shannon, himself. His only remedy for alleged irregularity, or illegality in the proceeding which resulted in the judgment, was to move in the action itself to set it aside. "For the mere fact of its existence destroys the basis of right on which such subsequent action would have to rest. If the confession (judgment) is insufficient in form, or by any reason void, advantage must be taken of such fact by a motion in which the judgment was rendered, having for its direct object the vacation or modification of the judgment, and by appeal from the decision of the court on such motions. If no such direct proceeding is taken, the validity of the judgment cannot be collaterally called in question in any subsequent action at law." Southern Porcelain Manufacturing Company v. Thew, 5 S. C. 8.

Can third parties ask equitable relief to set aside a judgment *at law upon the ground of illegality or irregularity in the proceedings in which the judgment was obtained? It is certain by the general rule, that none but the parties to a judgment can have it set aside. As Mr. Freeman says: "Every litigant, if an adult, is presumed to understand his own interests, and to be fully competent to protect them in the courts. He has the right to waive all irregularities in proceedings by which he is affected and is entitled to exclusively decide upon the propriety of such waiver. To allow disinterested third persons to interfere in his behalf, and to undertake the management of his business, according to their judgment, would create intolerable confusion and annoyance, and produce no desirable result. To permit third persons to become interested after judgment, and overturn adjudications to which the original parties made no objections, would encourage litigation and disturb the repose beneficial to society." And again, at section 512: "No person will be permitted to proceed in equity against a judgment or decree to which he was not a party, and which did not at its rendition affect any of his rights. If the parties to an adjudication are satisfied with it, no outside persons will be permitted to intermeddle with it at law or in equity." "The court is not bound to set aside a judgment on any ground of error or irregularity, except at the instance of the defendant; judgment is not void because it is erroneous. If it be rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, it must stand until arrested or reversed." Camberford v. Hall, 3 McC. 345.

To this rule there are some well-recognized exceptions, limited, as we think, to those strangers to whom the judgment, if given full credit and effect, would be prejudicial in regard to some pre-existing right; and to the assertion of such rights as are known as equities, and administered in chancery. As, for instance, a junior judgment creditor may have an action to set aside a senior judgment obtained by imposition or fraud. It will be observed that this complaint does not allege matters either directly importing a fraud implicating the defendants Cole & Co., nor does it appear that any equity exists arising out of accident or mistake or any of the ordinary grounds of equity jurisdiction.

The question, then, arises, Have the plaintiffs an equity to set aside the judgment of Cole & Co. against Shannon upon the ground of irregularity in the proceedings at law? A judgment in its nature is final and conclusive. It is well settled that there must always be "some special grounds for relief other than error of law. All errors of decision and proceeding must be settled in the tribunal in which they originated, or by appeal to some appellate tribunal; and in no case will the Court of Equity take upon itself a revisory jurisdiction. A court of equity will not set aside or enjoin a judgment on the ground of error or mistake in the judgment of the court of law." McDowall v. McDowall, Bailey Eq. 330; [Attorney General v. Baker] 9 Rich. Eq. 531; Freem. Judg., § 487, and authorities.

It is earnestly insisted, however, that reference is here made only to "mere irregularities," that the principle does not apply where the defect involves the jurisdiction of the tribunal which pronounced the judgment; but that in such case the judgment is absolutely void, and all persons whose interests are affected injuriously thereby possess the right, in the nature of an equity, to have it declared a nullity at any time or in any court. This seems to us a new question. We remember no case like it in the books, except perhaps that of the Southern P. M. Company v. Thew, supra, in which the right was distinctly denied. We have not been referred to any case which goes to the extent here demanded.

The distinction between jurisdictional defects and mere irregularities, void and voidable, is well understood, but it is not so well settled what imperfections are mere irregularities or what are jurisdictional and make the judgment absolutely void. It would contribute much to certainty in the administration of the law, if some infallible test of the question in all cases could be found, but in the multitude of opinions upon the subject, we have not been able to find such principle. This difficulty is greatly increased when the question is made by third parties as an equity, in a jurisdiction other than that in which the judgment was rendered. In the case of Walker & Bradford v. Roberts, 4 Rich. 561, the court ventured to give a definition of irregularity, as follows: "Irregularity consists in omitting to do something necessary to the orderly progress of the action, or *doing it at an improper time. It does not affect the plaintiff's right of action."

But the question still recurs, What does and what does not affect the plaintiff's cause of action? The judgment of Cole & Co. was pronounced by the Court of Common Pleas, which had general jurisdiction. It certainly had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and made more than ordinary efforts to obtain jurisdiction of the person of the defendant Shannon. For the purpose of making him a party before the court, the land in controversy was attached, then an order of publication was made against him, which only stopped short of the "six weeks" required, for the reason that in the meantime Shannon had been personally served with summons in North Carolina. The defendant made no objection after actual notice, and now makes none. So far as the plaintiffs are concerned, no wrong was done them, and the point is purely technical.

Under these circumstances, can it be said that the court was so entirely without jurisdiction of the person of Shannon as to require us, at the instance of strangers and in another jurisdiction, to declare the judgment utterly void? We think not. It is not quite clear that the court did not have regular jurisdiction of the person of Shannon when the judgment was pronounced. It was rendered after the very land in controversy had been attached as the property of Shannon, after publication had been made against him, and more than twenty days after he had been personally served with summons in North Carolina. It is expressly declared in the code that the object of publication is notice. "When publication is ordered, personal service of the summons out of the State is equivalent to publication and deposit in the post office." And again, "From the time of service in a civil action, or the allowance of a provisional remedy, the court is deemed to have acquired jurisdiction and to have control of all the subsequent proceedings." Code, §§ 156 and 160. In New York, under similar provisions, there seems to be some difference of opinion as to when, in the case of personal service out of the State after publication, the service is complete. See 4 How. Pr. 246; 5 Id. 238; 7 Id. 313. But there seems to be no doubt that when an attachment has been issued, and no summons served, the court has jurisdiction and control of the proceedings for certain purposes. 6 How. Pr. 47.

But it is enough to say that the judgment was formally pronounced by a competent tribunal, and as against third parties all presumptions must be allowed in favor of judicial proceedings. Granting all that appears in the record, the defendant Shannon may have waived service. In Freem. Judg., at § 126, it is said: "There is a difference between a want of jurisdiction, and a defect in obtaining jurisdiction. At common law the defendant was brought within the power of the court by service of the brevin or writ. In this country the same object is accomplished by service of summons, actual or constructive, or some other process issued in the suit, or by the voluntary appearance of the defendant in person or by his attorney. From the moment of the service of process the court has such control over the litigants that all its subsequent proceedings, however erroneous, are not void. If there is any irregularity in the process or in the manner of its service, the defendant must take advantage of such irregularity by some motion or proceeding in the court where the action is pending. The fact that the defendant is not given all the time allowed him by law to plead, or that he was served by some person incompetent to make a valid service, or any other fact connected with the service of process, on account of which a judgment by default would be reversed upon appeal, will not ordinarily make the judgment vulnerable to a collateral attack. In case of an attempted service of process, the presumption exists that the court considered and determined the question whether the acts done were sufficient or insufficient. If so, the conclusion reached by the court, being derived from hearing and deliberating upon a matter which, by law, it was authorized to hear and decide, although erroneous, are not void. When, in a proceeding by attachment, the ground required by the statute for the issuing of the process has been laid, and the process has been issued and executed, the jurisdiction of the court is complete. Where there has been an insufficient publication, or an entire failure to publish, the proceedings are not so invalidated as to be made void." And many authorities in note.

*It is well settled that the purchaser under an execution not void, but voidable only, will be protected in his title; and that the objection cannot be made by third persons. In Henry v. Ferguson, 1 Bailey 512, which was an action of trespass to try title, the plaintiff claimed under an execution issued on a judgment in sci. fa. It was objected that the sci. fa. was irregular. Colcock, J., said: "It was unnecessary to consider whether the judgment produced was irregular or not, for it has been repeatedly decided that third persons cannot inquire into the matter. It was an authority, so long as it stood unreversed, to issue the execution." See Ingram v. Belk, 2 Strobb. 207 [47 Am. Dec. 591]; Lawrence v. Grambling, 13 S. C. 127.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON concurred in the result.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I concur in the result. It seems to me that the judgment in favor of Cole & Co. was not open to the attack of the plaintiffs, inasmuch as the only person who could take advantage of the alleged insufficient service of the summons was the defendant Shannon. In the absence of any objection from him, the court will presume that everything necessary to perfect the service was done, or that he, by voluntary appearance or otherwise, waived the necessity for service. So that, even if the first attachment should be regarded as void, yet the sale under the judgment might be supported as a sale under a junior lien; and as all that is asked for in the complaint, so far as we can learn from the case, is to have the sale set aside and the land resold, I concur in the result reached in the within opinion. Who may be entitled to the proceeds of the sale, is a question of much more difficulty, and, as we are not now called upon to decide it, I prefer to reserve my opinion.

Mr. Justice McIver dissenting.

Before Wallace, J., Chesterfield, September, 1881.

The opinion makes a full statement of the brief, excepting the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

As to the first ground of objection by defendant, the case of Moore v. Edwards, 1 Bailey 25, seems to be decisive. In that case the court held that it was competent for the court, under a sci. fa. to renew execution, to hear testimony in explanation of an entry of satisfaction on the fi. fa., and to vacate the entry if satisfied it ought not to be there. Under our present practice, a summons is substituted for the sci. fa., and under the summons the court would exercise the same jurisdiction as under a sci. fa. Lawrence v. Grambling, 13 S. C. 127.

Was the issuing of the summons in this case delayed until the plaintiff lost the right under the statutes to renew his judgment? In Lawrence v. Grambling, 13 S. C. 126, the court says: "Neither the provisions of sections 306 and 307 of the code, nor those of *section 15 of the act of 1873, prescribe any limit to the time within which a motion for leave to issue an original execution, or to revive one whose active energy has expired, must be made, and it must be concluded that any party having a judgment at the adoption of the code, or at any time since, can, on motion for leave, issue an execution, whatever might be the lapse of time since the entry of the judgment, provided it is not satisfied of record, or by lapse of time." The right to proceed under the act of 1873 to constitute a judgment obtained in 1872, a lien, before such judgment has been levied, seems to be equally unlimited in point of time as the right to issue executions. The proviso of section 14 of the act of 1873 relates to judgments that constitute liens. The judgment here has never been made a lien by levy or otherwise.

The defendant insists that the entry of satisfaction on the execution was a transaction in a public office that gave currency to the statute of limitations, and that the plaintiff is barred. It appears that the entry was made by the sheriff; that in point of fact there was no satisfaction. There is no evidence that either plaintiff or defendant had actual notice of the entry, or that the sheriff had any authority to make it. This state of facts will not give currency to the statute of limitations. As to the principle involved, see Miller v. Alexander, 1 Hill Ch. 25.

The administrator, F. L. Alsobrook, having been displaced by order of the court, and W. A. Evans having been appointed receiver of the estate, has by leave of the court, the legal right to control this judgment, and, therefore, it is competent for him to institute these proceedings. Whoever has control of a judgment by transfer, either actual or by operation of law, has the right of the original plaintiff.

It is ordered that the judgment entitled F. L. Alsobrook, administrator, against Thomas H. Watts, do constitute a lien upon such real estate as is of the estate of Thomas H. Watts, deceased, and that it be revived, and that plaintiff have leave to issue and renew execution thereon.

Mr. R. E. Allison, for appellant.

Mr. M. J. Hough, contra.

*541

*July 25th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. F. L. Alsobrook, administrator of the estate of Willis W. Alsobrook, deceased, obtained separate judgments against Elizabeth P. Alsobrook, the widow of the intestate, Townley Redfearn and Thomas H. Watts, on a note given by said Elizabeth for purchases at the sale of the estate, with the other parties named, and one Bevins, as her sureties. The judgments were for $10,466.87 each, besides costs, and were obtained in September, 1872. A short time after these judgments were rendered, Townley Redfearn obtained a release under seal of the judgment against himself from the administrator, and the sheriff endorsed satisfaction on the execution issued thereon, appending a copy of the release thereto, and on the execution against Watts he endorsed the following statement: "Returned to the clerk's office satisfied, except the costs. See release attached to execution in favor of same plaintiff v. Townley Redfearn for same cause of action, 7th of March, 1873."

The execution, however, was never returned to the clerk's office but was retained in the sheriff's office.

On August 15th, 1874, proceedings were instituted by summons, and complaint to open the entry of satisfaction on the Townley Redfearn judgment, and to set up the same against Redfearn. To these proceedings F. L. Alsobrook, Elizabeth Alsobrook, Townley Redfearn and Thomas H. Watts were made parties defendant, but before the cause was heard by the Circuit Court, Watts died, and his administratrix was never made a party until after the adjudication. The complaint demanded that the entry on the Redfearn execution should be adjudged fraudulent and void, but no reference was made to entry on the Watts fi. fa. This proceeding was successful as to Redfearn. Subsequently an order has been obtained to make the personal representatives of Thomas H. Watts parties, and it is stated that the cause has not yet ended, but to what extent it is still open and for what purpose does not appear. See Alsobrook v. Alsobrook, 14 S. C. 170.

W. A. Evans having been appointed receiver of the estate of Willis W. Alsobrook, instituted the present proceeding in 1881, by summons served upon Rose J. Watts, as administratrix of *Thomas H. Watts, to show cause why the said judgment against Thomas H. Watts should not be made a lien on the estate of said Watts, and a new execution issued to enforce the same. The judgment was obtained in 1872, when, under the law then existing, judgments had no lien, and this proceeding was instituted under the act to provide a lien in such cases. The summons required the administratrix to show cause at the next ensuing term of the court for Chesterfield county.

The administratrix appeared and resisted the motion upon the following grounds: 1. "That the entry of satisfaction in the case could not be annulled under a proceeding by summons or upon motion. 2. And if it can, the time within which it must be done had elapsed before notice of the motion was served. 3. That the motion to renew is barred by the statute of limitations, the entry of satisfaction having been made more than six years before service of summons. 4. That W. A. Evans, the receiver of the estate, cannot proceed under the statute to renew, he not being the plaintiff in the execution."

Judge Wallace, who heard the motion, overruled the objections of the respondent to the summons, and ordered "that the judgment in question do constitute a lien upon such real estate as is of the estate of Thomas Watts, deceased; that it be revived, and that plaintiff have leave to issue and renew execution thereon."

From this order Rose J. Watts, administratrix has appealed.

1. "Because, in the proceedings instituted in the Circuit Court to open the entry of satisfaction made on the judgment of Townley Redfearn, neither Thomas H. Watts nor his administratrix were parties.

2. "Because the entry of satisfaction on the judgment against Thomas H. Watts cannot be annulled under a proceeding by summons to show cause, or upon a mere motion as in this case.

3. "Because, if such right exists, the time in which to do so under the statute had passed, and it was too late to start the proceeding when the notice of the motion was given in this case.

4. "Because the right to open or annul the entry and endorsement of satisfaction on this judgment was barred by the statute of limitations more than six years after the entry of satisfaction *thereon, and before legal notice of these proceedings having expired.

5. "Because W. A. Evans, the receiver, has no right in this informal way to annul the entry of satisfaction, he not being the plaintiff in the judgment, and more especially as the plaintiff, F. L. Alsobrook, and Thomas H. Watts, the defendant, have not been made parties.

6. "Because the Circuit judge has erred in finding, as matter of fact, that there is no evidence that either plaintiff or defendant had actual notice of the entry of satisfaction, or that the sheriff had any authority to make it, for this question of fact could only be determined after said persons had been properly made parties.

7. "Because the fact is, that this entry of satisfaction having been made in a public office and placed on the judgment, and suffered to remain there on record for more than six years, and until after the death of Thomas H. Watts, the evidence may be said to be conclusive that plaintiff and defendant, and the sheriff, had the knowledge that the Circuit judge, in the order aforesaid, held they did not have."

It may not be improper to state that this last ground is more in the nature of argument than exception. The object of exceptions is to present distinct propositions of law or fact, as the case may be, in which error is claimed, and which it is desired that this court shall review, and unless this is done the exception amounts to nothing.

The questions raised and principally discussed in the argument of appellant's counsel are: First, as to the form of proceeding, and, second, as to the bar of the statute of limitations. The right of W. A. Evans, as receiver, to institute the proceeding, though made a ground of appeal, is not questioned in the argument, and we suppose, therefore, that it has been abandoned. But whether this be so or not, we can see no legal objection to the receiver's right in this respect. As receiver, he no doubt was authorized to collect the assets of the estate, and was invested with all the power necessary to that end; at least, in the absence of all showing to the contrary, we must assume this to be the fact, and, therefore, must hold that there was no error in the ruling of the Circuit Judge as to this point.

*The matter as to the form of the proceeding presents a more serious question, and is really the question in the case. Under the code, as originally adopted, final judgments did not of themselves constitute a lien on either the real or personal estate of the judgment debtor. This remained the law until the act of 1873 (15 Stat. 498), which amended the previous act so as to give liens to such judgments, and with the view to place judgments which had been obtained before this last act upon the same footing with those obtained afterwards, this act further provided that in cases where judgments had been obtained after the 1st day of March, 1870, (the day of the approval of the code,) a like lien may be obtained by the service of a summons upon the judgment debtor, or, if he be dead, upon his executors or administrators, to show cause, if any he or they may have, why said judgment should not be and become a lien in accordance with the provisions of this act, and if no sufficient cause be shown to the contrary, such judgment shall be and become a lien on all the real property of the judgment debtor. Lynch Code 313.

Here seems to be express authority for the proceeding below. By this act, a summons to show cause is the statutory mode, and the only mode known to the law to effect the end desired by the plaintiff. This act seems to anticipate that the debtor might be able to show some cause why the judgment should not have the lien, and the object of the summons is to allow him an opportunity to present it. But why permit this, if, the moment his cause is presented, the judge is ousted of jurisdiction? The language of the act is "that if no sufficient cause be shown to the contrary," of course, in response to the rule, "such judgment shall be and become a lien." * * * Who is to determine as to the sufficiency of the showing, but the judge before whom the summons may be returnable?

The act does not confine the debtor in his response to the summons to any special cause which alone may be considered and adjudged by the court, but leaves the cause open, only limited by the term "sufficient." The debtor may return payment, release, or any legal objection to the judgment accruing after the original determination. If this be not the proper construction of the act, what could have been its purpose and *intent? If the court, under the summons, is not authorized to judge and determine the sufficiency of the cause, and must stop whenever any cause is seriously urged, and remit the parties to an action by regular summons and complaint, the act would be useless, and the remedy provided therein an idle ceremony, barren and fruitless.

Independent of the analogy suggested by the Circuit judge arising from the old proceeding by sci. fa. to revive judgments as found in the case cited by him, (Moore v. Edwards, 1 Bailey 24,) we think that by the express terms of the act providing a remedy in cases of this kind—a remedy to meet an evil which, without this act, was remediless—the form of proceeding adopted here was the proper and only mode within the reach of the plaintiff. This judgment had no lien. The act under which he proceeded was the only law by which he could obtain lien, and the mode prescribed was the only mode which he could have adopted. There was no error, therefore, in the Circuit judge overruling the objection of appellant.

We do not see the pertinency of plaintiff's exceptions as to the time within which the motion to have the lien of the judgment established should be made under the statute, nor to the fact that neither Thomas H. Watts, nor his administratrix, Rose J. Watts, were parties to the action against Townley Redfearn. The act of the general assembly, under which the plaintiff was proceeding, fixes no limit to the privilege therein provided, and for this court to assume to do so would be judicial legislation. As to the second objection, even if it be true that these persons were not made parties, how does that fact affect this proceeding? It may or may not have been necessary to have the Watts estate represented in the action against Redfearn, and that question might probably have been well raised in that action, but this is a proceeding independent of that, and has no necessary dependence upon the question of parties there.

The appellant interposes, lastly, the statute of limitations, insisting that the entry of satisfaction on the fi. fa. became a part of the record, and having remained in a public office from September 21st, 1872, until the spring of 1881, that this gave *currency to the statute, and that the plaintiff was barred. In reply to this, Judge Wallace said: "That it appears that the entry was made by the sheriff when, in point of fact, there was not satisfaction. There is no evidence that either the plaintiff or defendant had actual notice of the entry, or that the sheriff had any authority to make it. This state of facts will not give currency to the statute of limitations. As to the principles involved, see Miller v. Alexander, 1 Hill Eq. 25."

We have seen nothing in the brief to conflict with the facts as found above by Judge Wallace, and we concur in the legal principle which he applied to these facts. The entry by the sheriff on the Watts execution seems to have been an entry of his legal conclusion drawn from the transaction between F. L. Alsobrook and Redfearn and endorsed on the Watts execution of his own motion, without any authority, as far as we can see, from any of the parties. It was, therefore, the sheriff's unauthorized act, and wholly outside of his duty or powers. It was, in fact, the act of a stranger, and could not give currency to the statute of limitations as to the parties interested.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. I concur. An entry of satisfaction without authority is a nullity, and may be entirely disregarded. The plaintiff may proceed as if there was no such entry, taking the risk of showing that such entry was without authority. If that does not appear, the proceeding may be dismissed as premature; but if it does so appear, the matter must be considered precisely as if no such entry had ever been made.

Mr. Justice McIVER. I dissent. To constitute a sufficient foundation for a proceeding like this there must be a judgment apparently open and unsatisfied. In response to a summons to show cause why such a judgment should not be made a lien, the defendant may show for cause that although the judgment appears upon its face to be open and unsatisfied, yet, in fact, it has been paid or otherwise extinguished. But when the so-called judgment, which it is attempted to make a lien, shows upon its *face that it is satisfied, it can no longer be regarded as a judgment, for payment or satisfaction extinguishes a judgment. When, therefore, as in this case, a summons is issued to make an alleged judgment a lien, which bears upon its face an entry of satisfaction—is satisfied of record—there is no foundation for the proceeding, as the very record which the plaintiff brings before the court as a judgment shows upon its face that it is no longer a judgment, but it has been extinguished by satisfaction. The plaintiff shows himself out of court. It seems to me, therefore, that before the plaintiff was entitled to have the so-called judgment in this case made a lien, it was necessary for him, by proper proceedings, to have the entry of satisfaction vacated, so that the record, which he brought before the court as a judgment, asking to have it made a lien, should not bear upon its face the evidence that it was no longer a judgment.

It is true that the Circuit judge says, in his decree, that this proceeding was taken to vacate the entry of satisfaction as well as to renew the execution and make the judgment a lien; but this is obviously a mistake, for, in the agreed statement of facts contained in the "Case," all that is said is, that it was "a summons to show cause why the said judgment should not be made a lien on the estate of Thomas H. Watts, deceased, and a new execution issued to enforce the same;" and the correctness of this statement is fully borne out by an inspection of a copy of the summons furnished us at the argument here (as it was agreed might be done), from which it appears that the defendant was not called upon to show cause why the entry of satisfaction should not be vacated. For aught that appears, the respondent below, who is appellant here, may have been taken by surprise when, at the hearing in the Circuit Court, the proceedings in the case of Alsobrook v. Redfearn, which were clearly incompetent as res inter alios acta, were introduced to show that the entry of satisfaction ought to be vacated.

Judgment affirmed.

A petition was filed for a rehearing of this case, but the court, by its order filed December 8th, 1883, refused the petition, stating that the alleged errors had already been gravely and *earnestly considered by the court; and, further, that the issue before the court being the right of the plaintiff to revive the execution in the manner proposed, nothing had been adjudged upon the subject of payments and compromises which, in the petition, were alleged to have been made.

REED v. REED.

(April Term, 1883.)

[1. Attorney and Client ⚡90.]

The written admission of service of summons by a duly authorized attorney would probably be binding upon the defendant, but acceptance of service by an attorney having no authority so to do, does not constitute a legal service.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sullivan v. Susong, 40 S. C. 158, 165, 18 S. E. 268.

For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 165; Dec. Dig. ⚡90.]

[2. Process ⚡67.]

Where a defendant expressly refused to authorize his attorney to accept service of summons for him, the court could not imply such authority, except perhaps upon a principle of estoppel in proper cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 54, 161; Dec. Dig. ⚡67.]

[3. Attorney and Client ⚡90.]

Where the plaintiff's attorney is referred by defendant to his solicitor for negotiations before suit, and afterwards such attorney is informed that "the case must take the usual course," the solicitor in the negotiations has no implied authority from defendant to accept service of summons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 165; Dec. Dig. ⚡90.]

[4. Process ⚡67.]

The acceptance of service in this case was made under a misapprehension, and efforts were promptly made by defendant's attorneys to have the mistake corrected without disadvantage to plaintiff; there is, therefore, nothing here to affect the faith and confidence of members of the profession towards each other, and no ground of estoppel.

*July 31st, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The only question raised by this appeal is as to the validity of the service of the summons and complaint. The facts as gathered from the "Case" are substantially as follows: On August 8th, 1883, Mr. Magrath, as attorney for the plaintiff, addressed a note to the defendant, stating that he had been instructed by her to institute proceedings which would materially affect the relations thereafter to exist between them as husband and wife, but he expressed a hope that a conclusion might be reached by consent of all parties, which would avoid the necessity of a public trial, and to this end he expressed a willingness to coöperate with any professional gentleman who might be designated by the defendant as his representative. To this letter defendant replied, saying: "I beg leave to refer you to Wm. Elliott, Esq., of Beaufort, as my solicitor in the matter to which you have referred." Accordingly, these gentlemen seemed to have had a conference upon the subject referred to in the correspondence, and as a result thereof certain propositions were submitted by Mr. Elliott to the defendant, who declined to accede to them. Mr. Elliott informed Mr. Magrath of this result, stating that the instructions of defendant were, "that the case must take the usual course."

After the negotiations had failed, Mr. Elliott asked the defendant whether he should accept service of the papers for him, and was instructed not to do so. Mr. Magrath, upon receiving notice that the case must take the usual course, prepared the summons and complaint, and sent them to Mr. White, his associate counsel, at Beaufort, to be served. On September 22d, 1882, Mr. White called at the office of Messrs. Elliott & Fowles, and asked for Mr. Elliott, and being informed that he was absent, asked for an acceptance of service of the summons and complaint in this case, as it was regarded as important that the service should be made on that day, so that the case could be docketed for trial at the next succeeding term. Mr. Fowles, being ignorant of defendant's instructions not to accept service for him, and with the understanding, as he supposed, that what he did was subject to the approval of Mr. Elliott upon his *return, signed the acceptance of service in the name of "Elliott & Fowles, attorneys for J. S. Reed."

Immediately upon the return of Mr. Elliott, he was informed by Mr. Fowles of what he had done, when the latter was notified of defendant's positive instructions not to accept service for him, and was requested to let Mr. White know at once of these instructions, which was accordingly done. Mr. White then went to the office of Messrs. Elliott & Fowles, where he was informed by Mr. Elliott of Reed's instructions; that Mr. Fowles had signed the acceptance of service in ignorance of such instructions and that it would be necessary to serve Reed personally. Mr. White objected that unless the service was made by the twenty-second of that month, it would be too late to docket the case for trial at the approaching term of the court. Upon being assured by Mr. Elliott, that if he would have Reed served at once, no question would be raised as to his right to docket the case for trial at the approaching term, Mr. White took all the papers and gave the copies to the sheriff to be served on the defendant. The deputy sheriff went to the defendant's usual place of residence, and finding that he had gone to a summer resort a few miles distant in the same county, returned the papers to Mr. White without serving them, and he returned them to Mr. Elliott, who, as soon as he received them, sent them back to Mr. White with a letter informing him that the acceptance of service could not be recognized.

Soon after this Mr. Elliott received notice from Mr. Magrath that "in the interest of his client he would have to consider the papers as served." Whereupon the motion was made for an order "setting aside the alleged service of the summons and complaint herein, and for such other relief as may be just." The Circuit judge refused the motion, and thereupon this appeal was taken, by which the real question made is, whether the acceptance of service by Messrs. Elliott & Fowles, as attorneys for defendant, was a valid service upon the defendant.

In the code of 1882, section 155, the manner in which a summons must be served is prescribed, while section 159 prescribes the different modes by which such service shall be proved, one of which is by the written admission of the defendant, and *section 160 declares that "a voluntary appearance of a defendant is equivalent to personal service of the summons upon him." It is quite clear that the summons in this case was not served in any one of the modes prescribed by section 155, and, therefore, the practical inquiry is, whether there has been any written admission of service by the defendant, or whether he has made voluntary appearance in the action. It is not pretended that there was any written admission of service by the defendant in person, nor that he has made voluntary appearance to the action.

The question, therefore, is narrowed down to the inquiry whether the admission of service by the attorneys of defendant amounts to the same thing as a written admission of service by himself in propria persona. For while the code does not, in terms, provide that the written admission of service by the defendant may be made by one duly authorized so to do by the defendant, yet we suppose that, upon well settled principles, an admission so made would be binding upon the defendant. Hence it will be necessary for us to determine in this case whether the act of the attorneys in signing the acceptance of service was duly authorized by the defendant.

There is no evidence whatever that any express authority was ever given by the defendant to attorneys to accept service for him, but, on the contrary, it distinctly appears that he had explicitly refused to confer such authority upon his attorneys, and this would seem to be conclusive of the question. The court could not obtain jurisdiction of the person of the defendant until he had been made a party in some one of the modes prescribed for that purpose. He had a perfect legal right to require that he should be legally served with process, and he alone could waive this legal right, and when he expressly refused so to do, certainly no one could lawfully assume to waive this right for him. It is manifest, therefore, that there was no legal service of the summons in this case and no waiver of such service by any one authorized so to do.

The respondent, however, contends that although there was no express authority given by the defendant to his attorneys to acknowledge service, yet such authority could and must be implied from the letter of the defendant to the senior counsel for plaintiff, in which he refers that counsel "to Wm. Elliott, Esq., as my solicitor in the matter to which you have referred." In the first place, it would be going very far to imply an authority in the face of the undisputed fact that the defendant had expressly refused to confer such authority, and a court would scarcely ever resort to such an implication, except, perhaps, upon the principle of estoppel to prevent manifest wrong or injustice, which, as we shall presently see, does not apply in this case.

But in addition to this it is, to say the least of it, very doubtful whether the terms of that letter would authorize such an implication. That letter was in reply to one which manifestly looked to the very commendable purpose of adjusting the matters in dispute by private negotiation rather than by a suit at law, and the letter of defendant may well be regarded as referring to Mr. Elliott as the counsel who was authorized to represent him in such negotiation, and this Mr. Elliott did. But when the negotiations failed and Mr. Elliott communicated the result to Mr. Magrath, with the statement that "his instructions are that the case must take the usual course," the parties were placed at arms'-length, and the plaintiff, if desirous of bringing an action, could only do so in the usual way, by service of a summons in some one of the modes prescribed by law, without regard to what had previously passed between the parties while engaged in the abortive attempt to arrange the matter by negotiation. We do not think, therefore, that the letter of the defendant to Mr. Magrath should be regarded as containing even an implied authority to Mr. Elliott to accept service for the defendant.

It has been earnestly urged upon us that this view will tend to impair, if not destroy, "all faith and confidence in the acts and conduct of the members of the profession" in their dealings with each other; but we do not apprehend that any such result is likely to ensue; if we did we would, indeed, hesitate long before announcing a conclusion which would lead to such unfortunate consequences, for we yield to none in our high appreciation of the importance of preserving that high tone which has always characterized the profession; but in this case we are unable to see anything calculated to excite such an apprehension. The defendant is here insisting upon a plain legal right which we are bound to accord to him; and there is absolutely nothing in the conduct of his attorneys which can properly be regarded as in anywise a departure from the strict line of courtesy and fair dealing which should always characterize the members of a high-minded liberal profession.

The utmost that can be said is, that the junior member of the firm, under a misapprehension of the facts, undertook to accept service for the defendant, with the understanding, as he supposed, that he did so subject to the approval of his senior when he returned; but as soon as he learned that he had acted not only without authority, but contrary to the positive instructions of his client, which had not previously been communicated to him, doubtless because his senior, who alone had been consulted in the matter, was absent on professional business, immediately informed the counsel for the plaintiff of his unintentional error, so that he might, by having the defendant properly served, repair the defect; and counsel for plaintiff was given the assurance that if the defendant were then properly served, as it appears might have been done, no obstacle should be thrown in the way of docketing the case for trial at the approaching term.

What more could they have been expected to do? They had no power to make the acceptance of service valid or to waive the necessity for service; but they proposed to the counsel for the plaintiff that if the defendant should then be served, so as to make him a party in court, subject to its jurisdiction, they would then waive all such notices as might be necessary to secure the docketing of the case for trial, which they would have had the legal right to do under the provisions of title 12, chapter 11, part II., of the code of procedure. If this had been done, as it might have been but for the failure of the counsel for plaintiff to act upon this offer, then the object of plaintiff's counsel would have been accomplished, and the case would have been ready for a hearing at the then approaching term of the court. But the counsel for the plaintiff having failed to avail themselves of this offer, and having elected to stand upon the acceptance of service by the attorneys for the defendant, as a legal service, cannot be said to have been misled to their preju*dice, and, therefore, there is no room for the application of the doctrine of estoppel.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

[2. Judgment ⇨139.]

In an action for foreclosure, a judgment by default was rendered and sale ordered, which was made, the property being bid off by plaintiff's attorney, who transferred his bid to a stranger, and such stranger complied and received titles. Afterwards, motion was made by defendant to open the default upon the ground of excusable neglect, and the motion was granted and the sale and title-deed annulled. Held that the Circuit judge erred in directing the sale and deed to be set aside.

Before Hudson, J., Richland, April, 1883.

Action by Harriet Le Conte against Margaret Irwin. The opinion states the case.

In granting the motion, Judge Hudson said:

This case came on to be heard before me upon a report of sale by the master and a motion to confirm the same, and upon a motion by the defendant to set aside the judgment and vacate all proceedings thereunder. The last motion was supported by affidavits, and counter-affidavits were read in opposition thereto. * * *

It is in the discretion of the Circuit judge, upon such a motion as this, to vacate a judgment obtained against a party by his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect. The only ground upon which I can vacate this judgment is that *of excusable neglect, and the irregular, if not illegal, mode of entering and enforcing the judgment for money and foreclosure and sale. This operated as a surprise and hardship upon the mortgagor, entitling her to ask relief.

If it would result in irreparable injury to the purchaser at the sale, I would not disturb vested rights under the decree, or set aside the sale; but this property having been bid in by the plaintiff's attorney, which is the same thing as the plaintiff himself, and William H. Monckton, being the assignee of the plaintiff's bid, steps into the plaintiff's shoes, and can be fully protected by subrogating him to the plaintiff's rights under the bond and mortgage for the amount paid by him, together with the expenses in connection with the transaction and the examination of the title, and interest thereon.

It is therefore ordered that the decree in said cause, and the sale made thereunder by the master of the premises set forth in the complaint, be and the same are hereby vacated, set aside and annulled, and that the defendant, Margaret Irwin, have leave to file an answer to the complaint herein within twenty days from the date of this order. * * *

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The plaintiff held a bond of the defendant, secured by mortgage of a house and lot, for $849, with interest from date, October 7th, 1880, (with the privilege of paying twenty dollars per month until the whole should be paid,) payable in four equal annual installments. Neither the bond nor the mortgage contained a stipulation that in default of payment of one installment the whole was to become due. So that $212.25, besides interest, became due on October 7th, 1881, and a like sum on the same days in 1882, 1883 and 1884.

On October 13th, 1881, the plaintiff instituted proceedings to *foreclose the mortgage. The defendant was served with summons, but made no defense. The case was referred to the master, and on July 25th, 1882, he filed his report, stating correctly that there was due the first installment and interest, $319.17, and the further sum of $636.75 was not due, whereupon Judge Witherspoon, July 28th, 1882, ordered that the defendant, Margaret Irwin, should, on or before the 1st day of September, 1882, pay to the plaintiff the whole bond, $955.92, and in default thereof the house and lot should be sold. Under this judgment, the master, N. B. Barnwell, Esq., offered the house and lot for sale on sales-day in November, 1882, and it was bid off by Mr. Marshall, plaintiff's attorney, for $750, and the bid was entered to "J. Q. Marshall, attorney." The bid was afterwards transferred by J. Q. Marshall to W. H. Monckton, and on February 7th, 1883, John T. Seibles, Esq., master of Richland county, and successor of N. B. Barnwell, Esq., who had made the sale, executed and delivered to W. H. Monckton a deed for the premises, he having complied with terms of sale.

On February 8th, 1883, the day after the titles were executed as above stated, the defendant, Mrs. Irwin, through Mr. Lynch, her attorney, gave notice of a motion to set aside the judgment and all proceedings thereunder, upon two grounds: "First, that if certain money paid by the defendant to the plaintiff or her agents had been properly credited upon said bond, no right of action would have accrued to the plaintiff; and, second for surprise in this that the defendant was not aware until judgment had been obtained against her, that the payments referred to had not been credited upon the bond, and for such other relief as may be just, &c." Judge Hudson heard the matter upon affidavits in connection with the master's report on the sale, and granted an order setting aside the judgment, on the ground of "excusable neglect," on the part of the defendant, Mrs. Irwin, when the judgment and the order of sale were entered against her, and gave her permission to answer. He also set aside the sale made under that decree, and the title executed to Monckton, who had been served with notice of the proceedings.

From this order both Mrs. Le Conte and

Monckton appeal *to this court upon the following exceptions: "1. Because his Honor refused the motion of plaintiff to confirm the master's report of sale. 2. Because his Honor considered as evidence of the value of the property, the statements of defendant's counsel in argument. 3. Because his Honor concluded that there was error in the decree of Hon. I. D. Witherspoon, Circuit judge, filed in said case. 4. Because his Honor vacated the decree and the judgment in said cause upon the ground of error therein. 5. Because his Honor decreed that the sale to W. H. Monckton should be set aside and annulled, and that the deed executed by the master to said Monckton should be delivered up to be canceled."

Section 195 of the code, among other things, provides that "The court may, in its discretion, and upon such terms as may be just, at any time within one year after notice thereof, relieve a party from a judgment, order or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect, and may supply an omission in any proceeding," &c. An application for relief under this provision is addressed to the discretion of the Circuit judge, and, unless he commit some error of law, there is practically no appeal to this court. If the application is decided entirely upon the facts submitted, this court is shut out from reviewing them by the limit to its jurisdiction. Gibbes v. Elliott, 8 S. C. 63. If the "discretion" given to the Circuit judge is not to be considered as "a mental discretion to be exercised ex gratia, but a legal discretion to be exercised in conformity to law," still, the provision allowing the relief is remedial in its character, and this court will not undertake to reverse an order vacating a judgment rendered by default, except in cases of "gross abuse of the discretion of the court." Freem. Judg., § 106. It is true, the application in this case was greatly delayed, and confusion has resulted therefrom, but it was made within the year allowed, and was granted by the Circuit judge. The showing upon which it was granted is not before us, and we cannot say that the judge abused the discretion allowed him in setting aside the judgment and giving the defendant an opportunity to be heard. To that extent, the order must stand.

*But the more difficult question still remains—whether it was error on the part of the judge to set aside the sale made under the judgment, and the titles executed by the master to Monckton. The decree by default for the sale of the house and lot, regular in form, but excessive in the amount of money required to be paid, was entered July 28th, 1882. The house and lot were sold in November, after titles were executed to Monckton on February 7th, 1883, and the day after (February 8th, 1883,) the proceeding was instituted which resulted in setting aside the judgment as above stated. Under these circumstances was it error in the judge, upon a mere motion, to set aside the sale and titles made to Monckton by the officer of the court, before the regularity of the order of sale or judgment was assailed? If Monckton himself had been the purchaser at the master's sale, we suppose there could be little doubt upon the subject. There are some cases to the contrary, but we believe it settled by the great preponderance of authority, that property acquired by a bona fide purchaser at a judicial sale under orders regular in form and voidable only, shall not be affected by a future reversal or vacation of the judgment.

We cannot state the principle in clearer terms than those employed by Mr. Freeman: "Courts have always construed the law so as to impart confidence to judicial sales by protecting purchasers thereat from those ill consequences which the latter might suffer if the title acquired by them depended upon the freedom of prior proceedings from all errors of law. It was thought to be unjust to require purchasers to suffer for errors committed by the judges of the subordinate courts, and impolitic by making such a requirement to discourage bidders at such sales, and thereby to expose large amounts of property to the hazard of being sacrificed at nominal prices. Therefore, it is a rule nowhere disputed, that third persons purchasing at a sale made under the authority of a judgment or decree, not suspended by any stay of proceedings, thereby acquire rights which no subsequent reversal of such judgment or decree can in any respect impair." Freem. Judg., § 484 and notes.

But conceding this, it is urged that in this case Monckton is not a bona fide purchaser; that he only took the bid of Marshall, *who bid off the property "as attorney for Mrs. LeConte," the plaintiff, and the matter must be considered precisely as if she, Mrs. LeConte, were making the question. It does not strike us in that way. If Mrs. LeConte had purchased the property, and were now before the court defending her title to it, probably it might be opposed that she was not a bona fide purchaser for the reason that she paid for it with her own judgment, which had been set aside; but that cannot be said as to Marshall or Monckton. The ground on which the judgment was opened was not the error in the amount to be paid, of which the attorney of plaintiff might be supposed to be cognizant, but that it was taken by default under circumstances which authorized the court afterwards to open it. The application for that purpose was not made until after the sale, transfer and execution of titles to Monckton. Up to that time, the secret vice in the judgment had not appeared, and was as entirely unknown to the attorney of the plaintiff as to a stranger.

We do not see why the attorney of the plaintiff, after judgment rendered and entered, may not be a bona fide bidder at a judicial sale fairly conducted, as well as any other person. He has no duty to perform that is inconsistent with the character of purchaser. The law looks with jealousy upon contracts between an attorney and his client to the disadvantage of the latter, but here there was no contract with the client. Miles v. Ervin, 1 McC. Eq. 524 [16 Am. Dec. 623]. The complaint is not made by the client plaintiff, but by the defendant. The interests of defendants in general require that everybody may bid. If the plaintiff's attorney is forbidden to bid, the defendant is thereby injured by the decrease in competition. If an attorney complies with his bid, or procures another to do it by payment out of his own funds, on what grounds is it less a bona fide bid than if made by some other person? He stands in a position different from that of a party to the suit, and in a similar position to that of a third person purchasing, and ought to be subject to none of the perils of the former, but entitled to all the rights of the latter. Freem. Judg., § 484.

It may be matter of regret that, when Mrs. Irwin was sued, she did not present her case to the court, or, having failed to do

*so, that she did not seek relief sooner. But it was delayed until after the legal title had been conveyed to Monckton, and the court is always reluctant to disturb vested rights, especially in summary proceedings by mere motion. Orr v. Orr, 7 S. C. 381.

The judgment of this court is, that so much of the judgment of the Circuit Court as set aside and ordered to be canceled the conveyance of the master, Seibles, to William H. Monckton, bearing date February 7th, 1883, be reversed.

DUNSFORD v. BROWN.

(April Term, 1883.)

[1. Guardian and Ward ¶164.]

Action being brought by a ward, after his majority, against his guardian, simply for an account, ignoring a settlement had between them and making no allegation or proof of any misrepresentation, undue influence, imposition or fraud, the settlement and receipt are a bar to the action, and the complaint should be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 546; Dec. Dig. ¶164.]

[2. Account ¶8.]

It was error in the Circuit judge, at the trial, to treat an action for an accounting (which was barred by an unassailed settlement and receipt between the parties) as changed into a direct attack upon the settlement and receipt. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Cent. Dig. § 22; Dec. Dig. ⚭8.]

[3. Guardian and Ward ⚭146.]

Amendments before trial may be allowed with great liberality to the end that the action may not be defeated for errors of form merely; but amendments at a later stage of the cause, "conforming the pleadings to the facts proved," should not be ordered where thereby the parties are surprised or misled, or the issues are wholly changed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hall v. Woodward, 30 S. C. 575, 9 S. E. 684.

For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 493; Dec. Dig. ⚭146.]

[4. Account ⚭19.]

Where a receipt in full is pleaded in bar of the accounting demanded by the complaint, it is error to order the account stated until the plea in bar has been disposed of.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Cent. Dig. § 100; Dec. Dig. ⚭19.]

[5. Guardian and Ward ⚭164.]

A settlement made between a guardian and ward on the day after the ward attained his majority, and a receipt in full then given by the one to the other, are conclusive upon the ward, if there was, on the part of the guardian, no concealment, misrepresentation, imposition, fraud or personal advantage secured.

*July 31st, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action in the nature of a bill in equity by Francis W. Dunsford against Thomas R. Brown, his late guardian and his sureties on the guardianship bond, for an account of his guardianship. Brown, the defendant, the sureties concurring, pleaded in bar to the account asked for, that on May 21st, 1880, after the plaintiff had attained to the age of twenty-one years (the day after), the said guardian had a settlement with his ward, the plaintiff, in the Probate office for Richland county, before Andrew Crawford, Esq., then Probate judge, and with his concurrence, and upon that settlement the said Probate judge ascertained that the sum of $1,496.78 was due to the said ward, the plaintiff, which was paid in full to the said plaintiff, who, being entirely satisfied with the settlement, received the money and gave his receipt in full, drawn by the said Probate judge, absolving him from all further responsibility in connection with the guardianship, and which is in the following terms:

"Received, Columbia, January 9th, 1880, of Col. Thomas Brown, guardian of Francis W. Dunsford, fourteen hundred and twenty-eight dollars due to said ward from the guardian aforesaid, to be retained by me as judge of Probate, until a final discharge shall be granted to said guardian.

"Andrew Crawford, J. P."

"Also this 10th April, 1880, four hundred and twenty-eight dollars, due on Mrs. A. G. Adams' bond.

"Andrew Crawford, J. P."

"Received, Columbia, May 21st, 1880, of Andrew Crawford, judge of Probate, fourteen hundred and ninety-six seventy-eight one hundredths dollars, in full and final settlement of all claims I have against my guardian, Thomas R. Brown, and I do in this manner absolve him from all responsibility in connection with the guardianship, as I am now twenty-one years of age. And I take this step after the judge of Probate has fully explained everything to me connected with my affairs.

"F. W. Dunsford."

"Witness, J. Meighan."

*562

*The case was referred to Nathaniel B. Barnwell, Esq., the master, "to take the testimony upon all the matters of fact arising on the pleadings, to state the accounts and to report the same," &c. The master reported the facts to be substantially as follows:

In 1860, the plaintiff, Francis W. Dunsford, was left an orphan, being under two years of age, and was taken by his grandfather, R. J. Dunsford, a poor man, and supported and clothed by him for eleven years. It seems that at that time the child was entitled to a handsome estate in the hands of one Jesse Drafts, his first guardian, who died intestate in August, 1865. The administrators of Drafts, the guardian, refused to account for any of the estate of the ward which had been received by their intestate, the first guardian, claiming that it had been invested in Confederate bonds and lost. At that time, soon after the war, it was difficult to get any one to accept the appointment of guardian, in order to test the responsibility of Drafts, for the ward's estate; but, finally, a neighbor, William Weston, was prevailed upon to take the guardianship in August, 1870.

He found that neither Drafts nor, after his death, his representative, had rendered any assistance to the ward, who had been supported by his grandfather, R. J. Dunsford, as before stated; and, in doing so, the grandfather had contracted a debt to Weston of something over $600. Weston, as guardian, employed counsel and instituted two suits against the representatives of Drafts. At first he was unsuccessful; but, finally, he succeeded in getting a compromise, by which he secured for the ward the sum of $4,205.38, which, without his efforts, might have been lost. Out of this money thus secured for the ward he paid an account to the grandfather, R. J. Dunsford, for the support and maintenance of the ward for eleven years, at the rate of $100 per year, aggregating $1,100, for which he returned a voucher; retaining out of that sum his debt against R. J. Dunsford.

On July 23d, 1873, upon his own application, Weston was discharged as guardian, and Thomas R. Brown, the defendant, was appointed his successor, the then judge of Probate, Sanders D. Swygert, Esq., passing the following order: "It is ordered that the letters of guardianship of the personal estate of the *said Francis W. Dunsford, heretofore issued to William Weston, be and are hereby revoked, and that the said William Weston be and he is hereby required to transfer to his successor, Thomas R. Brown, such portion of said estate of the said infant which has come into his hands, and has not been disbursed, and be discharged from further accountability in respect thereto." Thomas R. Brown received from his predecessors the portion of the estate which had not been disbursed, and continued guardian until the settlement with the ward and discharge before stated.

The object of the action was not only to have an accounting de novo from Brown, the last guardian, but, also, through him, to reach alleged errors in the accounting of Weston, and make Brown and his sureties liable therefor on the ground that he, as last guardian, should have held Weston, his predecessor, to a strict account of the ward's estate, and especially for the $1,100 paid by Weston to the grandfather for the support and maintenance of the ward before he became guardian. The master, disclaiming any right to decide the legal question involved, except so far as was necessary in stating the accounts, restated, not only the account of Brown, disregarding his settlement with the ward and his discharge by the judge of Probate, but went back beyond Weston's discharge, and restated his accounts, disallowing $500 of the money paid to the grandfather, and charging Brown with the same, and also with some small matters of counsel fees paid by Weston, &c.

Both parties excepted, and the case came on to be heard before Judge Kershaw, who held that the Probate Court, upon proper proceedings, could grant a final discharge to a guardian who had fully accounted in that court, which might be pleaded in bar of an accounting sought in another court: that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is an estoppel between the parties in regard to all matters which might have been properly brought into consideration in the action; and that the judgment of the judge of Probate, in discharging Brown, could not

"If the plaintiff, therefore, would have attacked this judgment, his very first step in the present action should have been to seek the judgment of the court to vacate it in order that he *might reach the account concluded by that order. This, however, he has not done, but has come into court on a complaint for an accounting alone, which is the very matter in respect of which he is concluded. Ordinarily, this would be the end of plaintiff's case; but it has happened here that, notwithstanding the estoppel, he has been permitted to speak the truth. All the evidence and arguments upon the issue presented by the complaint and answers have been heard, which might have been heard had the proceedings been in the first place to set aside the order of discharge, and, also, for an accounting, which would undoubtedly have been the plaintiff's proper course of procedure. The question, therefore, presents itself. Shall the court proceed to give the judgment which, upon the evidence before it, justice demands, or shall it dismiss the complaint without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to proceed de novo as indicated?"

The judge then, supposing that he had the power, under section 194 of the code, to amend the complaint before or after judgment in furtherance of justice, so as to conform it to the facts found, regarded the form of action as changed into a direct attack upon the settlement, receipt and discharge, and, in that view, pronounced judgment, setting aside not only the settlement and discharge of the Probate judge, but the receipt of the plaintiff himself, and ordering Brown to account de novo for his own transactions; but exonerating him from accountability on account of the alleged errors in the account of his predecessor, Weston.

From this decree both parties appealed to this court upon numerous exceptions, relating, for the most part, to different items of the account, but, from the view taken, it will not be necessary to set them out at length, or to consider any of them except the defendant's. 1. "That his Honor erred in refusing the motion of defendants to dismiss the complaint, the cause of action therein stated not being sustained." We think the first view of the Circuit judge was the correct one, viz., that the action being simply for an account against Brown and his sureties, ignoring the existence of the settlement and the receipt in full of the ward after he came of age, and the discharge of the guardian by the Probate judge, could not be maintained. *and should have been dismissed. The judge of Probate has jurisdiction in relation to the duties imposed by law upon guardians, and the management and disposition of the estates of their wards, and certainly some consideration is due to a settlement made by a Probate judge between a guardian and his ward, and his consequent discharge of the guardian.

As well stated by the Circuit judge, "the first point to be considered, was as to the effect of the settlement in the Probate court, and the receipt of the plaintiff to the defendant, Brown, as guardian, and the discharge of the latter by the order of the judge of Probate." These were, at least, prima facie good, and must remain in full force and effect until set aside in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. If, as alleged, they were informal or irregular, that could not be reached by a collateral proceeding. The scope of the plaintiff's action was for a simple account, collateral in its character, and under it the settlement and discharge could not be assailed; and it seems to us that, after trial on the issues joined, and without actual amendment, it was too late to consider the whole form and character of the action changed, and to pronounce judgment according to the new form given to it.

It is true that the provisions of the code are very liberal in allowing amendments, and we are thoroughly in accord with that spirit, in so far as it presents the requirements of form from degenerating into mere technicalities; yet it seems to us that it may be possible to fall into the opposite extreme, and in the effort to dispense with all form, to produce confusion, uncertainty and injustice. Section 194 of the code is in these words: "The court may, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process or proceeding, by adding or striking out the name of any party, or by correcting a mistake in the name of a party, or a mistake in any other respect, or by inserting other allegations material to the case, when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense, by conforming the pleading or proceeding to the facts proved."

This certainly gives a large discretion in the matter of amendments, but the provision itself shows that some limit was contemplated. The power is given to conform the pleadings to the facts proved only, "when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense." When does it do so? This is one of the questions under the code upon which there is great diversity of opinion. Several of the States have a provision identical with ours, but the decisions upon the subject are not in accord. Mr. Pomeroy, at section 566 of his work on "Remedial Rights," says: "In giving a practical interpretation to this clause of the codes, a conflict of decision has arisen among the tribunals of the different States which it is impossible to reconcile." This much, at least, may be considered certain, that there is a difference in the practice as to amendments before and after judgment. As to those before trial, we think we can see a good reason for great liberality, as it is not desirable to defeat an action for error of form, merely, if there is merit in it. In such case the party proposing an amendment is put on terms as to costs, &c., and the defendant is entitled to notice and time to meet the case made. Cleveland v. Cohrs, 13 S. C. 400; Coleman v. Heller, Id. 494.

But it is not so clear what should limit the power of making amendments after trial, "conforming the pleadings to the facts proved." In the section from Pomeroy above cited, he goes on to say, that whilst a different rule is adopted in some States, "the rule is settled by one class of cases, and prevails in certain States, that in all the voluntary amendments which a party may make, as a matter of course, in his own pleadings, and in all amendments before trial, &c., he cannot under the form of an amendment change the nature and scope of his action; he cannot substitute a wholly different cause of action in place of the one which he attempted to set up in his original pleading. * * *

In respect to the amendments made at the trial, or on appeal, or by the court upon its own motion, great freedom is used, provided the parties are not misled and surprised, and the issues to be decided are not wholly changed, &c. When evidence has been received without objections, making out a cause of action, &c., the utmost liberality is shown by the court in conforming the averments of the pleadings to the case as proved, if the ends of justice will be subserved thereby, &c."

*As we understand it, the fundamental principle of pleading is, that the matter upon which the judgment of the court is sought shall be clearly stated, and the party charged notified, that he may make his own answer to it. It is not mere form, but substance, that such party shall have an opportunity to be heard upon the very issue that is to be decided, for he is necessarily surprised if one issue is tried and another decided.

The Circuit judge was doubtless led to consider the cause of action as changed in form by the fact that the master had already taken the testimony on the accounting, and it seemed to him useless to dismiss the case only that it might be resumed in a different form. He says: "But it has happened here that, notwithstanding the estoppel, he has been permitted to speak the truth. All the evidence, and all the arguments upon the issues presented by the complaint and answer have been heard, which might have been heard had the proceedings been in the first place to set aside the order of discharge," &c. But who could say whether the defense would not have been different, and other testimony offered, if the action had been to vacate the proceedings, instead of for a simple account? At all events, the defendants never had an opportunity to meet the new issue.

Besides, under the issues joined, it was error to order the account stated until the matter pleaded had been disposed of. Until that was done, it was premature to state the account, and the testimony was inadmissible, except as taken to save time and subject to objection. We think it was error, after trial, to consider the whole cause of action changed by amendment and a new issue made. Wait's Anno. Code 324 and notes. As was said by the chief justice in Fitzsimons v. Guanahani Company, 16 S. C. 197: "We think it was error on the part of the judge thus, in the midst of the conflict, to change the whole character of the action from the cause upon which it was originally established to a new basis not appearing in the pleadings, and without opportunity on the part of the defendant to meet and resist it."

But if the action had been brought directly for the purpose of setting aside the settlement and discharge, we do not see the evidence to sustain that judgment. There can be no doubt that a settlement was made with the ward after he came of age, who *received the money, gave his receipt in full, and the guardian was discharged by the Probate judge. We suppose that the settlement and discharge were not prima facie involved, and what evidence is there to impeach the transaction? The only circumstance tending in that direction is the fact that the settlement was made soon after (the day after) the ward came of age, but that alone was not sufficient to overthrow it, if there was on the part of the guardian, Brown, no concealment, misrepresentation, imposition or fraud.

There is a nice principle of law, that a settlement made by a guardian with his ward soon after he comes of age, is, on account of the relation of the parties, looked upon with great jealousy and scrutinized closely. Judge Story states the principle as follows: "But courts of equity proceed yet further in cases of this sort. They will not permit transactions between guardians and wards to stand even when they have occurred after the minority has ceased, and the relation becomes thereby actually ended, if the intermediate period be short, unless the circumstances demonstrate in the highest sense of the terms the fullest deliberation on the part of the ward and the most abundant good faith (uberrima fides) on the part of the guardian." 1 Story Eq. Jur., § 317.

Apply this test to the facts here, and it seems to us that they come up to the rule. It appears that in the settlement the guardian did not secure to himself any personal advantage, but that every dollar received by him and not disbursed, was paid over to the ward. This circumstance distinguishes the case from that of Hylton v. Hylton, 2 Ves. 549, and other cases of that class, where the ward made a donation to his late guardian. Over and above the claim that Brown should account for the errors, if any, of his predecessor, Weston, which was unfounded, the whole extent of the complaint against him was, that he retained illegally a few dollars for his expenses in going to Columbia, and paid too much for counsel fees and commissions to the judge of Probate. He was instructed by his legal adviser to pay these demands, they were vouched by the Probate judge, and, whether the payments were properly made or not, *they did not touch in the remotest degree the question of his good faith.

It certainly does not appear that there was on the part of the guardian any concealment, misrepresentation or fraud. It seems to us that he acted with great frankness and fairness. The settlement was not made privately, but publicly, in the Probate office. The judge of Probate stated the accounts, and explained them to the ward. The accounts were not complicated or difficult to understand. The estate did not consist of securities, as to the value of which there was concealment, as in Womack v. Austin, 1 S. C. 421; but in cash then paid over. Mr. Crawford, the Probate judge, testified: "After having explained the matter as fully as I could with the lights before me. I drew up the receipt at the instance of all the parties. I also read it over to Dunsford carefully, after explaining to him the contents; the information I gave Dunsford being based upon the statement I had received from Colonel Brown and Captain Huguenin, Colonel Brown having assured me that the final return contained a full statement of all the estate of the ward he had received, which was otherwise shown upon the signing of the receipt; I paid over to Mr. Dunsford the money referred to in the receipt. Mr. Dunsford in no way questioned the proceedings; if he had, I would not have granted the final discharge; could see, as he drew it, was rather jubilant at getting the $1,400." Brown testified: "We tried to see the judge of Probate on the day Dunsford was twenty-one years of age, but he was not at his office, and I and Dunsford remained here (Columbia) that night and the next day, that is, the day after he was twenty-one years old; we had the settlement in the judge of Probate's office, when he signed the receipt produced here. I should say that Dunsford had explained to him all the particulars of the estate, because Crawford explained them to him, and Crawford asked him if he was satisfied, and he said 'yes.' Nothing was concealed from him; that is a thing I would not do," &c.

We think that the guardian acted with perfect good faith, that he derived no personal bounty or advantage from the settlement to himself, and that the ward was informed so far at least as Brown's transactions were concerned.

*570

*The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the complaint be dismissed.

A petition for rehearing was filed, upon which, December 4th, 1883, the following order was passed:

PER CURIAM. We have reread the brief in this case and carefully considered the grounds stated for a rehearing.

First. It is claimed to have been an oversight in the court to proceed upon the assumption that Thomas R. Brown was discharged as guardian by the Probate judge. The judgment of this court is not based upon that assumption. The evidence upon the subject was not overlooked, but was carefully examined before the judgment was pronounced. The Circuit judge considered the discharge proved, and it did appear in the settlement between Brown and his ward on May 21st, 1880; that there was an item of $12 (charged with the knowledge of Dunsford) for "letters dismissory," and from the proof in the case it is clear that all the parties, the Probate judge, Brown and Dunsford, understood as a matter of fact that the Probate judge had discharged the guardian; yet as there was not in evidence any formal proof of an order of discharge, the judgment of this court was rested on the settlement between the parties pleaded in bar, which, under an action for simple account, ignoring entirely the existence of the settlement, was conclusive between the parties, there being neither allegation nor proof of any misrepresentation, undue influence, imposition or fraud in the said settlement. McDow v. Brown, 2 S. C. 95; Murrel v. Murrel, 2 Strobb. Eq. 148 [49 Am. Dec. 664].

Second. It is further suggested that the defendant had abandoned the defense of "settled account" in the office of the Probate judge. This matter also was considered before the judgment was pronounced. The cause had been referred to the master merely to take the testimony and state the account. In making his report he did make the statement that "this transaction was at first relied on by the defendants as a bar to the further accounting, but they subsequently abandoned their position." But it appears that the defendants excepted to this report upon the ground that "the master erred in striking out any of the vouchers presented by the defendant, Brown, his duty being to state the account as presented, with the testimony given in their presentation, leaving the decision of their admissibility to the court."

The difficulty was produced by the order "to state the account" before the plea in bar was disposed of. At first the defendant objected to going into the account at all until the plea was disposed of, and that was the logical order of proceeding; but as the order of reference required the accounts to be taken, the defendants abandoned that position so far as to allow the evidence to be taken and the account stated, but still insisted that its admissibility should be left to the decision of the court. After this, Judge Kershaw considered the question, applying the evidence thus taken to the plea in bar, and deciding it adversely to the defendants; they appealed to this court, "Because his Honor held that the receipt given by the plaintiff is in no sense a bar to the accounting." In this court both parties argued this question. Under these circumstances, it was impossible to disregard a formal plea on the record, never withdrawn and still contested, for no other reason than a statement of the master that the defendants "had abandoned their position." Such statement of the master was not binding, and the whole conduct of the case shows that he misapprehended the position that was abandoned.

It is always matter of regret that any party should be misled; but, in the face of the facts, this court was bound to consider the plea of settlement, which was formally made and never formally withdrawn; but, on the contrary, was considered on the Circuit, made prominent in the appeal to this court, and argued here by the counsel on both sides, and which, in fact, constituted the defense; and, therefore, we cannot see how it can be properly said that the petitioner was misled.

Third. As to the claim of the petitioner to charge Brown with alleged errors in the accounts of Weston, the former guardian, this court simply concurred with Judge Kershaw that it could not be allowed.

The petition for a rehearing is refused.

[1. Judgment ⚡12.]

A judgment rendered against a party at that time deceased, is void, notwithstanding his sole executor was a defendant in the same action, but in his individual capacity.

5. A new trial nisi granted by this court.

[This case is also cited in Turner v. Malone, 24 S. C. 406, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, October, 1882.

This was an action by Jonas B. Bragg against W. W. Thompson and Roddy Landford, executor, commenced September 10th, 1880. The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

August 22d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. In May, 1877, one R. M. Smith, as administrator, obtained a judgment before Trial Justice A. B. Woodruff, Esq., for $74.47, against J. B. Landford, Roddy Landford and William Landford, defendants. A transcript of the judgment was filed in the clerk's office of the county, and execution issued thereon in the usual form, addressed to the sheriff of Spartanburg county, signed by the trial justice, but tested, "witness, F. M. Trimnier, clerk of the said court of *Spartanburg, October 12th, 1877," with the official seal of the clerk attached. At that time the defendant, W. Wash. Thompson, was sheriff of Spartanburg county, and, by direction of Smith, the plaintiff, he levied the execution on a certain tract of land as the property of William Landford, one of the defendants in execution, and sold the same at sheriff's sale; and it was bid off by one L. Landford, for $235, but he transferred his bid to the plaintiff Bragg, who paid the bid and received sheriff's titles.

From the proceeds of sale thus received, the sheriff paid Smith, the plaintiff, $74.61, taking from him a refunding receipt for the amount paid to the trial justice, Woodruff, costs $8.25; clerk's costs, $3.75; advertising, $2.80; his own costs, $9.28, and $25.00 to J. S. R. Thomson, on an order of Roddy Landford, executor, leaving in his hands the sum of $111.31, as to which the sheriff received notice from Roddy Landford, as executor, not to pay it out to any one except to him, as the sole surviving executor of William Landford, deceased. The sheriff testified that until after the above payments were made, "he had no knowledge or suspicion as to any defects in the judgment, and said payments were made in good faith and without notice." Afterwards, upon some claim, the character of which did not appear, the said tract of land was recovered by one Elias Landford from the purchaser, Jonas B. Bragg, who thereupon commenced this action against W. Wash. Thompson, the sheriff, to recover back the purchase-money paid by him for the land so lost. The plaintiff was allowed to prove by parol that, at the time the suit was brought before the trial justice, two of the parties named as defendants were dead, viz., J. B. Landford and William Landford. It appeared that of the parties sued, only Roddy Landford was served, and that he was the sole surviving executor of William Landford.

The Circuit judge charged the jury that, if William Landford was dead, prior to the suit, the transcript judgment was absolutely void as to him, which rendered the sale of the land as his property also void, and the plaintiff had the right to recover the money, with interest, from the one who undertook to sell the land and received the money for the same; that in such sale the *rule of caveat emptor did not apply; "that even if defendant paid out the money in good faith, and without knowledge of William Landford's death, he is still liable for the whole amount, and his only recourse was back upon those to whom he had paid the money; that there was a presumption in favor of the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Pleas, but no such presumption obtained in relation to trial justices' courts; that transcripts from such courts only had effect to authorize the sheriff to make such levy as the constable could not make; that the sheriff had no right, from what appears on this execution, to presume that such judgment and execution were regular and valid. When jurisdiction is wanting in a trial justice's court, the purchaser gets nothing, and is entitled to recover back the money paid. The presumption of all being right, does not apply to the execution in this case," &c. Under the charge of the judge, the jury found for the plaintiff $269.06, the whole amount of the purchase-money, with interest, and the defendant, W. Wash. Thompson, appeals upon the following exceptions:

1. "In admitting testimony to show that William Landford was dead before the suit commenced against him.

2. "In ruling that such fact could be shown in a suit at law like the present.

3. "In charging that if William Landford was dead prior to said suit against him, the judgment was absolutely void and not worth the paper it was written upon.

4. "In charging the jury that if they find no summons had been served on William Landford, and that they are obliged so to find, then, as a legal consequence, the judgment and sale are void, and the plaintiff has the right to recover the money from the one who undertook to sell, and who received the money on such sale.

5. "In charging that at such sale the rule of caveat emptor does not apply.

6. "In charging that plaintiff was further entitled, upon recovery, to interest from commencement of the action upon the amount paid defendant.

7. "In charging that even if defendant paid out the money in good faith and without knowledge of Wm. Landford's death, *he is still liable for the whole amount, and his only recourse is to recover from those to whom he has paid.

8. "In charging that none of the parties to whom defendant, W. Wash. Thompson, has paid money, are proper or necessary parties to this action.

9. "In refusing to charge that, under the facts and testimony in this case, the jury cannot find a verdict against W. Wash. Thompson in this action.

10. "In refusing to charge the jury that, under the facts and testimony in this case, the jury cannot find against W. Wash Thompson a verdict for the money which in good faith and without notice he paid to R. M. Smith.

11. "In refusing to charge that it devolved upon Bragg to show that both himself and his assignor were ignorant of the facts, before Bragg can recover the $235 in this action.

12. "In refusing to charge that the defendant, W. Wash. Thompson, can in no event be held liable in this action for that part of the money paid out in good faith to Dr. R. M. Smith, before any notice from plaintiff, and without knowledge of the defect in the judgment.

13. "In refusing to charge that R. M. Smith is a necessary party to this action.

14. "In charging that the sheriff has no right, from what appears on this execution, to presume that said judgment and execution were regular or valid, and that no such presumption obtained in relation to trial justices' courts, and that transcripts from such courts only had effect to authorize a sheriff to make such levy as the constable could not make."

We do not regard it necessary, in this case, to consider the difference between a judgment obtained in the Court of Common Pleas and one rendered before a trial justice in respect to the force of presumptions in the two cases respectively, for that distinction is only of consequence when the inquiry is whether the judgment is merely voidable for irregularity, or is absolutely void on account of some jurisdictional defect. If the latter, testimony is admissible to show it either in collateral or direct proceedings, and the result must be the same, without reference to the character of the jurisdiction in which the judgment was *obtained. As William Landford was dead before suit was brought against him, and his surviving executor, Roddy Landford (although one of the defendants), was not sued or served as the executor of William Landford, we must consider the judgment as to him absolutely void, without regard to the jurisdiction in which it was rendered.

But the important question is, whether the execution, as it went into the hands of the sheriff, was in form regular, or so irregular as fairly to put W. Wash. Thompson, as an officer, upon his guard, and make it his duty to go down to the office of the trial justice and look through the whole record to see if it was formal and legal before he ventured to obey the positive mandate it contained, requiring him to execute it. The sheriff is a ministerial officer. He is neither judge or lawyer. It is not his duty to supervise and correct judicial proceedings; but, being an officer of court, ministerial in character, he cannot impugn its authority nor inquire into the regularity of its proceedings. His duty is to obey. This principle applies alike to him, whether the execution issues from a court of general or limited jurisdiction. "It is too well settled to be questioned, that in an action against a ministerial officer, whether it issue from a court of general or of limited jurisdiction, if the process be regular upon its face—as to him it is a sufficient protection—he is not bound to look behind it. Nor is the protection of the judgment at all necessary." Traylor v. McKeown, 12 Rich. 251. And see Hunter v. McElhany, 2 Brev. 104; McCool v. McCluny, Harper 489; Foster v. Gault, 2 McMull. 336; McWorter v. Reid, 1 Hill 369.

This is the general law as is well stated in Herm. Exec., § 151: "One of the effects or final process is the protection which it affords to the officer while acting according to its exigencies. Being the delegated agent of the court, if the court has jurisdiction to issue an execution, the officer to whom such writ is directed, and all his deputies under it, are protected. He is protected whether the execution issued from a court of general or limited jurisdiction, although such court has not, in fact, jurisdiction of the case or even of the debtor, provided it appears on the face of the writ that the court has jurisdiction of the *subject-matter, and the process in other respects shows no want of authority, and whether it is regular or irregular is of no importance to the officer, except when he participates in the irregularity. The law affords him this protection for the reason that he, being an officer of the court, cannot impugn its authority nor inquire into the regularity of its proceedings." &c. See Freem. Exec., § 101; Crock. Sher., §§ 283, 56.

Was the execution, under which the sheriff acted, issued by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and regular in form? The plaintiff insists that the execution was irregular and void upon its face, for the reason that, being based on a transcript judgment from a trial justice's court, it was not issued by the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas as the law directs. Section 87 of the code provides that, "A trial justice, upon the demand of a party in whose favor he shall have entered a judgment, shall give a transcript thereof, which may be filed and docketed in the office of the clerk of the Circuit Court of the county where the judgment was rendered. The time of the receipt of the transcript by the clerk shall be noted thereon and entered in the docket; and from that time the judgment shall be a judgment of the Circuit Court," &c. And subdivision 13 of section 88, concerning rules of procedure in trial justice courts, declares as follows: "If the judgment be docketed with the clerk of the Circuit Court, execution shall be issued by him to the sheriff of the county, and have the same effect and be executed in the same manner as other judgments and executions of the Circuit Court," &c.

In this case the transcript judgment was duly docketed and enrolled. The execution thereon was in the usual form, and after reciting that judgment had been rendered in the trial justice court against J. B. Landford, Roddy Landford and William Landford, as appears by the judgment-roll in the office of the clerk of Common Pleas for Spartanburg county, was signed by A. B. Woodruff, trial justice, but tested by F. M. Trimmier, clerk of the court, under his official seal. Can it be said that this process was not issued by the clerk? It was his signature and seal that stamped it an execution; and we do not *see that they were less effective for that purpose by being on the margin of the paper which was signed by the trial justice. Under the old practice in this State, process was generally signed by the attorney and tested by the clerk by signing his name and affixing his seal in the margin. That was "issuing" the process. Worcester's definition of "issue" is "to deliver," "to send forth judicially." Under a provision similar to ours, it has been held in New York, that after a judgment rendered in the district court has been docketed in the Common Pleas, the execution thereon may be issued by the attorney for the judgment creditor. It is not necessary that the clerk should issue it. Wait's Anno. Code 91, and authorities.

The execution, regular in form, was at least prima facie evidence that the trial justice had jurisdiction to render the judgment, and we think that the sheriff should be protected in everything he did in the due and proper execution of that process. Any other doctrine would paralyze the arms, and necessarily destroy the efficiency of ministerial officers. According to this view, it was error in the Circuit judge to charge that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the whole amount, "even if defendant paid out the money in good faith and without knowledge of William Landford's death, and his only recourse was to recover from those to whom he had paid." The sheriff only did what appeared to be his duty when he paid the plaintiff, Smith, the amount of his judgment, and the tax costs of the case, amounting to $98.69, and, as to this amount, the plaintiff should not recover against him.

As to the remaining portion of the purchase-money, $136.31, the verdict may be maintained. It is true that there was no warranty at the sheriff's sale, and it is also true that the plaintiff voluntarily paid the money; but after the facts of the case appeared, it is manifest that Roddy Landford, as executor of William Landford, deceased, is not entitled to receive it as defendant, the judgment and costs being paid. The sheriff holds it merely as stakeholder, and it may be regarded as having been paid by the plaintiff under a mistake of facts, to a person who has no grounds in conscience to retain it. Glenn v. Shannon, 12 S. C. 570; Burns v. Ledbetter, 56 Tex. 282.

*The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial, unless the plaintiff shall, within ten days after written notice of this judgment, remit on the record of the Circuit Court the sum of $98.69, the amount of the judgment of Smith, and the tax costs of the case paid out by W. Wash. Thompson, as sheriff, in the performance of his office duty.

[1. Appeal and Error — 1177.]

Where a Circuit judge thought the evidence greatly preponderated against the verdict, and that under the old practice of the Court of Appeals, a new trial would be granted, but that under our present constitution less authority over this matter was vested in the Circuit Courts, he underrated his power as a Circuit judge, and committed error of law in refusing a new trial.

[Cited in Norris v. Clinkscales, 47 S. C. 512, 25 S. E. 797, to the point that Const. S. C. art. 14, § 26, was intended to exclude the influence of the judge in molding verdicts.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. ⚡183.]

Before Pressley, J., Spartanburg, March, 1882.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. W. E. Earle, Duncan & Sanders, for appellant.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson, Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

August 22d, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This was an action to recover damages for burning nine bales of cotton, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant company, at Gaffney City, in Spartanburg county. This cotton was deposited near the railroad track, on a platform built by the town authorities, but had not been receipted for by the agent of the company when it was destroyed by fire. Much testimony was offered, and the judge was requested to charge several points of law, which he did, rather favorably for the defendant corporation, but the jury found for the plaintiff the value of the cotton, $450.

*Whereupon the defendant moved for a new trial, which the judge refused upon the following grounds: "In this case a motion is made for a new trial, on the ground that the preponderance of testimony was greatly on its side. That is my opinion, and under the practice of the Court of Appeals, under our old constitution, this must be regarded as a case in which that court would have granted a new trial. But I think the spirit of section 26, article IV., of the new constitution, restricts the powers of the present judges in matters of fact, and that a new trial now should not be granted, unless the testimony be very clearly against the verdict of the jury. The motion is therefore refused."

The defendant appealed to this court upon numerous exceptions, alleging errors to the charge, and in refusing to charge various points of law; but, from the view taken, it will be unnecessary to consider any of them, except the last four, which are as follows: 10. "Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in holding that section 26, article IV., of the constitution, restricts the powers of Circuit judges in granting new trials, when the verdict is against the preponderance of the testimony. 11. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in holding that he had no right, under the constitution, to grant a new trial, notwithstanding the verdict was against the preponderance of the testimony. 12. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in holding that he had no power to grant a new trial, notwithstanding this was a case in which the old Court of Appeals must have granted one. 13. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in not granting a new trial."

If the Circuit judge had exercised his untrammelled judgment in refusing to grant the new trial moved for upon the ground of the preponderance of testimony, that judgment could not have been reviewed by this court. It would have been the final judgment of the officer appointed by the law as the appellate tribunal in such cases. Steele v. Railroad Company, 11 S. C. 591. But we think it was quite a different thing for the Circuit judge to refrain from exercising such judgment, in the view that he was restricted by the constitution from granting a *new trial for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law of this State.

Certain machinery has been adopted for the administration of justice, and although the single purpose is to secure to the citizen the protection of the law according to the very truth of the case, yet it consists of several separate and distinct parts, and to secure the purpose in view it is necessary that these parts should all act in harmony, each performing independently the functions assigned to it. A judgment is the compound result of law and facts, and if either element is wrong the result must be wrong. In cases tried by a jury, it is made the duty of the judge to announce the law; but it has been thought best that a jury of the vicinage, after hearing the law announced, should determine the facts, and in most cases render a general verdict, subject always to correction, in case of error of law, by appeal to this court, and in case of error of fact by the Circuit judge ordering a new trial.

Our present constitution, proceeding on the view that it is important in the trial of a jury case to keep the law and the facts distinct, does provide that "judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." Article IV, section 26. This provision has received construction in several of our cases, and it has been held that "the real object of this clause is to leave the decision of all questions of fact to the jury exclusively, uninfluenced by any expression of opinion by the judge, whose position would naturally add great weight to any opinion he might express upon any question of fact arising in a case. The judge should carefully avoid expressing any opinion he may have formed from the facts, leaving it for the jury to draw their own conclusions unbiased by any impression which the testimony may have made upon the mind of the judge." State v. White, 15 S. C. 392.

But we do not regard this provision of the constitution, which relates merely to the occasion of the trial, and was intended to exclude the influence of the judge in moulding verdicts, as indicating a spirit which should restrict the powers of the judge in respect to the very important and independent duty intrusted to him of granting new trials in jury cases. Upon this latter subject, there is certainly no express inhibition in the constitution as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of evidence, and the legislature has expressly declared that: "The Circuit Courts shall have power to grant new trials in cases where there has been a trial by jury, for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in courts of law of this State." Gen. Stat. (1882) § 2113. And section 286 of the code also provides that, "the judge who heard the cause may, in his discretion, entertain a motion to be made on his minutes to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial upon exceptions, or for insufficient evidence, or for excessive damages," &c.

There is no part of the whole machinery used in administering the law more important than this power to grant new trials in cases tried by a jury. When we consider the inexperience of juries, and their great power, not only to find what the facts are, but to apply them to the law, which is involved in the right to give a general verdict, we see at once that occasional mistakes may be made, and, in the interest of justice, it is absolutely necessary that there should be lodged somewhere the unrestricted power, not to mould verdicts by particular views of the facts, but simply to give the parties the right to be heard again before another jury. Without such power there can be no certainty or consistency in the administration of the law. As we understand it, this power exists in our system in full force and without restriction.

The inhibition in the constitution against the judge expressing his opinion of the facts to the jury on the trial, should have no effect whatever in restraining the exercise of the power to grant new trials, which is entirely independent of the restriction as to charging juries on the facts, and is possibly only the more necessary on account of that restriction which leave juries very much "a law unto themselves." This power, without restriction, has been lodged by the law in the Circuit judge, and this court has declared that it is error of law in him to decline to exercise it on the ground that he has not the right to do so. Steele v. Railroad Company, supra. It is not only the right of the Circuit judge, but his exclusive right. Neither the Supreme Court nor any other tribunal in the State possesses the power, and if he refuses to exercise it promptly on all proper occasions, this very important means of securing justice will be entirely lost. The law expressly makes it the duty of the Circuit judge to grant new trials "in cases where there has been a trial by jury, for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law of this State."

In this case the Circuit judge informs us "that in his opinion the evidence for the defendant greatly preponderated, and according to the practice of the old Court of Appeals in this State, that court would have granted a new trial." Under these circumstances we think that he underrated his power as Circuit judge, and committed error of law in refusing the motion of the defendant company for a new trial. State v. David, 14 S. C. 430.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside and the case remanded for such further proceedings as may be deemed proper according to the conclusions herein announced.

Before Cothran, J., Spartanburg, June, 1882.

The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Messrs. R. K. Carson, Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

August 29th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Mrs. Dean, the defendant, of Spartanburg county, South Carolina, being pressed by debt, solicited a loan of money from John Rutherford, of Bridgewater, North Carolina. The arrangement was made at Spartanburg, South Carolina, by which Mrs. Dean gave her note to Rutherford for $7,000, as follows:

"$7,000.00. Three years after date, I promise to pay to John Rutherford, or order, at Bridgewater, N. C., seven thousand dollars, with interest from maturity, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, for value received.

"Witness my hand and seal, this 3d day of June, 1874.

"Mary Owen Dean, [L. S.]

"Attest: S. Bobo."

The interest to be due before maturity, was secured as follows: $350 for the first half year was paid in cash or deducted from the amount loaned, leaving the money actually received, the sum of $6,650, and for the remaining two years and a half, five notes for the same amount, being the interest for six months, were given, payable, respectively, in twelve, eighteen, twenty-four, thirty and thirty-six months. These notes were also made payable at Bridgewater, North Carolina. These notes were all secured by a mortgage of a lot of land in the city of Spartanburg, South Carolina, where all the papers were executed, and the money changed *hands. Mrs. Dean was allowed permission to sell a part of the lands mortgaged, the proceeds of sale to go to the mortgage debt, and on June 19th, 1880, she paid to Simpson Bobo, Esq., the plaintiff's agent at Spartanburg, the sum of $3,500, which, in the absence of any direction from defendant, was applied to the five notes given for interest, and on November 1st, 1880, she paid the further sum of $1,100, which extinguished the five interest notes, and left a balance over to be credited on the large note.

Subsequently to the loan of the money, John Rutherford died, leaving a will, of which his widow, Elizabeth C. Thornton, was appointed executrix, and which was admitted to probate in Burke county, North Carolina, by D. C. Pearson, judge of Probate of that county, March 27th, 1880. The proceedings were exemplified to the judge of Probate for Spartanburg county, in this State, who admitted the same to probate, and issued letters testamentary in this State to the plaintiff, Elizabeth C. Thornton, who, as such executrix, instituted this proceeding in Spartanburg county, South Carolina, to foreclose the mortgage for the balance of the debt unpaid, upon the remainder of the mortgaged premises, which had not been sold. The principal defense was, that the fact appearing from the face of the notes, that they were payable at Bridgewater, North Carolina, the whole transaction was a North Carolina contract, and to be interpreted exclusively with reference to the laws of that State, which should be applied to the case, and which at that time prohibited the lending of money at a higher rate of interest than eight per cent. per annum, under forfeiture of all interest and costs.

The case came on to be heard by Judge Cothran, who held from the testimony: (1.) "That the contract between the parties was made in South Carolina; (2.) That the parties in making it had reference to the laws of this State in all of its material parts; (3.) That there was no intention to evade the usury laws of North Carolina, but, on the contrary, that the plaintiff was moved by a desire to relieve the embarrassment of the defendant, who was at the time under obligation to others to pay a higher rate of interest; (4.) That the place named for the payment of the note was for the convenience of the parties, and without any intention *of establishing such as the place of performance; (5.) That the premises mortgaged are situated in this State, where alone foreclosure could be had; (6.) That both parties recognized and affirmed this as the place of performance, by making and receiving payments of money upon the contract in Spartanburg." &c. The judge ordered a decree of foreclosure for the whole amount of the debt, with interest according to the terms of the contract, as that was allowable by the South Carolina law at the time of the contract.

From this decree the defendant appeals to this court upon exceptions, alleging that his Honor had erred as follows:

1. "In not at least ordering that the premises be subdivided into small lots, and only so many thereof be sold as might be necessary to pay the judgment.

2. "In not at least crediting the note sued on with the sum of $3,500 paid in June, 1880.

3. "In not at least crediting the note sued on with the further sum of $1,100 paid in November, 1880.

4. "In not finding as a matter of fact that the payments upon said note were made in North Carolina.

5. "In not finding that the plaintiff, Elizabeth C. Thornton, was not the regularly appointed and qualified executrix in this state of the will of John Rutherford, deceased.

6. "In finding that the defendant and John Rutherford, in making their contract, had reference to the laws of this State in all of its material points.

7. "In finding that Rutherford, in making the contract, was moved by a desire to remove the embarrassment of the defendant.

8. "In finding that the place named for the payment of the note was for the convenience of the parties, and without any intention of establishing such as the place of performance.

9. "In finding that both parties recognized and affirmed this as the place of performance by making and receiving payments upon the contract at Spartanburg.

10. "In not finding that the place of performance of said contract was at Bridgewater, North Carolina.

11. "In not holding that the usury laws of North Carolina operated upon said contract.

*12. "In not finding at least that no more than eight per cent. interest could in any event be collected upon the note sued on.

13. "In not holding at least that the only amount recoverable in this action was the amount of money actually loaned, less the $4,600 paid thereon.

14. "In not holding that if the amount paid was applied to the payment of interest, then the defendant had a good and valid counterclaim for double the amount thereof."

The last exception was very properly abandoned. In no view of the case can our court enforce the penal laws of North Carolina.

It was in proof that the will of John Rutherford had been admitted to probate, both in Burke county, North Carolina, and in Spartanburg county, South Carolina; and the plaintiff qualified as sole executrix in both States. Gen. Stat., 1882, § 1875.

The laws of a State are limited to its territory. As a rule, it administers only its own laws. But it sometimes happens that the judiciary of one State is called upon to administer the laws of another. Certain rules of "comity" have been adopted by common consent and are generally followed. For example, a case may arise in our courts upon a contract made in another State, and then the question arises, whether the law of the State where the contract is to be interpreted or that of the State where it was made, shall govern. As to all matters relating to remedies, each State insists upon enforcing its own laws—the lex fori; but in the interpretation of a contract it has been established by usage that the lex loci contractus must govern. The rule is clearly stated by Chancellor Kent with its qualifications: "Then it may be laid down as the settled doctrine of public law, that personal contracts are to have the same validity, interpretation and obligatory force in any other country which they have in the country where they are made. * * * It is, however, a necessary exception to the universality of the rule, that no people are bound or ought to enforce, or hold valid in their courts of justice, any contract which is injurious to their public rights, or offends their morals, or contravenes their policy, or violates a public law," &c. 2 Kent *458.

Taking this as the rule, the defense in this case could not stand, for, confessedly, the contract was made in South Carolina, whose public law upon the subject of interest at that time was: "That in all cases for the hiring or lending, or use of money, wherein, by the terms of the original contract, no specific rate of interest shall have been agreed upon in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith, the legal interest shall be and remain at the rate of seven per cent. per annum." 13 Stat. 318. This provision has been construed to allow transactions where such specific rate of interest was agreed upon in writing, &c. Maner v. Wilson, 16 S. C. 469. The terms of the agreement in this case were in precise conformity to the requirements of this South Carolina law, and it seems to us were adopted with direct reference to that law, for, by the original contract, ten per cent. was "agreed upon in writing, signed by the party to be charged," &c. As a matter of fact, we suppose that there can be no doubt that the parties contracted with reference to the South Carolina law.

It is urged, however, that this rule of the lex loci is not universal; that it is changed in cases where the parties themselves contract with reference to the laws of some particular State other than that in which the contract was made. That it true. The general purpose of courts is to enforce contracts according to the intent of the parties; and if they make a contract in South Carolina, expressly or clearly with reference to North Carolina law, I know no reason why our courts, in carrying out the doctrine of "comity," would not apply the North Carolina law to it, except in the excepted cases stated by Chancellor Kent. But we do not think it follows that the single fact of the note being payable in North Carolina affords conclusive proof that they did so contract. It is true that indicating a place for payment affords a presumption, and is generally taken as sufficient proof of the fact. We do not, however, understand that this is a conclusive presumption of law, but is rather one of fact which may be rebutted. Suppose the parties had expressly declared in the note that this money, for convenience, was to be returned at Bridgewater, North Carolina, but the contract was made with direct reference to the South Carolina law, would any court enforce a contract which they did not make? It is like the *presumption which arises, when no other place is named, that the parties contracted with reference to the laws of the country where the contract is made, which can be overthrown by showing that they actually contracted with reference to the laws of some other State, as is attempted here.

But be this as it may, if the isolated fact that the note was made "payable at Bridgewater, North Carolina" must, without regard to the actual intention of the parties, be regarded as conclusive evidence that the parties contracted with reference to the North Carolina law, we think there was no error of law in the decree of the Circuit judge. There has been some confusion and conflicting opinions on the subject, but we think it now settled by authority and sustained by reason, that in such cases there is an exception as to the interest on a debt when it is expressly stipulated in the contract. Without incumbering this opinion with a review of the authorities upon the subject, we are content to take the doctrine as laid down in the case of Peck v. Mayo, 14 Vt. 33, and cited in a note in Kent, supra, where, after full discussion, it was decided as follows: (1.) "If a contract be entered into in one place to be performed in another, the parties may stipulate for the rate of interest of either country. (2.) If the contract stipulate generally for interest without fixing the rate, it shall be the rate of interest at the place of payment. (3.) If no interest be stipulated, and payment be not made, interest by way of damages is according to the law of the place of payment," &c.

In commenting on this case it is said in a note to Kent, supra: "The principle now established in Louisiana and New York is, that the place where the contract was made determines its validity as to interest, though made payable in another State or country, where the rate of interest is lower. This principle has much to recommend it for reasonableness, convenience and certainty, except in cases where the whole arrangement was evidently and fraudulently intended as a mere cover for usury." No allegation even of such fraudulent intent is made here. Indeed, the judge finds as a matter of fact, and we concur with him, "that there was no intention to evade the usury laws of North Carolina, but, on the contrary, that the plaintiff was moved by a desire *to relieve the embarrassment of the defendant, who was at the time under obligation to others to pay a higher rate of interest."

The same doctrine has been announced by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of Miller v. Tiffany, 1 Wall. 310, [17 L. Ed. 540], it is said: "The general principle in relation to contracts made in one place to be performed in another is well settled. They are to be governed by the law of the place of performance, and if the interest allowed by the law of the place of performance is higher than that permitted at the place of contract, the parties may stipulate for the higher interest without incurring the penalties of usury. Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. 77 [10 L. Ed. 61]; Curtis v. Smith, 15 N. Y. 92. The converse of this proposition is also well settled. If the rate of interest be higher at the place of the contract than at the place of performance, the parties may lawfully contract in that case also for the higher rate," citing Depeau v. Humphrey, 20 Mart.; Chapman v. Robinson, 6 Paige 634; and see, also, Dan. Neg. Inst. (2d edit.), § 922, and many authorities.

The forfeitures under the North Carolina usury law are somewhat in the nature of penalties, very different from our own law of force at the time of the contract, and to make it proper for the courts of this State to enforce them in the very face of our own law, would require the clearest evidence that the parties contracted alone with reference to the law of North Carolina, and in doing so had violated the usury law of that State. One of the established rules in respect to the doctrine of comity is, that when the lex loci contractus and the lex fori, as to conflicting rights acquired in each, come in direct collision, the comity of nations must yield to the positive law of the land. 2 Kent 461. In this case the contract was made in South Carolina, secured by a mortgage on land in South Carolina, and is now being enforced in South Carolina; and we have not been referred to any case where the lex loci and the lex fori were the same, in which the plea of the usury law of another State, although the State of the lex solutionis, was enforced upon the principle of "comity."

It is proper that only so much of the land should be sold as is necessary to pay the debt and costs, and that it should be *sold in such parcels as will secure the best price. If the point had been made below, we have no doubt the decree of foreclosure would have provided for it. We think that it was stated at the bar that no objection would be made to such course. If the parties cannot agree as to the parcels, let the officer to whom it was referred to estimate the amount due, make such recommendation on the subject as he may deem proper.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Laurens, September, 1882.

In this case, the Honorable James S. Cothran, of the Eighth Circuit, sat in the place of the chief justice, who had been of counsel in the cause.

This was an action by Nathaniel O. Kennedy, as executor of Leannah Kennedy, against all the other children of Leannah, and their husbands, and the wife and children of the plaintiff, for a settlement of the estate of the said Leannah. It is unnecessary to add anything to the statement contained in the opinion of this court.

[For subsequent opinion, see 26 S. C. 591, 2 S. E. 574.]

*Messrs. Holmes & Simpson, for appellant.

Messrs. B. W. Ball and Ferguson & Young, contra.

September 13th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice COTHIRAN. This matter has been much complicated by an attempt to bring into the settlement of Leannah Kennedy's estate that of Roda Kennedy, also deceased. If the latter can be eliminated from the case, and we think it can and should be, the matter will be greatly simplified, and the application of the familiar rules of accounting will work out their just and legitimate results.

Many years ago, as far back as the year 1825, Roda Kennedy executed certain deeds of trust, by which his estate, both real and personal, was conveyed to Allen Barksdale, in trust, for the benefit of himself during his life, the same to be equally divided at his death between his wife, Leannah, and her children by him—the share thus given to Leannah to go to their children at her death, "share and share alike." Roda Kennedy and two of the children departed this life prior to the year 1848, at which time the whole estate (the title to which was in the said trustee, but itself in the possession of the family of Roda Kennedy,) was divided into six equal parts and assigned in severalty to Leannah Kennedy, N. O. Kennedy, James Kennedy, Susan Kennedy (now Badgett), Ellen Kennedy (now Bolt), and Nancy Kennedy (now Franks), who entered into the following covenant:

"We do hereby acknowledge that the above settlement, embracing the estate of Roda Kennedy, deceased, including the property embraced in deeds of trust made to Allen Barksdale, and also the estates of Maria, Samuel B. and John Kennedy, children of Roda Kennedy, who have died intestate since his death, was this day made by and between us, and that we have received the lands, negroes, notes and moneys set forth and specified in said settlement, to the extent of our interest in said estate; and we do hereby bind ourselves, jointly and severally, and our respective heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, to abide by, perform and fulfill the aforesaid settlement in every respect, and to indemnify and save harmless Allen Barksdale, *the trustee, and each other for any damages, cost and charges that may arise by reason of and on account of said settlement. Witness our hands and seals this fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight.

(Signed,)	Leannah Kennedy,	[L. S.]
	N. O. Kennedy,	[L. S.]
	Jas. P. Kennedy,	[L. S.]
	J. M. Franks,	[L. S.]
	N. C. Franks,	[L. S.]
	S. Kennedy,	[L. S.]
	E. Kennedy,	[L. S.]

"Test: Samuel Barksdale, H. C. Young."

It appears that this arrangement was entered into more than twenty-one years after the date of the trust deeds of Roda Kennedy to Allen Barksdale, and it is safe to assume that the parties to it were all of full age. Into the pool Leannah cast her distributive shares as an heir-at-law in the vested remainders of her children who had died in the meantime, unmarried and intestate, and in these shares, as well as in the slave Hamah and her increase, given to her by the deed of Roda Kennedy, she had an absolute estate. Whether it was from a feeling of impatience on the part of the children to be let into the inheritance, so long delayed, or from whatsoever motive the arrangement was thus solemnly entered into by them, it is needless now to inquire; the act finds just and sufficient support, as well in the valuable contributions made to the pool by Leannah as in the fact of a family settlement amongst themselves, into the precise terms of which, and the motives that induced it, in the absence of fraud, imposition or overreaching, courts of justice are not swift to inquire. * * * But when required to do so, and the same are found fair and reasonable, to save, it may be, family disputes, or for other good cause, "they are upheld with a strong hand, and are binding when in cases between mere strangers the like agreements would not be enforced." Story Eq. Jur., § 132. And it was said by Lord Eldon that, "in family arrangements an equity is administered in equity which is not applied to agreements generally." 1 Ves. & B. 30. The arrangement of January 5th, 1848, comes within the operation of these wholesome *rules, and by means of it Allen Barksdale was discharged from the duties of his trust, and the estate of Roda Kennedy lost forever its identity.

As Leannah advanced in years and incompetency, and her children grew in strength and capacity, she gave to them of her personal property from time to time, until finally she gave away all excepting some choses in action against her son, N. O., and her sons-in-law, stipulating only for a maintenance. The property thus given was taken by the children at a valuation agreed upon, and upon condition that in the final disposition of her estate, consisting of a tract of land and the choses in action aforesaid, these gifts should be accounted for with a view to equality.

In 1866, Leannah executed her will by which she gave her entire estate, in equal shares, to her three daughters, Mrs. Franks, Mrs. Badgett and Mrs. Bolt, and to her son, N. O. Kennedy, in trust, for the use of his wife and children. Her son, N. O., and her sons-in-law, were all indebted to her; the first-named in excess of the others. Touching the claims held against N. O., she directed her executor, by the third clause of her will, "to take into the account only so much of those claims as will amount to the principal and interest of the note I hold on my son-in-law, J. M. Franks; the balance of the said claim, I give to my said son, in trust for the benefit of his wife and children, as mentioned in the second clause of my will."

The several claims against her sons-in-law, Franks, Badgett and Bolt, cannot be set-off, as is contended for, against the shares of their wives. Roberts v. Adams, 2 S. C. 337; Farrow v. Farrow, 12 Id. 168. These are assets, whatever may be their value, in the hands of the executor; and so, also, as to the claims against N. O. Kennedy, to an amount equal to the sum due by J. M. Franks upon his note to the testatrix.

Soon after the death of Leannah, which occurred on March 10th, 1876, suit was begun in the Court of Common pleas, by Susan Badgett and Thomas L., her husband, against N. O. Kennedy, as executor of the will of Leannah, and individually, and all the other defendants here, excepting the children of N. O. Kennedy. The object of that suit was for an accounting amongst the parties for the amounts received by them of the *estate of Roda Kennedy. It ignored the settlement of January 5th, 1848, and sought to go behind it for the purpose of separating the estate which Leannah held absolutely, from that which, under the deeds of Roda Kennedy, she held only for life, and for a sale and division of the same. The case was heard on exceptions to the referee's report, fall term, 1880, by Judge Kershaw, who, in a well-considered decree, announced amongst other things, as his conclusion, that the settlement of January 5th, 1848, excluded the parties from claiming the property then (as now) in controversy, otherwise than as of the estate of Leannah. There was no appeal from his decree. The children of N. O. Kennedy were not parties to that suit.

The points made and most strenuously urged upon the hearing before us are: 1. The matter of res adjudicata. 2. The matter of necessary parties; both arising under Judge Kershaw's decree in the case just referred to. In the view which we have taken, the question of res adjudicata is not material to the decision of the case, nor is it necessarily involved in its determination. Indeed, technically, one of the unities necessary to support the plea of res adjudicata is wanting here, to wit, identity of parties. Mauldin v. Gossett, 15 S. C. 565.

But we concur in the conclusions announceed by Judge Kershaw, not upon the ground of res adjudicata, but because in our judgment they are correct. Nor does the question as to who were necessary parties to that suit arise, and we are relieved, by finding that there was no subsisting trust after the settlement of January 5th, 1848, from considering the nice distinction between an action brought in opposition to the trust, and one brought in furtherance of it, to enforce its provisions; the former requiring the presence of the beneficiaries, the latter not.

The master, adopting the referee's report in the former case, has found that, in the various gifts of property made by Leannah to her children, in the years 1848, 1856 and 1860, inequalities exist. In other words, assuming $6,621.17 to be the amount of a share, not of "the trust estate," as it is styled by the referee, but of the whole estate as found in the hands of Leannah at the settlement of January 5th, 1848, Mrs. Badgett, Mrs. Franks and Mrs. Bolt each received less than said sum, and that N. O. Ken*nedy received more. These deficiencies are not debts due to the daughters, but, after the debts of Leannah shall have been paid, these amounts must be taken into account in the final distribution of her estate for the purpose of equalizing the shares of the parties interested.

As the case must go back to the master, it will be proper to recur, in revising the accounting, to the item of $280 disallowed to J. M. Franks for the board of Leannah. There is no legal obligation upon children to support their parents, but it has always been considered a high moral duty; and in this case it was the subject of contract, supported by the final division of the mother's property amongst the children. As such, the matter referred to is a proper charge, and if no others of the same kind exist, contribution should be made to J. M. Franks by the other children, under the agreement made between them to maintain Leannah. If it should be found that others of them have also borne the burden of her support, compensation to them in like manner should be made on proper proof.

The report of the master was confirmed by Judge Wallace; and it is the judgment of this court that his order confirming said report be modified as herein indicated, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for such orders as are necessary to carry out the conclusions herein stated.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, March 14th, 1883. J. W. Ferguson, for appellant.

No. 1362. STATE v. ATTERBERRY. November Term, 1882.

[Criminal Law ⇨763, 764.]

The defendants being on trial for riot, the Circuit judge (Aldrich) charged the jury as follows:

"The prosecutor, Mr. W. A. Bradley, is a gentleman well and favorably known to the court, and, no doubt, to many of the jury. If you believe the witnesses for the State, the conduct on board of that train that night was outrageous. The witnesses for the State have identified these defendants as being among the number, but it is, after all, for you to say, gentlemen, whether or not a riot was committed, and whether these defendants were among the number. Take the record."

The defendants were convicted and appealed. Held, that Bradley, being corroborated by two other witnesses, none of whom were impeached, the charge, though somewhat irregular, was not in this, nor in any particular, an invasion of the province of the jury, nor a violation of the constitution, Art. IV., § 26.

*No. 1377. HARBIN v. PARKER. November Term, 1882.

In this case, which was an action to recover money due on account of certain partnership transactions, this court, accepting the understanding of counsel, treated it as a case in chancery, and ruled the following points:

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨273.]

Exceptions to a Circuit decree should not be taken by a mere reference back to such exceptions to the master's report as were sustained or overruled.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Levi v. Blackwell, 35 S. C. 514, 15 S. E. 243.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1590, 1606, 1620-1623, 1625-1630, 1764; Dec. Dig. ⇨273.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⇨1022.]

Concurrent findings of fact by master and Circuit judge in a chancery case confirmed, the testimony being conflicting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4016; Dec. Dig. ⇨1022.]

[3. Reference ⇨101.]

There being in the master's report no statement of the accounts upon one branch of the case, but a recommendation for a recommitment as to that matter, and the Circuit judge not having himself made a statement of such accounts, he erred in not directing a recommitment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 169-180; Dec. Dig. ⇨101.]

[4. Costs ⇨223.]

The Circuit judge having made no order for costs, this court declined to direct each party to pay their own costs.

Circuit decree of Aldrich, J., modified.

Opinion by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, March 31st, 1883. Keith & Verner, J. J. Norton, for appellant. Wells & Orr, contra.

No. 1381. BRANCH & SMITH v. KNEPTON. November Term, 1882.

This was an action by the plaintiffs against the defendant on a sealed instrument in words following:

"This agreement, made February 9th, 1875, between Branch & Smith, of the first part, and J. W. Knepton, of Beldoe, S. C., of the second part, provides that we agree to sell for Branch & Smith fertilizers on the following terms: * * * The party of the second part to endorse all notes given for fertilizers, and make a settlement with Branch & Smith on the first of May, and to guarantee all sales made. In consideration of this the party of the first part agree to pay a commission of five dollars per ton to the party of the second part. Settlement of commission on time sales to be made first of November next."

The complaint alleged sales by the defendant under this covenant to the amount of $1,547.11, and that only $20 had been paid by the defendant. The answer made a general denial, and, for a second defense, admitted the agreement to sell, to endorse the purchasers' notes and to guarantee the solvency of the purchasers; that defendant did sell, and did endorse the *notes of the purchasers and deliver them to the plaintiffs; that the commercial fertilizers proved to be worthless and a damage to those who used them, and that therefore it was that the plaintiffs had sued this defendant instead of the makers of the notes, and denied indebtedness. Plaintiffs moved before the Circuit judge (Hudson) to strike out the first defense as sham and the second as frivolous. This motion was refused. At the trial the agreement was proved and the notes for the fertilizers made by the purchasers to the defendant, and by him endorsed. A non-suit was then ordered "because of failure to show any exercise of diligence on the part of the plaintiffs in collecting these notes, guaranteed or endorsed—no demand and refusal and no notice of such refusal." Plaintiffs appealed. Held—

[1. Pleading ⚡353, 354.]

The motion to strike out was addressed to the judicial discretion of the Circuit judge, and that discretion was not abused. Defenses may not be stricken out on the specific ground of inconsistency. Ransom v. Anderson, 9 S. C. 440, approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1092–1095; Dec. Dig. ⚡353, 354.]

[2. Guaranty ⚡6.]

The covenant required the defendant to sell the fertilizers and endorse the notes over to the plaintiffs, and to guarantee the solvency of the purchasers; and he having done this there was no breach of the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. ⚡6.]

[3. Guaranty ⚡44.]

But if an original guaranty in advance of all notes that might be taken, it was not a purchase by the defendant nor an unqualified promise by the defendant to pay the notes taken by him, and the diligence, demand and notice which the law requires in such cases, were not dispensed with.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. ⚡44.]

[4. Guaranty ⚡45.]

The defendant having performed his covenant, the plaintiffs could proceed to enforce their demands only through the notes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. ⚡45.]

No. 1382. THE STATE, ex relatione NOLLEN, v. THOMSON, Mayor, et al.

November Term, 1882.

In response to a petition duly presented to the city council of Spartanburg by the requisite number of voters, (Gen. Stat., § 1746,) an election upon the question of "License" or "No License" was held on November 28th, 1882, and the election resulted in a majority for "No License." On December 21st, 1882, the city council *passed an ordinance forbidding the sale of liquors within the limits of the city of Spartanburg. At such election, there was no registration of voters, the ordinance providing for the election declaring that "all persons qualified are permitted to vote irrespective of registration." On December 30th, certain citizens of Spartanburg, including one only of the signers to the petition aforesaid, made application to the city council for another election, upon the ground that for want of registration there had been no valid election under the petition above mentioned, and, this being refused, they applied in January, 1883, to this court for a writ of mandamus to compel the said city council to order an election. The pleadings here were the petition, return, reply and demurrer to the reply. Held—

*600

[1. Mandamus ⚡74.]

That a writ of mandamus will not issue where only one out of 290 who demanded the election, complain of the manner in which it was conducted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 150–157; Dec. Dig. ⚡74.]

[2. Mandamus ⚡74.]

That the application came too late, especially so as the relators took part in the election and made no protest at the time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 150–157; Dec. Dig. ⚡74.]

[3. Mandamus ⚡74.]

That mandamus could not issue to the mayor and aldermen, who ordered the election to be held, even if they erred in their construction of the law, and went beyond their duty in prescribing how it should be conducted, which was a matter regulated by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 150–157; Dec. Dig. ⚡74.]

[4. Mandamus ⇨10.]

It being doubtful whether registration was required for such an election, and whether registration can be made a qualification of an elector, or be more than the requisite legal evidence that the person offering to vote is qualified—mandamus will not issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. ⇨10.]

No. 1383. CAULFIELD v. COUNTY OF CHARLESTON. November Term, 1882.

The following points were ruled in this case:

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨87.]

After the master had fully reported and the case was being heard on that report, the judge could not receive additional testimony. If a motion to recommit was formally made, it was addressed to the judicial discretion of the Circuit judge, and its refusal was not appealable.

[2. Appeal and Error ⇨1017.]

[3. Evidence ⇨162.]

The books of a trial justice kept by him under the requirement of the law, are the highest and best evidence of proceedings had before him, especially in action by him for unpaid costs in criminal cases claimed to have been tried by himself. Cherry v. McCants, 7 S. C. 224, recognized and followed.

[4. Appeal and Error ⇨842.]

Whether there has been sufficient proof of the loss of original evidence to justify the admissibility of secondary evidence, must, to a great extent, be left to the discretion of the Circuit judge.

Mere proof of the loss of a trial justice's papers does not dispense with the necessity of proving the correctness of the items of an account for services rendered, the books not being lost, and such papers as were produced being grossly irregular and defective.

No. 1404. DUNBAR, CLARK &amp; CO. v. PORT ROYAL AND AUGUSTA RAILWAY COMPANY. November Term, 1882.

[Carriers ⇨131.]

This was an action by plaintiffs for the recovery of eighty-six barrels of commercial fertilizers, shipped over defendants' road, but not delivered. The complaint set out the shipment of two invoices, aggregating 240 barrels chemicals, on February 4th and 13th, 1879, from Port Royal to Allendale, and seven invoices at stated dates in February to May, 1879, of 256 barrels of dissolved bone from Augusta to Allendale, out of which shipments, twenty barrels of chemicals and sixty-six barrels of dissolved *bone had not been delivered to the consignee, but that plaintiffs "do not know on what day or days the eighty-six barrels of fertilizers alleged to have been lost, were received by the defendants for shipment." Motion was made by defendant, before Judge Wallace, to require the plaintiff to make his complaint more definite and certain, by stating "on what day or days the fertilizers alleged to have been lost, were received." This motion was refused, and on appeal, submitted without argument, the order below was affirmed.

*602

No. 1420. ALSTON v. FRANZ. April Term, 1883.

[Depositories ⇨11.]

The captain of an outward bound brig from the port of Beaufort, denying the right of plaintiff, as pilot, to his pilotage fees, paid the amount into defendant's hands to be paid to the plaintiff, if the board of pilot commissioners (of which defendant was chairman) should decide that plaintiff was entitled to be paid. Plaintiff was summoned before the board, that the matter might be determined, but he failed to attend, and then brought this action to recover this money. Under the charge of Judge Aldrich, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Held, that whether plaintiff was entitled to his pilotage fees or not, he could not recover this money from the defendant, as it did not belong to the plaintiff, nor was there any evidence that the defendant had contracted either expressly or impliedly to be responsible to the plaintiff, for the fees claimed, except upon certain conditions, which had been ignored, if not repudiated by the plaintiff.

No. 1433. Ex parte REED. April Term, 1883.

An action was instituted in the Court of Common Pleas for Beaufort county by one Mrs. Reed, against her husband, for separation, custody of their four infant children, alimony and general relief. A motion was made by defendant to have the service of the summons set aside, which motion was refused, and an appeal was taken to this court from the order of refusal. (See Reed v. Reed, ante 548.) The cause being thus delayed, Mrs. Reed filed her petition for writ of habeas corpus, renewing the statements of her complaint, and sought, under this proceeding, to obtain the custody and control of her children, who were then with the father, their ages being eleven, ten, six and four years, respectively. On hearing the petition and the affidavits submitted on both sides, the Circuit Judge (Aldrich) found as matters of fact that the husband had been openly incontinent even in the house with his wife and daughters, and cruel to his wife, subjecting her to personal violence of a brutal character, and to humiliation in the presence of her servants, and that, therefore, he was not a proper person to have the nurture and moral training of young children, but that the mother, notwithstanding alleged errors committed before marriage, was; and, as the mother asserted her willingness and ability to support the children, the order was that she should have their custody, they not to be removed beyond the limits of this State, and the father to have reasonable access to them. From this order Mr. Reed appealed to this court. Held—

[1. Abatement and Revival ☞8.]

That this proceeding was in its nature pendente lite, and not independent of the original action, nor superseding by substitution so much of the original action as relates to the permanent custody and support of the children. It could not, therefore, be resisted under the plea of another action pending; but the order must be regarded as provisional only, and cannot extend beyond the rendition of the final judgment in the original cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. §§ 39-56, 58-63, 68-72; Dec. Dig. ☞8.]

[2. Habeas Corpus ☞113.]

The application for the possession of children under a writ of habeas corpus is a proceeding on the law side of the court, *and the findings of fact by the Circuit judge in such case are decisive.

[3. Habeas Corpus ☞99.]

Other things being equal, the claims of the father to the custody and control of his children are superior to those of the mother, but it is discretionary with the court to which one of the parents the children shall be committed, and where they are under the age of choice (as in this case) the court will exercise that discretion, looking solely to the welfare and happiness of the children. Ex parte Schumpert, 6 Rich. 344, approved.

[Bankruptcy ☞20.]

In ordering that any money in this case (see 12 S. C. 9; 17 Id. 163,) applicable to the claim of W. M. Thomas, (who had been adjudged a bankrupt in February, 1871,) should "be paid into the registry of the United States District Court, without prejudice, where all the questions between the bankrupt and his assignee can be adjudicated and finally settled," the Circuit judge (Aldrich) properly left it to the District Court to determine whether the question of ownership between the bankrupt and his assignee was res adjudicata. But if the assignee, by voluntarily submitting himself to the State courts, would be estopped from raising in the District Court a question which has been here determined, it is then proper for this court to consider whether the ownership of this claim has been adjudicated; and, so considering it, this court finds nothing in the records of the case determining to whom belongs the money applicable to the Thomas claim.

Action for damages for assault and battery, and a verdict for plaintiff. Defendant appealed, upon the ground that the Circuit judge (Pressley) had erred in charging the jury upon a conjectural state of facts. No. 1450. DAWSON v. NIVER. April Term, 1883.

[Appeal and Error ☞1011.]

This was an action to set aside a deed of conveyance, upon the grounds of misrepresentation, fraud, and gross inadequacy of consideration. The Circuit judge (Aldrich), from the written testimony submitted to him, found, as facts, that it was a "wicked attempt to cheat this poor, illiterate negro out of her patrimony," and that "the price was grossly inadequate;" that the interest for which defendant paid $10 was then worth at least $56, and probably a great deal more; and he declared the deed to be void, and ordered it to be delivered up and canceled. From this decree defendant appealed, but the judgment below was here affirmed. This court, in its opinion, reiterates the rule laid down in Gary v. Burnett, 16 S. C. 632, as to the weight of the Circuit decree on issues of fact, where the testimony is submitted to the Circuit judge in writing, and, upon this same subject, uses the following language: "Indeed, the case depended largely upon the credibility of the witnesses, and, where that is the case, and there is *a conflict of testimony, as there was in this case, this court would rarely, if ever, disturb the findings of fact in the court below."

The court further held, that, while mere inadequacy of price is not sufficient to set aside a deed, yet, where the inadequacy is so gross as to warrant an inference of fraud, it may furnish the ground, or rather, the evidence of fraud.

[Associations ☞10.]

This was an action by the president of an unincorporated society against the treasurer for the recovery of a tin box containing $13.25 belonging to the society, the plaintiff alleging that the defendant had been expelled from membership for her refusal to pay a fine imposed upon her for "disrespect to the chair," and her refusal to deliver up the tin box and its contents. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff by the trial justice, but on appeal to the Circuit Court, Judge Pressley held that the action was improperly brought by the president, and dismissed the complaint. On appeal to this court, this judgment was affirmed it not appearing that an expulsion of the defendant was justified by any of the rules of the society, and that being still the treasurer she was entitled to the tin box and its contents.

No. 1460. LEE v. FOWLER. April Term, 1883.

This was an action, in effect, upon two sealed notes in the usual form. The answer alleged that these notes were intended merely as memoranda upon which to base, at some future time, a settlement of a partnership between the parties. The case was referred to the master, who, against objection, permitted parol proof to sustain the allegations of the answer. On exceptions to this report, Judge Fraser ruled that the defendant was bound by the notes, unless he could show that the consideration had failed in whole or in part, or was illegal, &c.; but that matters arising subsequent to the execution of the notes, might be inquired into, under the defendant's plea of counter-claim, and he re-committed the cause. To this decree, no exceptions were taken. The *master restated the account under these directions, and Judge Cothran confirmed his report. The cause was then brought to this court on appeal. Held—

"It would have been more in accordance with safe practice if the defendant had at least excepted to the decree of Judge Fraser, which set aside the first report and re-committed the case; but we will consider the appeal from the order of Judge Cothran as giving this court the power to review the decree of Judge Fraser as one intermediate and affecting the final order." Hyatt v. McBurney, 17 S. C. 150.
